SI jactare licet magnorum munera diuim,
 Sibi que veris fas placere dotibus;
 Cur mihi non videar fortunatissima pellus?
 Digna est malis, bona quæ parum novit sua.
 Vtima lanigeris animosus est India lucis, Suis superbus est Arabs odoribus.
 Thuriferis gaudet Pandaia dives arenis;
 Ibera flumen terra jactat aureum.
 Aegypti faciunt animos septem ostia Nili, Laudata Rheini vinatollunt accolæ.
 Lata nec uberibus sibi displicet Africa glebæ;
 Hæc portubus superbi, illa mercibus:
 At mihi nec fontes, nec dæia flumina defunt,
 Sulci ve pingues, præti nec ridentia.
 Fœta viris, fœcunda fenis, fœcunda metallis;
 Ne glorier, quod ambians largas opes
 Porrigit Oceanus, neu quod nec amicus ullæ, Cælum, nec aura dulcius spirat plagæ.
 Serus in occiduas mihi Phœbus conditur undas,
 Toror que noctes blanda ducit lacidas.
 Possem ego laudati commemorare vellera Bætis.
 Vbi villus albis mollior bidentibus?
 Et tua non nequeam miracula temnere Memphi.
 Verum illa major, justiorque gloria,
 Quod Latius, quod sum celebrata Britannia Gratiæ, Orbem vetustas quod vocarit alterum.

THE AVTHOR TO The Reader.

Hope it shal be to no discredite, if I now use againe by way of Preface, the same words with a few more, that I used twentie foure yeares since, in the first edition of this worke. Abraham Ortelius the worthy restorer of Ancient Geographie arriving heere in England, about thirtie foure yeares past, dealt earnestly with mee that I would illustrate this Isle of BRITAINE, or (as he said) that I would restore antiquitie to Britaine, and Britaine to his antiquitie; which was, as I understood, that I would renew ancientrie, enlighten obscuritie, cleare doubts, and recall home Veritie by way of recovery, which the negligence of writers and credulity of the common sort had in a manner proscribed and utterly banished from amongst us. A painfull matter I assure you, and more than difficult: wherein what toyle is to be taken, as no man thinketh, so no man believeth but hee that hath made the triall. Neverthelessse how much the difficultie discouraged mee from it, so much the glory of my country encouraged me to undertake it. So while at one and the same time I was fearefull to undergoe the burthen, and yet desirous to doe some service to my Country, I found two different affections, Feare, and Boldnesse; I know not how, conjoynd in me. Notwithstanding by the most gracious direction of the ALMIGHTY, taking INDUSTRY for my consort, I adventured upon it, and with all my studie, care, cogitation, continuall meditation, paine, and travaile I imploied my selfe thereunto when I had any spare time. I made search after the Etymologie of Britain & the first Inhabitants timorously, neither in so doubtful a matter have I affirmed ought confidently. For I am not ignorant that the first originals of nations are obscure by reason of their profound antiquitie, as things which are seene very deepe and far remote: like as the courses, the reaches, the confluencies, & the out-lets of great rivers are wel knowne, yet their first fountaines and heads lie commonly unknown. I have succinctly run over the Romans government in Britain, and the inundation of forraigne people thereinto, what they were, and from whence they came: I have traced out the ancient divisions of these Kingdomes, I have summarily specified the states, and judicall Courts of the same.

In the severall Counties I have compendiously set downe the limits (and yet not exactly by pearch and pole to breed questions) what is the nature of the soile, which were places of greatest antiquitie, who have bene the Dukes, Marquesses, Earles, Vicounts, Barons, and some of the most signall, and ancient families therein (for who can particulate all?) What I have performed, I leave to men of judgement. But time the most sound and sincere witness will give the truest information, when envy which persecuteth the living, shall have her mouth stopped. Thus much give me leave to say, that I have in no wise neglected such things as are most materiall to search, and sift out the Truth. I have attained to some skill of the most ancient British and English-Saxon tongues: I have travailed over all England for the most part, I have conferred with most skilfull observers in each country, I have studiously read over our owne country writers, old and new, all Greeke and Latine authors which have once made mention of Britaine. I have had conference with learned men in other parts of Christendome: I have been diligent in the Records of this Realme. I have looked into most Libraries, Registers, and memorials of Churches, Cities, and Corporations, I have pored upon many an old Rowle, and Evidence: and produced their testimonie (as beyond all exception) when the cause required, in their very own words (although barbarous they be) that the honour of veritie might in no wise be impeached.

For all this I may be censured unadvised, and scant modest who being but of the lowest fourme in the schoole of Antiquitie, where I might well have lurked in obscuritie, have adventured as a scribler upon the stage in this learmed age amidst the diversities of reliques both in wit and judgement. But to tell the truth unfainedly, the love of my Country which compriseth all love in it, and hath endeared me unto it, the glory of the British name, the advice of some judicious friends hath overmastered my modestie, and (wild I mild I), hath enforced me against mine own judgment to undergo this burden too heavy for me, & so thrust me forth into the worlds view. For I see judgements, prejudices, censures, reprehensions, obirectations, detractions, affronts, and confronts, as it were, in battaile array to environ me on every side: some there are which wholly contemne and avile this study of Antiquitie as a back-looking curiosity; whose authority as I do not utterly vilifie, so I do not overprize or admire their judgement. Neither am I destitute of reasons whereby I might approve this my purpose to well bred and well meaning men which tender the glory of their native Country: and moreover could give them to understand that in the studie of Antiquity, (which is alwaies accompanied with dignity, and hath a certaine resemblance with eternitie) there is a sweet food of the mind well besitting such as are of honest and noble disposition. If any there be which are desirous to be strangers in their owne soile, and forrainers in their owne City, they may so continue and therein flatter themselves. For such like I have not written these lines, nor taken these paines. Some there be who may object the silly web of my stile, and rough hewed forme of my writing. Verily I acknowledge it, neither have I waied every word in Goldsmiths scales, as Varro commanded, neither purposed I to picke flowers out of the gardens of Eloquence. But why should they object this, when as Cicero the father of Eloquence denieth that this kind of argument can ἀνευφωτισταί, that is, be flourished out, and as Pomponius Mela said, is incapable of all Eloquent speech.

Many happily will insult over me for that I have adventured to hunt after the originals of names by conjectures, who if they proceed on to reject all conjectures, I feare me a great part of liberall learning and humane knowledge will be utterly out-cast into banishment. For the edge of our understanding is so blunt that we are of necessitie enforced to prosecute many matters in all professions conjecturally. In Physick ζήμεια, τεκμήρια, εκκοτα, which are nothing else but conjectures, have their place, and stand in good stead, likewise in Rhetorick, Civil Law, and other arts they are admitted and allowed. And whereas conjectures are certaine detractions of things unknown, and as Fabius termeth them, directions of reason to verity, I have alwaies thought that they were to be accounted among the skippers wherewith Time worketh and draweth Veritie out of Democritus his deepe dungeon. But if these men may be induced to attribute ought to conjectures, I doubt not but my modesty and moderation in conjecturing may withall purchase my pardon; Plato in his Cratylus commandeth that we recall the originals of names to the barbarous tongues (for so he called all but Greek) as being most ancient. I thereupon in Etymologies and my conjectures have made recourse to the British, or Welsh tongue (so they now call it) as being the same which the Primitive and most ancient Inhabitants of this land used, and to the English-Saxons tongue which our Progenitors the English spake. He commandeth that the name be consonant to the nature of the thing, & the nature thereof to the name, if they be herein dissonant, I admit them not. In things, faith he, there is οὐκ, ζήμια, χρομα: that is, but I cannot aptly expresse them, A found, a forme, and colour, if these discover not themselves in the name I reject the conjecture. As for obscure Etymologies, far fetched, hardly wrested, and which may be drawne diversly; I have vouchsafed them no place in this worke, finally I have becue so sparing and cautelously forecasting in my conjectures that if I be not thought εὐτομος, that is, Happily adventurous, I shall not seeme to αμεροῦ, that is, Presumptuously audacious. And albeit I have once or twice framed two conjectures in one and the same name, yet I forget not in the meane time that Veritie is consecrated unto Veritie.

There are some peradventure which apprehend it disdainfully and offensively that I have not remembered this or that family, when as it was not my purpose to mention any but such as were more notable, nor all them truly (for their names would fill whole volumes) but such as hapned in my way according to the method I proposed to my selfe; And with Gods grace I may have a more convenient occasion to deserve well of the Nobilitie and Gentry. But happily they will be most offended herein who have least deserved of their country, or overvallew themselves most, or whose Gentry may be but newly blossomed. Of whom yet I protest I would not offend any, and therefore desire and hope their noble natures will not take it offensively upon such causelesse apprehensions.

Others will call me in question for that I have commended some persons now living; yet I have done it sparingly, and that out of an assurance of verity, out of the common consent and voice of such as can well judge of worth, & from no base flattery. By these sparing commendations (such as are commended may be lessened that their depertments may be answerable, and that they preserve and daily increase the same. Succeeding ages, which I respect more than the present, will render to every man his right whatsoever is now scribled in papers. In the meane time I wish them to remember, that to praise good men is but to shew a light of direction as out of a watch towre to posteritie. True is that saying of Symmachus. Imitation is encouraged with the seemly praises of the good, and imitating vertue is cherished by the example of others honour. If any say that I have sought occasion to commend some one or other, I confesse it. Neither is well-meaning without leasing to be blamed among the good, and well deserving, friends are not to be forgotten. Howsoever Vertue and Glory hath alwaies opposites, and men usually envie the present, and reverence what is past; yet God forbid that we should be so partially injurious as to thinke our times under most worthy Princes to be barren of praiseworthy persons. As for such as maligne the praise of the good, I feare me least in their owne guiltinesse they may apply the dispraise of the bad to themselves. As for my selfe I sensibly understand that which Plinie intimated to Tacitus in like case. There will bee great offence, and slender thanks, for albeit in the loosenesse of the world, there is much more to be discommended than commended; yet if you commend you shall be taxed as oversparing; if you discommend you shall be censured as overlavish, although you doe the one most compleatly, and the other most moderately.

Some will blame me for that I have omitted this and that towne and Castle, as though I purposed to mention any but such as were most notorious, and mentioned by ancient authours. Neither verily were it worth the labour once to name them, when as beside the naked name there is nothing memorable. Truly it was my project and purpose to seeke, rake out, and free from darkenesse such places as Cæsar, Tacitus, Ptolomy, Antonine the Emperour, Notitia Provinciarum, and other antique writers have specified and Time hath overcast with mist and darknes by extinguishing, altering, and corrupting their old true names. In searching & seeking after these, as I will not avouch uncertainties so I doe not conceale probabilities. That I have not found out every one although I have sought after them with painfull & chargeable inquiry let it bee no imputation to mee, as it is not to a Spadiard that worketh in Mines, who while he findeth & followeth the maine vaines, seeth not the hidden small fillets; or that I may use that which Columella did. As it is the commendation of a good Huntsman to find game in a wide wood, so it is no imputation if he hath not caught all, and likewise to me, Some things are to be left to the inquisitive diligence of others, Neither, as a learned man said, he teacheth well which teacheth all. An other age, and other men may daily find out more. It is enough for me to have begun, and I have gained as much as I looke for, if I shall draw others into this argument, whether they undertake a new worke or amend this.

There are certain, as I heare who take it impatiently that I have mentioned some of the most famous Monasteries and their founders. I am sorry to heare it, and with their good favour will say thus much, They may take it as impatiently, and peradventure would have us forget that our ancestors were, and we are of the Christian profession when as there are not extant any other more conspicuous, and certaine Monuments, of their piety, and zealous devotion toward God. Neither were there any other seed-gardens from whence Christian Religion, and good learning were propagated over this Isle, howbeit in corrupt ages some weeds grew out over-ranckly.

Mathematicians will accuse me as though I had wholly missed the mark in the Cosmographical dimensions of longitude, & latitude. Yet heare me I pray you. I have carefully cõferred the Locall tables new & old, Manuscript, and printed, of Oxford & Cambridge, and King Henry the Fifth. In the latitude they doe not vary much from Ptolomy, but agree wel together, neither do I thereupon imagine with Stadius, that the globe of the earth is removed from his centre,

centre, therefore I have relied upon them. But in the Longitude there is no accord, no consent at all. What should I then doe? When as therefore the moderne navigators have observed that there is no variation of the Compass at the Isles of Afores, I have thence begun with them, the account of Longitude as from the first Meridian, which yet I have not precisely measured.

As for obscuritie, fables, extravagant digressions I trust there is no cause to sue out my pardon. There will be no obscuritie but to them which have not sipped the first elements of Antiquitie, and our histories: upon fables I have no waies relied, and that I might not digresse extravagantly. I have had often recourse to the title of my booke (as Pliny adviseth) and estoones demanded of my selfe why I tooke penne in hand. Many have found a defect in this worke that Mapes were not adjoynd, which doe allure the eyes by pleasant portraiture, and are the best directions in Geographical studies, especially when the light of learning is adjoynd to the speechlesse delineations. Yet my abilitie could not compasse it, which by the meanes and cost of George Bishop, and John Norton is now performed out of the labours of Christopher Saxton, and John Norden, most skilfull Chorographers.

But least I should run at randome in my Preface. To accomplish this worke the whole maine of my Industrie hath been imploied for many yeares with a firme settled study of the truth, and sincere antique faithfulness to the glory of God and my country. I have done dishonour to no nation, have descanted upon no mans name, I have impaired no mans reputation, I have impeached no mans credit, no not Geoffrey of Monmouth whose historie (which I would gladly support) is held suspected amongst the judicious. Neither have I assumed upon my self any persuasion of knowledge, but only that I have been desirous to know much. And so I right willingly acknowledge that I may erre much, neither will I sooth and smother my errors. Who shooting all day long doth alwaies hit the mark? Many matters in these studies are raked under deceitfull ashes. There may be some escapes from memory, for who doth so comprehend particularities, in the treasury of his memory, that he can utter them at his pleasure? There may be mistakings in regard of my unskilfulness, for who is so skilfull that struggling with Time in the foggie darke sea of Antiquity, may not run upon rocks? It may be that I have been misled by the credit of authors and others whom I tooke to be most true, and worthy of credit. Neither is there verily (as Pliny saith) any easier slipping from truth, then when a grave Authour warranteth an untruth. Others may be more skilfull and more exactly observe the particularities of the places where they are conversant. If they, or any other whosoever, will advertise mee wherein I am mistaken, I will amend it with manifold thanks. If I have unwitting omitted ought, I will supply it, if I have not fully explicated any point, upon their better information I will more cleere it, if it proceed from good meaning, and not from a spirit of contradiction and quavelling, which doe not besit such as are well bred, and affect the truth. Meane while let your kind courtesie, my industry, the common love of our common mother our native Country, the ancient honour of the British name obtaine so much upon their entreaty, that I may utter my judgement without prejudice to others, that I may proceed in that course that others have formerly done in the like argument, and that you would pardon my errors upon my acknowledgement, which may be as well hoped as requested, from good indifferent and reasonable men: so I passe not for the unreasonable, and worse sort which gnaw upon all at tables, carp in conventions envy, back bite, slander, and detract. For I have learned of the Comicall Poet, that slander is the treasure of fooles which they carry in their tongues, and I know for certaintie that Envy is seated (I will say it although Envy stood at my elbow) in none but in degenerate, un-noble, and base minds. The honest good and noble natures as they detest envy, so they cannot envy. As for my selfe, and this worke, I doe most humbly submit it to the censure of the godly honest and learned with all respective reverence of whom if it be not approved, I hope in regard of my professed love to our native Country that it may be excused. Farwell.

Camden unto the learned did discover,
What Holland to the Whol-land doib recite;
Who can but read an English Author over,
May thereby reape much profit with delight,
Viewing the manners, lawes, & rites situation,
Of his owne native soile, explain d'so well;
With all can be desir'd of British Nation,
That now Great Britaine bath no Parrallell:
So richly deck'd, that her faire beauntious blaze,
By matchlesse Art of thine industrious spirit,
Adornes the World, like Phœbus golden waies.
Thou and thy workes æternall fame doe merite Anagr.

Thou Onli-homland-help in admiration,
Like that rare " Phoenix cause of this translation.

What Camden wrote for profit and delight,
Of British Isles, of blessings which have store;
In Latian language for each learned spire,
To reape such fruits as passe Peruvian ore
This Holland bath at suis of learned Dame,
With paines, transfus'd into our vulgar speech
His care of common good, deserves that fame,
Which unto late posteritie shall reach.
Wherefore all worthy wights which doe sake pleasure,
To know the stories of their Country sweet,
Ought kindly to accept this so great treasure;
And yield those thanks to th' Author which are meet.
I like his Pen and judgement eke no lesse,
For making choice of such a Patronesse.

THE PEN unspoil'd, though worne beyond a Pen,
The HAND unweari'd, though with toile oppress'd;
The HEAD diseas'd for ease of Englishmen, (Yet still hold out) in motion heere doe rest.
They rest in motion; restless rest is that;
Yet that's the rest thy Pen, thy Hand, thy Head Deere HOLLAND hath; which all (unwitt'g) translate
The greatest Volumes, greatest Braines have bred.
Life being so short as from the Birth to Beere
Is but a span; all times may well admire
How so much may be onely written here,
Where toile makes that short life more soone expire.
Had I an Angels tongue, or else a Pen
Made of his Pinion (might I judge of thee)
I should so speake and write that Gods and Men Should see a Miracle of thee through me.
For, NATURE workes but still to hold her state;
And for that worke alone neglecteth all:
But thy workes doe her power in thee abate,
For others good; that's supernaturall.
So thou art a Miracle of Men, for Men;
Yet if this Miracle be thought untrue
To thy good HEART, from thy Head, Hand, and Pen Give what is right, and then all is but due.
To count the Volumes most voluminous,
Which thou translated hast with care (past care)
And Art (past Art) were but superfluous:
For, all doe know them, see they famous are.
NATURES great Secretarie thou dost teach
To speake such English, as (though he be high In cloudy matter) English eies may reach,
His highest Pitch; that tries the Eagles eie.
The Roman most renown'd Historian
Trajans great MASTER: Moralls (boundlesse bookes)
Smooth Tranquill, and the rugged Ammian,
Thou mad'st as smooth to speake, as Venus looks.
And, for thy last, (but so it cannot be If life doe last, for still thou wilt be doing)
Here is a WORKE translated now by thee,
For which we long the Learned have beene wooing.
In this, through thee, wee see (as in a Glasse)
The wrinkled Face of grave ANTIQVITY:
Thy passing Amor here himselfe doth passe
O'er whom thou reign'st while he doth subject lie.
Camden, whose Fame nor Seas, nor Lands can bound (Yet they best know him furthest from our ken;
For, English least doe know his voices sound)
Is made more famous by thy famous Pen
For, now the English knowes his worthinesse:
His Countrymen now see him as he is:
Before, they at his vertue could but guesse;
And guesse by Arlesse Aimes, that often misse.
Yet, Man of Art, behold! for all this All How thou art subject (that deseru'st to raigne
In all mens loves) to hate of great and small,
That to be learn'd alone, take envious paine;
Who seek for Knowledge onely to be knowne:
(For, who know most, are knowne still most of all)
They deeme Wit, Folly; that to all is shewne;
And Goodnesse, Badnesse hold, if generall.

Who knows the voice of Envy, theirs doe know;
For, Envy speakes but onely by their tongues,
Who being a devill speakes (she cares not how)
By borrow'd Organs which to them belongs.
Alas poore Snakes! (hate Envious Instruments)
Poore in your Wit, and way-ward in your Will!
Yet little learne, so, hate the Ornaments
Of Arte in greater Wits of lesser skill.
Didye not doubt your owne defect of Wit
You would all Artes should sticke shorne to all;
And let the best Wit make best use of it,
For Wits renoune, and letters liberall.
Tea, you would wish the Babylonian towre
Were yet to build, while all one tongue impart;
That so, sole Wit might be Arts Governour,
Not tongues, that are the Essence of no Art.
But were yee good, and would all Good should know,
Who Envy this more learn'd, less-envious man,
You would the frankest praise on him bestow
That makes th' unlearn'd a learn'd Historian.
Shall English be so poore, and rudely-bast
As not be able (through meere penury)
To tell what French hath said with gallant grace,
And most tongues else of lesse facultie?
God shield it should; and Heav'n forefend that we Should so debase our owne deere mother-tongue,
That shewes our thoughts (how ever high they be)
With higher tearmas, and eloquence among,
Then, let me muzzie those so dogged mouths
That byte and hark at what they should defend:
„ They liee doe love, that hidden would have Trueth;
„ And he is Verimes foe that's Errors friend.
But, kind Philémon, let thine active Muse
Still mount above these base detraiting spirits:
Looke not so low as Snakes that men abuse,
And highest Fame shall crowne thy lowest merits.
Goe forward (mangle backward Envious crabs,
That still goe backe) thy paines give others pleasure:
They play proud Miriams part, thou Ionadabs;
They skant our learnings list, thou giv'st us measure.
This Camdens-Britaine, that on wings of Art Flies o're the World, knowne least where most it ought,
There thy free Pen to all doth it impart,
And mak'st them learn'd that almost are untaught.
For, Camden (whose all time out-wearing fame, Sith he the learned hath so often gladded)
Hath, by thy Pen, now multipl'd his Name:
For, now to Camdens Britaine, Holland's added
Then, pregnant HOLLAND, Britaine fertile make
With learnings compest; till the croppes of Art
Be ready for our neighbours Sithe, and Rake,
That have lesse skill, than will to take our part;
So shall this stile (when thou art stile or sand)
Call Camdens-Britaine, Hollands richest land.

The unfained honourer of thee and thine indeavours.

BRITAIN.

BRITAIN OR BRITANNIE, which also is ALBION, named in Greeke ΕΡΕΤΑΝΙΑ, ΕΡΕΤΑΝΙΚΗ, ΕΡΕΤΑΝΙΑ, ΑΛΒΙΟΝ, ΑΛΟΤΙΟΝ, the most famous Island, without comparison of the whole world; severed from the continent of Europe, by the interflowing of the Ocean, lieth against Germanie and France triangle-wise; by reason of three Promontories shooting out into divers parts: to wit, BELERIUM, i. the Cape of S. Burien in Cornwall, Westward; CANTIUM, i. the Fore-land of Kent, into the East; and TARVISIUM or ORCAS, i. the point of Carnesse in Scotland, Northward. On the West side, whereas Ireland is seated, VERGIVIVS, i. the Western Ocean, breaketh in; From the North, it hath the most vast and wide Hyperborean sea beating upon it; On the East, where it coasteth upon Germanie, enforced sore it is with the German sea; and Southward, as it lieth opposite to France, with the British. Disjoyned from those neighbour-countries all about by a convenient distance every way, fitted with commodious and open havens, for traffique with the universall world, and to the generall good, as it were, of mankind, thrusting it selfe forward with great desire from all parts into the sea. For betweene the said For-land of Kent and Calais in France it so advanceth it selfe, and the sea is so straighted, that some thinke the land there was pierced through, and received the seas into it, which before-time had beene excluded: For the maintenance of which their conceit, they alleage both Virgil in that verse of his,

See in Kent.

Et penitus toto divisos orbe Britannos:

And Britans people quite disjoyn'd from all the world besides.

Because Britaine, saith Servius Honoratus, was in times past joyned to the maine. And also Claudian, who in imitation of him wrote thus:

Nostra deducta Britannia mundo.

Britaine, a land, which severed is from this our [Roman] world.

Certes, that the outward face and fashion of this globe of Earth hath beene with the inundation of Noahs flood, as also by other causes altered; that some mountaines thereby increased in heighth, many places higher than others, settled low, and became even plaines and valleys; that waterie washes were dried up, and drie grounds turned to be standing waters; yea, and that certaine Islands have beene violently broken off from the firme land, carrieth some likelihood of truth. But whether the same be true indeed, or whether there were any Islands at all before the Deluge, it is not my purpose here to argue; neither take I pleasure, without good advisement, of Gods works to give my doome. That the providence of God hath ordained divers things to one and the same end, who knoweth not? and verily, that parcels of the earth dispersed here and there within the sea, serve no lesse to adorn the world, than lakes spread upon the earth and hilles raised aloft, aswell Divines as Philosophers have alwaies held.

Livius and Fabius Rusticus have likened the forme heereof unto a * long dish or * two edged axe, and so is it shapen indeed toward the South, as saith Tacitus, whereupon the same went of the whole. But Northward, that huge and enorne tract of ground running beyond unto the furthest point, groweth narrow and sharpe like a wedge, So large, and of such exceeding greatnesse in circuit, they in old time took it to bee, that Cæsar, hee who first of all the Romans discovered it, wrote, How he had found out another world; supposing the same so great, as that it seemed to containe within it the Ocean, and not to be compassed about therewith: and Iulius Solinus Polyhistor hath left in writing, that for the largenesse thereof it deserueth Well neere the name of a second world. Howbeit, this age of ours hath now at length by many and sundry voyages, found out in some sort the true dimension and iust compass of the whole Isle, For, from the point Tarvisum unto the cape Belerium, the reaches and crooked turnings of the sea-banks along the West considered, there are reckoned much about ccccxii miles: from thence, keeping the sea side, as it bendeth Southward untill you come to the Fore-land of Kent, ccccxx miles: whence coasting by the German sea, with crooked creeks and inlets for ccccxiii miles, it reacheth to the foresaid point Tarvisum: so that by this reckoning the whole Iland taketh in compass mdcccxvii miles. Which measure as it commeth farre short of Plinies, so is it also somewhat lesse than Cæsars. As for Schitinius Chius, I have no reason once to name him, who having in Apollonius among other wonders tolde us strange tales of fruits growing in Britaine without kernels, and of grapes without stone and seed, hath bounded it within the precinct of ccc stadia and no more. Much better yet hath Dionysius After in his Description of the world, reported of the British Ilands that is to say, Britaine and Ireland in this wise,

Tantum pulchritudine oblectant; hinc mænia Nævis circumstant spectant longæque

Now, for their greatnesse verily, exceeding large they are;
And seeke through Ilands all, none may with British Isles compare.
And together with him, Aristides and other Greeke writers accord, who by way of excellencie, have truly called Britaine for the greatnesse thereof Μεγάλη νῆσος, that is, The great Iland.

Now, they that have more curiously compared the spaces of heaven above, together with the tracts of earth beneath, place Britaine under the 8. Climate, and include it within the 18. and 26 Parallel. They thinke also the longest day there, to be 18. Equinoctiall houres and an halfe. But the Cape of Cornwall, respecting the convectie of the earth, they describe to be situate 16 degrees & 50 scruples from the furthest point West: the longitude likewise of the Fore-land in Kent, to be 21. degrees; as for the latitude, in the fourth-coast they measure it by 50 degrees, and that of Carnet Northward, by 59 & 40 scruples over. So that, according to this site, Britaine is seated aswell for aire as soile, in a right fruitfull and most milde place. The aire so kinde and temperate, that not only the Summers be not excessive hote, by reason of continuall gentle windes that abate their heat (which as they refresh the fruits of the earth, so they yeeld a most holosome and pleasing contentment both to man and beast) but the Winters also are passing milde: For, the raine falling often with still showers, (to say nothing of the aire it selfe somewhat thicke and grosse) dissolveth the rigour of the cold so; and withall the sea which compasseth it, with moderate warmth doth comfort the land in such wise, as that the cold with us is much more remiss than in some parts of France and Italie. Whereupon it is, that Minutius Felix, proving that God by his providence hath a speciall regard of the severall parts of the world as well as of the whole, saith, That Britaine though it want other whiles the aspect of the Sunne, yet refreshed it is with the warmth of the sea flowing round about it. Neither neede you to marvell at his speech, concerning the warmth of the sea. The seas, quoth Cicero, stirred to and fro with the winds, do so wax warme, that a man may easily perceive, within this world of Waters there is inclosed a certaine heat. To the temperatenesse also of this Iland Cæscenius Getulicus a very ancient Poet seemeth to have respect, when he verified thus of Britaine;

Non illic Aries verno ferit æra cornu, Gnosia nec Gemini præcedunt cornua Tauri, Sicca Lycæonius resupinus plaustro Bootes.

Cæsar likewise writeth thus: *The places in Britaine be more temperate (by reason that the weather is not so cold) than in France. Semblably Cornelius Tacitus; No extreme weather is of cold: and hee addeth moreover, and saith, The soile, setting aside the Olive, the Vine, and the rest, which are * proper to warmer countries, taketh all kind of graine, and beareth it in abundance: it ripeneth slowly, but commeth up quickly: the cause of both is one and the same, to wit, the overmuch moisture of ground and aire. For the aire, as Strabo writeth, is subject rather to showres of raine, than to snow. Howbeit, the ground enriched so with all sorts of corne, that Orpheus hath reported it to bee the very feat of Ladie Ceres: for, that which we read in his Poeme thus,*

Id' iuxta Olympi' æthere Aluq' æther,

—Lo, heere, the stately hauls
Of Ceres Queene.—

is meant of this our Iland: yea, and it hath bene the very barne, garner, and store-house of victuals of the West Empire; from whence the Romans were wont yearly to transport into Germanie, with a fleet of 800. vessels bigger than barges, great store of corne, for the maintenance of their armies, which there defended the Frontiers. But lest I should seeme to exceed over-much in the praise of my native country, heare in stead of me, that ancient Oratour, who with open mouth resoundeth out the commendations thereof, in this manner: O happy Britaine, and more fortunate than all other lands beside, which first sawest Constantine Emperour! for good cause hath nature endowed thee with all the blessed gifts of aire and soile; wherein there is neither excessive cold of Winter, nor extreme heat of Summer; wherein there is so great plenty of graine, that it serveth sufficiently both for bread and drink: wherein the Forrests are without savage beasts, and the ground void of noysome serpents. Contrariwise, an infinite multitude there is of tame cattell with udders strutting full of milke, and laden with fleeces: and verily, (that which for the use of our life we much esteemed) the daies there are very long, and the nights never want some light, whiles those utmost plaines by the sea side cast and raise no shadowes on high, and the aspect both of skie and starres passeth beyond the bound of the night, yea the very Sunne it selfe, which unto us seemeth for to set, appeareth there, onely to passe along and goe aside.

Hearken also, if it please you, to another Oratour speaking unto Constantius the father of Constantine the Great in this wise: And, I assure you, no small damage was it to the Common-weale, as to lose the bare name onely of BRITAINE, so to forgoe a land so plentiful in corne, so rich in pasturage, so full of mines and veins of metall, so gainefull in tributes and revenewes so accommodated with many havens, and for circuit, so large and spacious.

Moreover, the singular love and motherly affection of Nature to this Iland, a Poet of good antiquitie hath by way of a speech made unto Britaine lively expressed thus, in this Epigram, which some have judged not unworthy to be divulged.

*Tu nimio nec stricta gelu, nec fydere fervens, Clementi cælo temperique places,
Cum pareret Natura parens, varique favore Divideret dotes omnibus una locis,
Seposuit potiora tibi, matreque professa,
Insula sis felix, plenaque pacis, æis.
Quicquid amat luxus, quicquid desiderat usus,
Ex te proveniet, vel alimde tibi.*

For aire, so mild and temperate right pleasing is thy feat;
Where reigneth neither chilling cold, nor yet excessive heat.
What time Dame Nature brought things forth, and of her onely grace, Bestow'd her favours manifold and gifts on every place;

Fortunate Islands.

In his Commentaries upon Lyssiron.

This plentiful abundance, these goodly pleasures of Britain, have perswaded some that those fortunate Islands, wherein all things, as Poets write, do still flourish as in a perpetuall Spring tide, were sometime heere with us. For, this, doth one Isidore Tez-za a Greek Author of no small credit, affirme, and our ancestors seeme to have be- lieved the same as a certaine truth. For, what time as Pope Clement the sixth, as wee read in Robert of Avesburie, had elected Lewis of Spaine, to bee the Prince of those fortunate Islands, and for to aid and assist him, mustered souldiers in France and Italie, our countrymen were verily perswaded, That hee was chosen Prince of Britaine, and that all the said preparation was for Britaine, as one, saith he, of the fortunate Islands. Yea and even those most prudent personages themselves, our Legier Embassadors there, with the Pope, were so deeply settled in this opinion, that forthwith they with drew themselves from Rome, and hastned with all speed into England, there to certifie their countrey men and friends of the matter. Neither will any man now judge other- wise, who thoroughly knoweth the blessed estate and happie wealth of Britaine. For Nature tooke a pleasure in the framing thereof, and seemeth to have made it as a se- cond world, sequestred from the other, to delight mankind withall, yea and curiously depainted it of purpose, as it were a certaine portraict, to represent a singular beautie, and for the ornament of the universall world: with so gallant and glittering variety, with so pleasant a shew are the beholders eyes delighted, which way soever they glance. To say nothing of the Inhabitants, whose bodies are of an excellent good con- stitution, their demeanour right courteous, their natures as gentle, and their courage most hardie and valiant, whose manhood by exploits achieved both at home and a broad, is famously renowned thorow the whole world.

The first Inhabitants:
and reason of the Name.

But who were the most ancient and the very first Inhabitants of this Isle, as also, from whence this word Britan had the originall derivation, sundry opinions one after another have risen; and many we have seene, who being uncertaine in this point, have seemed to put downe the certaine resolution thereof. Neither can we hope to attaine unto any certaintie heerein, more than all other nations, which setting those aside that have their originall avouched unto them out of holy Scripture) as well as wee, touching their point, abide in great darkenesse, error and ignorance. And how, to speake truly, can it otherwise be? considering that the truth, after so many revoluti- ons of ages and times, could not chuse but be deeply hidden. For the first inhabitours of countreys had other cares and thoughts to busie and trouble their heads, than to deliver their beginnings unto posteritie. And say, they had been most willing so to do, yet possibly could they not, seeing their life was so uncivill, so rude, so full of warres, and therefore void of all literature; which keeping companie with a civill life, by peace and repose, is onely able to preserve the memorie of things, and to make over the same to the succeeding ages. Moreover the Druides, who being in the olde time the Priests of the Britans and Gaules, were supposed to have knowne all that was past, & the Bards, that used to resound in song all valours and noble acts, thought it not law- full to write and booke any thing. But admit they had recorded ought; in so long continuance of time, in so many and so great turnings and overturnings of States, doubtlesse the same had bene utterly lost, seeing that the very stones, pyramids, obe- lisks, and other memorable monuments, thought to be more durable than brasse, have yeilded long agoe to the iniquitie of time. Howbeit, in the ages soone after follow- ing, there wanted not such as desired gladly to supplie these defects; and when they could not declare the truth indeed, yet at least way for delectation, they laboured to bring forth narrations, devised of purpose, with certaine pleasant varietie to give contentment, and delivered their severall opinions, each one after his owne conceit and capacitie, touching the originall of Nations and their names. Unto which, as there were many, who neglecting further search into the truth, quickly yeilded con- venance;

nivance; so, the most fort delighted with the sweetnesse of the Deviser, as readily gave credence.

But, to let passe all the rest, one Geoffrey Ap Arthur, of Monmouth among us (whom I would not pronounce in this behalfe liable to this suspicion) in the raigne of K. Henrie the Second, published an Historie of Britaine, and that out of the British tongue, as hee saith himselfe: wherein he writeth, That Brutus a Trojane borne, the sonne of Silvius, nephew of Ascanius, and in a third degree nephew to that great Aeneas descended from supream Jupiter, (for the goddesse Venus bare him) whose birth cost his mother her life, and who by chance slew his owne father in hunting, (a thing that the wise Magi had foretold) fled his country and went into Greece; where he delivered out of thraldome the progenie of Helenus K. Priamus sonne, vanquish- ed King Pandrusus, wedded his daughter, and accompanied with a remnant of Tro- jans, fell upon the Island Leogeria: where by the Oracle of Diana, he was adviced to goe into this Western Isle. From thence through the Streights of Gebraltar, where he escaped the Mer-maydes, and afterward through the Tuscan sea, hee came as farre as to * Aquitaine, in a pight battell defeated Golfarius the Pict, King of Aqui- taine, together with twelve Princes of Gaul; and after he had built the citie * Tours (as witnesseth Homer) and made spoile of Gaule, passed over sea into this Island inhabited of Giants, whom when he had conquered, together with Gogmagog the hugest of them all, according to his owne name he called it Britaine, in the yeare of the world 2855: before the first Olympiad 334. yeares; and before the nativite of Christ 1108. Thus saith Geoffrey [of Monmouth]. Yet others there bee, that fetch the name of Britaine from some other causes. Sir Thomas Eliot, by degree a wor- shipfull Knight, and a man of singular learning, draweth it from the Greeke foun- taine, to wit, πρωτηνια, a teame that the Athenians gave to their publike Finances or Revenues. Humfrey Lhuyd, reputed by our countrymen, for knowledge of Antiqui- tie, to carrie after a fort, with him all the credit and authoritie, referreth it confidently to the British word PRID-CAIN, that is to say, a pure white forme. Pomponius Latius reporteth, that the Britons out of Armorica in France, gave it that name. Goropius Becanus saith, that the Danes fought heere to plant themselves, and so named it BRIDANIA, that is, Free Dania. Others derive it from PRUTENIA, a region in Ger- manie. Bodine supposeth, that it tooke the name of BRETTA the Spanish word, which signifieth Earth: and Forcatulus, of BRITHIN, which, as wee read in Athe- nus, the Greeks used for drinke. Others bring it from the BRUTII in Italy, whom the Gracians called brutii. As for those smatterers in Grammar, who keepe a bab- bling and prating that Britaine should carry that name, of British manners, let them be packing.

These are all the opinions (to my knowledge) that have bene received touching the name of Britaine. But heerein, as wee cannot but smile at the fictions of strag- gers, so the devices coined by our owne countrymen passe not currant with generall allowance. And verily, in these and such like cases, an easier matter it is to impeach the false, than to teach and maintaine a truth. For besides this, that it were an absur- ditie to seeke the reason of this name in a forrein language, the generall consent of all Historiographers of better note, doth confute Lælius; who with one accord deliver unto us, that those Armorica Britons departed hence, and so from us carried the name with them. Againe, Britaine flourished under this name many hundred yeares before the names of Dania and Prutenia came up. But what doth the word Britan- nia to doe with the Spaniards Bretta? which I doubt, whether it be Spanish or no: and why should this Island be so termed, rather than other Land? That the drinke called Brithin was ever in use among our countrymen, can hardly be proved: and to give name to our nation of the Greekes drinke, were ridiculous. As for those Brutii in Italy, whom as Strabo witnesseth, the Lucans called brutii, as one would say, traiterous fugitives; it can never be proved, that they like runnagates ranne hither into Britaine. But to come now to our owne countreymens conjectures. Eliots brutii seemeth not probable; seeing that word was proper to the Athenians; and confi- dering dering the Greeks called this Isle Hyperborea, not Hyperborea, Lhuys Prid-Cain for the Britans, seemeth not onely too farre fetched, but also over-hardly strained: to say nothing how that word, Cain, came from the Latines Candidum, and so crept into the provincial language of the Britaines.

But as touching those reports of Brutus; were they true, certaine, and undoubted, there is no cause why any man should bestow farther study and labor in searching out the beginning of the Britaines: The thing is dispatched to our hand, and the searchers of Antiquitie are eased of their troublesome and painfull travell. For mine owne part, it is not my intent, I assure you, to discredit and confute that story which goes of him, for the upholding whereof, (I call Truth to record) I have from time to time streined to the heighth, all that little wit of mine. For that were, to strive with the streame and currant of time; and to struggle against an opinion commonly and long since received. How then may I, a man of so meane parts, and small reckoning, be so bold, as to sit in examination of a matter so important, and thereof definitively to determine? Well, I referre the matter full and whole to the Senate of Antiquarians, for to be decided. Let every man, for me, judge as it pleaseth him; and of what opinion soever the Reader shall be of, verily I will not make it a point much material.

And yet I see (that I may tell you so much aforehand, beeing as I am a plaine honest and diligent searcher after the truth) how men most judicious and passing well learned, goe about divers waies to extenuate the credit of this narration; and so often as I stand in defence thereof, to come upon me fiercely with these and such like arguments. First, grounding their reason upon the time, they protest and say, that all is but fabulous (with reservation onely of the Sacred Historie) whatsoever is reported to have beene done before the first Olympias, to wit, the year 770. before the birth of Christ: like as these reports of Brutus, which are before the said time 300. yeares and more. And this they averre by the authoritie of Varro, the most learned writer of all the Romans: who as he named the first age immediately after mans creation unto the Deluge, Abrah, that is, uncertaine, by reason of the ignorance thereof, so he termed the second, even from the said Deluge unto the first Olympias, Musius, that is to say, Fabulous: because in that time there is related nothing else (for the most part) but tales, even among the Greekes and Latines, learned nations; much more then among the Barbarous and unlettered, such as in those daies they were in all this tract, every one. Then they alleage, that for the confirmation of this matter in question, the authoritie of sufficient writers, (which to the knowledge of things past maketh most, and is all in all) is altogether defective. Now, those they call sufficient writers, whose antiquitie and learning the greater it is, so is their credit the better accepted, who all of them, like as the ancient Britaines themselves (by their saying) knew not so much as the name of Brutus. Cæsar, say they, sixteene hundred yeares since, as he testifieth of himselfe, *By all the enquire that he could make, found no more but this, that the inland part of Britaine was inhabited by those, who, said they, were borne in the very Island; and the maritime coasts by such as from out of * Belgium passed over thither.* Tacitus also, a thousand and foure hundred yeares agoe, who searched diligently into these particulars, wrote thus, What manner of men the first inhabitants of Britain were, borne in the land or brought in, as among barbarous people it is not certainly knowne. Gildas, being himselfe a wise and learned Britaine, who lived a thousand yeares since, hath not one word of this Brutus, and doubteth whether the old Britaines had any records or writings, whereby they might convey unto posteritie, their own beginning and Historie; professing that he wrote, by the relation which hee had from beyond sea, and not by any direction out of the writings of his owne country, or any records left by writers: which if there were ever any at all, either the enemies had burnt them, or else they were carried away farre off in some fleet of exiled persons, and so not extant. Ninius also, discipule of Eluodugus, taking in hand to write a Chronicle, eight hundred yeares agoe, complaineth that the great Masters and Doctors of Britaine, had no skill, and left no memoriall in writing: confessing, that himselfe gathered whatsoever hee wrote out of the Annals and Chronicles of the holy Fathers. To these they adjoyne Beda,

Conferimus.

The Fabulous Time or Age.

At this day called Netherlands, or Low countries of Germany.

He flourished in the year 1440.

William of Malmesburie, and as many as wrote eleven hundred and threescore yeares since, who seeme not once to have heard of Brutus his name; so silent are they of him in all their owne writings.

Henceupon they have noted, that the name of that Brutus was never heard of in the world, before that in a barbarous age, and amid the thickest clouds of ignorance, one Hunibald a bald writer, fabled and feined, That Francio a Trojan, King Priams sonne, was the founder of the French Nation. Hence they collect, that when our country-men heard once how the French-men their neighbours drew their line from the Trojanes, they thought it a foule dishonour, that those should outgoe them in nobilitie of Stocke, whom they matched every way in manhood and proesse. Therefore, that Geffrey Ap Arthur of Monmouth, foure hundred yeares agoe, was the first, as they thinke, that to gratifie our Britans produced unto them this Brutus, descended from the gods, by birth also a Trojan, to bee the author of the British Nation. And before that time verily not one man, as they say, made any mention at all of the said Brutus.

They adde thus much moreover, that about the same time, the Scottish writers falsely devised Scota the Egyptian Pharaos daughter to bee the Foundresse of their nation. Then also it was, that some mispending their wit and time, yea and offering violent abuse unto the truth, forged out of their owne braines, for the Irish, their Hiberus; for the Danes, their Danuis; for the Brabanders, their Brabo; for the Goths, their Gothus; and for the Saxons, their Saxa; as it were the Stock-fathers of the said nations. But seeing that in this our age, which hath escaped out of those darke mists of fallall ignorance, the French have renounced their Francio as a counterfeit Progenitor: (Whereas the Frenchmen, quoth Turnibus a right learned man, stand highly upon their descent from the Trojanes, they doe it in emulation of the Romans, whom they seeing to beare themselves proud of that Pedigree and noble stocke, would needs take unto themselves also the like reputation.) And for that the Scots, such as be of the wiser sort, have cast off their Scota; and truth it selfe hath chased away Hiberus, Danuis, Brabo, and the rest of these counterfeit Demi-gods, and Worthies of the same stampe: Why the Britans should so much stick to their Brutus, as the name-giver of their Island, and to the Trojan original, they greatly wonder: as who would say, before the destruction of Troy, (which happened in the thousand yeare or there about after Noahs flood) there had beene no Britaines heere: and as if there had not lived many valorous men before Agamemnon.

Furthermore, they avouch, that very many out of the grave Senate of great Clerks, by name, Boccace, Vives, Hadr. Junius. Polydore, Buchanan, Vigneier, Genebrard, Molinæus, Bodine, and other men of deepe judgement, agree joyntly in one verdict, and denie, that ever there was any such in the world as this Brutus: also, that learned men of our owne country, as many, acknowledge him not, but reject him as a meere counterfet. Among whom, they produce, first John of Weathamsted, Abbat of S. Albanes, a most judicious man; who in his Granarie wrote of this point long since in this manner: According to other histories, which in the judgement of some are of more credit, the whole Discourse of this Brutus is rather Poeticall than historicall, and, for divers reasons, built upon opinion more than truth indeede. First, because their is no where mention made in the Roman stories, either of killing the father, or of the said birth, or yet of putting away the sonne. Secondly, for that, after sundry authors, Ascanius begat no such sonne who had for his proper name Sylvius: for, according unto them, he begat but one onely sonne, and that was Iulus, from whom the house of Iulii afterwards tooke their beginning &c. And thirdly, Sylvius Posthumus, whom perhaps Geffrey meaneth, was the sonne of Aeneas by his wife Lavinia; and hee begetting his sonne Aeneas in the eight and thirtieeth yeare of his reigne, ended the course of his life by naturall death. The Kingdome therefore, now called England, was not heerebefore, as many will have it, named Britaine of Brutus the sonne of Sylvius. Wherefore, it is in their opinion a vaine peece of worke, and ridiculous enough, to challenge noble blood, and yet to want a probable ground of their challenge. For it is not manhood only, that ennobleth a nation; the mind it is also with with perfect understanding, and nothing else, that gaineth gentilitie to a man. And therefore Seneca writeth thus, in his * Epistles out of Plato, That there is no King but hee came from slaves, and no slave but hee descended of Kings. Wherefore, to conclude, let this suffice the Britaines from the beginning of their Nobilitie, that they bee courageous and valiant in fight, that they subdue their enemies on every side, and that they utterly refuse the yoke of servitude.

In a second rancke they place William of Newborough a writer of much greater authority, who too too sharply charged Geoffrey the Compiler of the British history, for his untruth, so soone as ever it came forth, in these words: A certaine writer quoth he, in these our daies hath risen up, who deviseth foolish fictions and tales of the Britaines, and in a vaine humour of his owne, extollet them farre above the valourous Macedonians and Romans both: he hath to name Geoffrey, and is surnamed Arthurius, for that the tales of Arthure taken out of the Britaines old fables, and augmented by inventions of his owne, with a new colour of Latine speech laid over them, hee hath invested into the goodly title of a Historie, who also hath adventured farther, and divulged under the name of authentike propheties, grounded upon an undoubted truth, the deceitfull conjectures and foredeemings of one Merlin, whereunto hee added verily a great deale of his owne, whiles hee did the same into Latine. And a little after: Moreover, in his booke which he entitleth, The Britains Historie; how malapertly and shamelesly hee doth in manner nothing but lie, there is no man that readeth the said booke can doubt, unlesse hee have no knowledge at all of ancient histories. For, hee that hath not learned the truth of things indeede, admitteth without discretion and judgement the vanitie of fables. I forbear to speake, what great matter this fellow hath forged of the Britains acts, before the Empire, and comming in of Julius Caesar, or else being by others invented, hath put them downe as authentike. In somuch, as Giraldus Cambrensis, who both lived and wrote at the same time, made no doubt to terme it, The fabulous story of Geoffrey. Others there bee, who in this narration of Brutus, laugh at the foolish Topographic set downe by this Geoffrey; as also how falsly hee hath produced Homer as a witnesse: yea, and they would perswade us, that it is wholly patched up of untunable discords and jarring absurdities. They note besides, that his writings, together with his Merlins propheties, are (among other books prohibited) forbidden by the church of Rome to be published. Some againe doe observe thus much, how these that most of all admire Brutus, are very doubtfull and waver to and fro about their Brutus. He, say they, that taketh upon him the name and person of Gildas, and annexeth certaine briefe glosses to Ninius, deviseth first, that this Brutus was a Consul of Rome; then, that hee was the sonne of Silvius, and lastly, of one Hesticio. And there wanteth not (as I have heard say) a certaine Count-Palatine, who would needs have our Brutus to be called Brotus, because, forsooth, in his birth he was the cause of his mothers death, as if ^{berk} founded so much in Greeke. In the judgement of others, they should have left the Originall of Britaines as probable, if they had fathered their progenie, either upon Brito the Centaure, whom Hingius mentioneth; or that Bretanus, of whose daughter Celice, Parthenius Nicaeus a very ancient authour, writeth that Hercules begat Celtus, the father of the Celtæ, and from whom Hesychius deriveth the word Britaine.

As for these observations and judgements of other men, which I have recited, I beseech you, let no man commence action against mee, a plaine meaning man, and an ingenuous student of the truth, as though I impeached that narration of Brutus; forasmuch as it hath been alwaies (I hope) lawfull for every man in such like matters, both to thinke what he will, and also to relate what others have thought. For mine owne part, let Brutus be taken for the father, and founder of the British nation; I will not be of a contrary mind. Let the Britaines resolve still of their originall, to have proceeded from the Trojans (into which stocke, as I will hereafter prove, they may truly ingrasse themselves) I will not gainstand it. I wot full well, that Nations in old time for their originall, had recourse unto Hercules, & in later ages, to the Trojans. Let Antiquitie herein be pardoned, if by entermingling falsities and truthe, humane matters and divine together, it make the first beginnings of nations and cities cities more noble, sacred, and of greater majestic: seeing that, as Plinie writeth, Even falsly to claime and challenge descents from famous personages, implieth in some sort a love of virtue. As for my selfe, I willingly acknowledge with Varro, the best learned of all Romans, such originals as these, fetched from the gods, to be profitable; that valourous men may believe, although untruly, that they are descended from the gods, and thereby the mind of man assuredly perswaded of some divine race, may presume to enterprize great matters more boldly, at the same more resolutely, and upon the very securitie thereof, performe all more happily. By which words nevertheless, S. Augustine gathereth, that the said most learned Varro confesseth (although not stoutly nor confidently, yet covertly) that these opinions are altogether truthlesse.

Forasmuch then, as all writers are not of one and the same mind, as touching the very name and the first inhabitants of Britaine, and I feare me greatly, that no man is able to fetch out the truth, so deeply plunged within the winding revolutions of so many ages, let the Reader of his candor and humanitie, pardon mee also among others, if modestly and without the prejudice of any man, I likewise interpose my conjecture; not upon any mind I have contentiously to wrangle, (be that farre from mee) but in my desire to search out the truth; which hath wholly possessed me and brought to this point, that in the question now in hand, I had rather aske forgiveness for my fault (if there be any) than commit no fault at all. Howbeit, to the end that the reason of this name, may if it be possible, more easily and with better success appeare, I will endeavour first (as I may) to find out the most ancient Inhabitours of the Island, albeit they lie so hidden in the utmost nooke and secretest closter of Antiquitie, as it were in a most thicke wood, where no pathwaies are to be seene, that very small hope there is or none at all, to fetch those things backe againe with all my diligence, which oblivion hath so long removed out of the sight of our ancestours.

But to seeke for this matter farther off, and to omit Caesar, with Diodorus and others, who would have the Britains to be * borne of themselves in the very land and meere * Aborigines; that is, Homelings and not forrein brought in: who also imagined, that men in the beginning sprang out of the earth, like unto mushrooms and root-stooles: we are taught out of the sacred Historie penned by Moses, that after the Deluge, Sem, Cham, and Japhet, the three sonnes of Noe, having multiplied their issue in great number, departed asunder from the mountaines of Armenia, where the Arke had rested, into divers parts and quarters of the earth, and so, propagated the nations throughout the wide world. That some of their posteritie came to this Isle after the families were by little and little spread and dispersed abroad, both reason it selfe, and also the authoritie of Theophilus Antiochenus, doe joyntly prove. When as, saith hee, in old time, there were few men in Arabia and Chaldaea, after the division of tongues they increased and multiplied more and more. Heereupon some departed toward the East, some gat them to the spacious and open main-land: others went forward into the North, seeking there to seat themselves: neither gave they over, to possesse ground every where, untill they came as farre as to Britaine, situate in the Northerne Climates. And Moses himselfe expressly sheweth the same, writing, that the Islands of the Gentiles were by the posteritie of Japhet divided in their Regions. The Islands of * Gentiles the Divines call those, which lie farthest off: and Wolfgangus Musculus a Theologer, not of the lowest ranke, thinketh that the nations and families which came from Japhet first inhabited the Isles of Europe, such as (saith he) be England, Sicillie, &c. Now, that Europe fell unto Japhet and his progenie, not Divines onely, but Josephus also and others have recorded. For Isidorus, out of an ancient writer citeth this, The nations descended of Japhet, possesse from the Mountaine Taurus Northward, the one halfe of Asia, and all Europe so farre as to the British Ocean, leaving names both to places and people both: Of which very many afterward became changed, the rest remaine as they were. And we have seene that blessing of Noe, [God enlarge Japhet, and let him dwell in the Tents of Sem, and let Chanaan be his servants] fulfilled in the people of Europe. For, Europe, which, as Plinie saith, bred bred up a people conquerour of all nations, hath triumphed more than once over those other parts of the world which fell unto Sem and Cham: and in this part had the off-spring of Japhet spred it selfe farre and wide. For of his sonnes, Magog begg the Massagets, Javan the Iones, Thubal the Spaniards, and Mesech the Moschovites. But Gomer his eldest sonne, in these farthest and remotest borders of Europe, gave both beginning and name to the Gomerians, which were after called Cimbrians and Cimerians. For, the name of Cimbrians or Cimerians filled in some fort this part of the world: and not onely in Germanie, but also in Gaul spred exceeding much. They which now are the Gauls, were, as Josephus and Zonaras write, called of Gomer, Gomari, Gomerai and Gomerita. From these Gomerians or Gomerians of Gaul, I have alwaies thought that our Britaines drew their beginning, and from thence, for a proove of the said beginning, brought their name: the very proper and peculiar name also of the * Britains, hath perswaded mee thereunto. For even they call themselves ordinarily Kumero, Cymro and Kumeri: like as a * British woman Kumeras, and the tongue it selfe, Kumeras. Neither acknowledge they any other names: although some there be not of the greatest skill, who from hence have coined in the former age, these words, Cambri and Cambria. Yea, and that Gomerian whom Virgil in his Catalects so taunteth and termeth the Britaine Thucydides, Quintilian saith was a Cimbrian. And whence, trow yee, should wee thinke these names proceed, but from that Gomer, and the Gomerians in Gaul next adjoining: which was the seat of the old Gomerians. That the Germans came of Aschenaz, the Turks from Togorma, sonnes of Gomer, the learned doe verily thinke, because the Jewes even at this day call these, Togormah: like as the former, Aschenas. That the Thracians Iones, Riphæans and Moschi, &c. are the posteritie of Thirax, Javan, Riphaz and Moschus, no man denieth; for that the names sound not unlike: Semblably, that the Ethiopians were the seed of Chus, and the Egyptians of Misraim, because they carry the same names in their owne languages, no man there is but granteth. Why should not we then confesse, that our Britaines or Cumerians, are the very posteritie of Gomer, and of Gomer tooke their denomination: For, the name accordeth passing well: and granted it is, that they planted themselves in the utmost borders of Europe: Which thing also, the very name of Gomer, imposed first not upon some light occasion, but even by Divine providence and inspiration, doth signifie: For Gomer in the Hebrew tongue, betokeneth bordering. Neither let any man by way of reproch, object unto our Cumeri or Cimbri, what Sext. Pompeius hath written, That thieves in the French tongue are called Cimbri. For, albeit the Cimbri (among whom it is likely that our Cumeri were) living in that courageous and bold age of the world, wherein martiall proesse flourished, wandering (as Possidonius writeth), from these marches of Europe, warded by way of robbetrie, as farre as to the lake Mæotis; yet for all that, the word Cimbri no more signifieth a thiefe, than Aegyptius, one that is superstitious, or Chaldeus, an Astrologer, and Sybarita, a delicate dainty-mouthe. But because those nations were so given, therefore they that are such beare their names. And in this point agreeth right with mee, that singular ornament of learning Joseph Scaliger. Neither let any man marvell, wherefore I call not Berosus heere to take my part, out of whom writers in these daies furnish themselves with so great meanes. Certes, to speake my mind at once, the edge of that Berosus his authoritie, who commonly goeth under that name, is in my account so Blunt and dull, that I together with the best learned of our age, as namely Volaterran, Vives, Antonius Augustinus, Melchior Canus, and especially Gaspar Varrerius, thinke it to be nothing else, but a ridiculous figment of some craftie foister and jugling deceiver; which Varrerius in his Censuræ of Berosus Printed at Rome, is soone able to remove out of the Readers minds that error of theirs so deeply settled, concerning this writer.

This is mine opinion and conjecture rather of the Britains originall: For in things of so great Antiquitie, a man may more easily proceede by guesse, than upon grounded reason pronounce sentence either way. And verily this their beginning from Gomer and out of * Gaule seemeth more substantiall, ancient and true, than that from Brutus and Troy. Nay, that this foundeth rather to a truth, and that our Britaines are the very off-spring of the Gaulois, me thinkes I am able to prove, by the name, scite, religion, manners, and language: by all which the most ancient Gauls and Britaines have beene, as it were, in some mutuall societie linked together. And that I may this doe, let me, I pray you, with favourable good leave range abroad for a while at my pleasure.

As touching the name, because I have spoken thereof before, thus much onely will I repeate, that as the ancient Gauls are called Gomeræans, Gomeritæ, Gomeri, and by contraction Cimbri: so likewise our Britaines be named Cumeri and Kimbri. Now that the Gauls were called Gomeri, Josephus and Zonaras (as I said) doe joyntly prove. That they were named also Cimbri, may be gathered out of Cicero and Appian. Those Barbarians whom Marius defeated, Cicero plainly termeth Gauls. C. Marius, quoth he, repressed the armies of the Gauls, entering in great numbers into Italy. But all Historiographers witnesse, that they were Cimbrians: and the Habergeon of their King Beleus, digged up at * Aquæ Sextiæ, where Marius put them to flight, hath shewed the same: For engraven it was with strange letters thus, ΒΙΒΡΟΣ CΙΜΒΡΟΣ. Likewise, that they who under the conduct of Brennus spoiled * Delphi in Greece were Gauls, all writers with one voice and mind agree: and yet, that these were named Cimbri, Appian in his Illyricks doth testifie: The Celts or Gauls, quoth he, whom they call Cimbrians. And heere will I neither cite the testimonie of Lucane, who calleth the hacketer, that was hired and sent to kill Marius, a Cimbrian, whom Livie and others affirme to have beene a Gaule; nor allége Plutarch, who nameth the Cimbrians, Gallo-scythians, ne yet Reinerius Reineccius an excellent Historian, who constantly averreth out of Plutarch in his Sertorius, that the Gauls and Cimbrians used the same language. Neither will I urge and streine to my purpose that onely word of the Cimbrians which remaineth among authors; and is produced by Plinie out of Philemon, to wit, Morimarusa. i. the dead Sea, although it be mere British: For Mor with the * Britans signifieth Sea, and Marw, dead.

Seeing therefore, that these people agreed in the most ancient name, from whence passed the said name into this Isle, but even with the first Inhabitants, out of Gaule, lying so neere, and by a very small streight of sea severed from it: For the world was not altogether and at once inhabited; but grant wee must, that the countries neerer adjoining unto the mountaines of Armenia, (where the Arke rested after the flood, and from whence mankind was encreased) were peopled before others; and namely Asia the lesse, and Greece before Italy, Italy before Gaule, and Gaule before Britaine. The consideration whereof is most delectable, in that the highest Creator, had joynd regions, and withall dispersed the Islands so, as their is no such great distance betweene any of them, but that even those which lie farthest off, may from some one neere adjoining, be seen and plainly as it were discerned by the eie. And for no other purpose was this done; but that the nations when they should over-abound, might discover and describe some places to passe unto and disburthen themselves; so long, untill the universall world were to the glory of the Creator replenished with Inhabitants every where. Wee ought therefore to be perswaded, that the ancient Gomerians of Gaule (now France) either chased away by the pursuit of others, or cast out for lessening of the multitude, or else inflamed with a desire to travell and see farre countries, (a thing naturally inbred in men) crossed the sea and came over first into this Isle, which from the continent they were able to kenne. And it stands to verie good reason also, that every countie received the first Inhabitants from places neere bordering, rather than from such as were most disjoyned. For, who would not thinke, that Cyprus had the first Inhabitants out of Asia next unto it, * Crete and Sicilie out of Greece neereby, and Corsica out of Italy a neighbour countie: and, not to goe farre, Zeland out of Germanie the neereft unto it, as also Island out of Norway, rather than from the remote tracts of Tartarie and * Mauritania? In like manner, why should not wee thinke that our Britaine was inhabited at first by the Gauls their neighbours, rather than either by the Trojans or Italians, the Albi and Brutians, so farre distant and remooove: Neither doe writers fetch the origin and infancie (as it were) of the Britaines from any other place, than their neighbour country Gaul. The inner parts of Britaine, saith Cæsar, is inhabited of them; who themselves report out of their records to have bene borne in the Island: the Sea coasts those, who upon purpose to make warre had passed thither out of * Belgium in Gauls, all in manner carie the names of those cities and States out of which they came thither, after they had married, there remained. For there were in Britaine like as also in Gaul people named Belgæ, Atrebatii, Parisi, Cenomanni, &c. Semblably Tacitus, Gallia rally, quoth he, if a man consider all circumstances, it is most likely that the Gauls bene neighbours, peopled the land of Britaine next unto them. Yea and Beda, one that among all our writers favoureth the truth, At the first, saith hee, this Island had the Britaines onely to inhabit it (from whom also it tooke the name) who, by report, having sailed out from the tract of Armorica into Britaine, challenged unto themselves the same coasts thereof. Now, he calleth the tract of Armorica, the sea coasts of * Gaul, opposite unto our Island. This also seemeth to make for our purpose, that Cæsar reported How Divitiacus the Gauls even in his remembrance, held a good part both of Gaul and also of Britannie under his government; as also, (that which is of greatest moment) Plinie among the maritime people, just over against Britaine, neere unto the County of Bullen, reckoned the * Britaines: like as Dionysius after a more ancient writer than he, in these verses,

Τῆς οὖν τοῦτον μὲν ἰσθμὸν ἔχοντες ἡμεῖς
 ἄλλοις ἐν δὲ τῇ οὐρανῷ ἵστανται ἱερῶν Μελὸς ἢ ἡμεῖς ποιεῖμεν τὰς ἀρχαίας ὁμοῖα τὰς ἀρχαίας τῶν ἑλλήνων, ὅτι ἄνθρωποι τῶν ἀρχαίων ἀπὸ τῆς οὐρανῷ ἡμεῖς ποιεῖμεν τὰς ἀρχαίας ὁμοῖα τὰς ἀρχαίας

Word for word thus:

And verily, that utmost point and angle of this * part, Inhabite the Iberians, people of haughtie heart: Neere Gebraltar, at Hercules his pillars cal'd of old, Turning up the maine in length, what way the current cold Of Northern Ocean with strong tides doth interflow and swell, Where Britaines, and those faire white folke, the martiall Germans dwell.

For these words [where Britaines] seeme to have respect unto those other, [Turning upon the maine in length] and Eustathius, who did set forth his Commentaries upon this author, understandeth it of the Britons in Gauls, in these words, τὰς δὲ Βριτανίας οὐρανῶν ἀπὸ τῆς οὐρανῷ ἡμεῖς ποιεῖμεν τὰς ἀρχαίας ὁμοῖα τὰς ἀρχαίας, that is, And of these Britons, the Isles of Britaine over against them tooke their denomination. Howbeit, Avienus and Stephen in his booke of Cities, are of a contrarie mind. Moreover the same Religion was of both people observed; Among the Britaines, saith Tacitus, there is to bee scene in their ceremonies and superstitious persuasions an apparant conformitie with the Gauls. The Gauls, quoth Solinus, after a detestable manner of sacred rites, not to the honor but rather to the injurie of religion, offered mans flesh in their sacrifices. That the Britaines did the very same, Dio Cassius beside others reporteth in his Nero. Both Nations also had their Druidæ, as Cæsar and Tacitus very sufficient writers doe witnesse. Concerning which Druidæ, let not the Reader thinke much to run over this whole passage out of Cæsar. The Druidæ are present at all Divine service. The overseers they be of publike and private sacrifices, the interpreters also of their religious rites and ceremonies. To these a great number of younge men doe flocke for to bee taught, and those doe they highly esteeme and honour. For lightly they decide and determine all controversies, as well publike as private: And in case any hainous fact bee committed, if there bee a murther or man-slaughter, if variance arise about inheritance, if strife about the bounds of lands, they in their discretion judge of the matter; they appoint rewards, they award penalties, and punishments, If any either private person, or body politike stand not to their Decree, they put them by all sacrifices, as excommunicate. em is the most grievous punishment. They that be thus interdicted, are reckoned as godlesse and most wicked persons: All men decline from them, they avoid both meeting and talking with them for feare of taking harme by contagion from them. Neither have they the benefit of Law though they request it, nor be capable of any office, though they sue for it. Moreover, all these Druides there is one President, who hath the greatest authoritie among them. When he is dead, looke who excelleth the rest in worth and dignitie, he succedeth him: But if there be many of equall estimation, chosen there is one by the voices of the Druides. Sometimes so they fall together by the eares, and take armes about this place of precedencie. These Druides at one certaine time of the yeare hold a solemne Session within a consecrated place, in the marches of the * Carnutes, a countrey held to be the middle of all France. Hither resort unto the terme from all parts, as many as have any controversies or suits in law: and to their judgements and decrees they yield obedience. Their learning and profession is thought to have bene first found and devised in Britaine, and so from thence translated into France: and now also in these daies they that desire more exact knowledge thereof, goe thither for the most part, to be instructed therein. The Druides are wont to bee freed from warfare: neither with the rest pay they tribute. Immunitie they have in exemption, as from war-service, so from all other charges whatsoever. Thus, many there bee who being excited with so great rewards, and of their owne accord meete together at Schoole for to learne, and are thither brought by their kinsfolke, friends and parents. There by report, they learne by rote a great number of verses. And so they continue still schollars for certaine yeares together; neither doe they thinke it lawfull to commit what they learne to writing; whereas otherwise in every thing almost, in publike also and private dealings, they use Greeke letters. This order they have taken, I suppose, for two reasons: because they would not have their doctrine divulged, nor their scholars by trusting to their written bookes, to neglect their owne memorie: a thing inconvenient lightly to most schollars; who presuming upon the helpe of writings, use lesse diligence in learning without booke, and as little in exercising their memorie. This one point principally they are desirous to perswade their scholars, That our soules are immortall, and after death passe out of one man into another; and by this meanes they suppose men, setting behind them all feare of death, are most of all stirred up unto vertue. Furthermore, concerning the starres and their motion, touching the greatnesse of heaven and earth, of the Nature of things, of the power and might of the immortall Gods, much dispute they make, and as many precepts they give to youth. Whereupon Lucan in this wise speaketh unto them:

Et vos barbaricos ritus, morèmq; sinistram

Than middle point twixt future life and that which went before.
Certes those Northerne people are right happie; whom we see Perfwaded of such vaine conceits, wherein they nuzzled be.
No feare of death which men most dread, can once their stomacks dant,
This maketh them so resolute, so bold and valiant:

An Oke also in the British or Welch tongue is called Druw.

By what name soever these were knowne to their Celts or Britaines, it may seeme this name of Druides came from a Greeke primitive head, to wit, Druides, that is, an Oke, for that they held nothing more sacred than the Mistletoe of the Oke; whereof Ovid writeth thus:

Adviscum Druidæ, Druidæ, cantare solebant.

To Mistletoe goe Druidæ, goe Druidæ, they did sing.

Lib. 16. cap. 4.

as who commonly dwelt within Oke-groves, and celebrated no sacrifice and did service without the branches and leaves thereof. But this, will Plinie more amply clare in these words of his: The Druidæ (for so they call their Diviners, Wiser men estate of Clergie) esteeme nothing in the world more sacred then Mistletoe, and the whereupon it groweth, so it bee an Oke. Now this you must take by the way; These Priests or Clergie men chuse of purpose such groves for their divine service, as stood onely Okes: Nay they solemnize no sacrifice, nor celebrate any sacred ceremonies without ches and leaves thereof: so as they may seeme well enough to bee thereupon named Druides in Greeke. And in very deed, whatsoever they find growing to that tree, beside the fruit, they esteeme it as a gift sent from heaven, and a sure signe, that the God himselfe whom they serve, hath chosen that peculiar tree. And no marvell; for Mistletoe is past geason, and hard to be found upon the Oke: But when they meet with it, they gather it up devoutly, and with many ceremonies. First, they principally observe that the Mistletoe just six daies old: for upon that day begin they their new years, yea and the severall ages, which have their revolutions every thirtie yeares, because (hee is thought) then to bee of great power and force sufficient, and is not come to her halfe light or end her first quarter. It they call in their Language, All-heale, [for they have an opinion that it healeth all maladies whatsoever.] Now when they are about to gather it, after it have duly prepared their sacrifices and festiwall cheere under the said tree, they bring thither two young bullocks milke-white, whose hornes are then and not before bound
This done, the Priest arraid in a surplise or white vesture, climeth the tree, and with a golden bill cutteth off [the Mistletoe] and they beneath receive the same in a white souldiers cassike.
Then fall they to kill the beasts aforesaid for sacrifice, mumbling many oraisons and praying
That it would please God to blesse this gift of his, to their good unto whom hee had vouchsafed to give it. Now this conceite they have of Mistletoe thus gathered, that what living creature soever, otherwise barren, drinketh thereof, it will presently thereupon become fruitful; also that it is a soveraigne counterpoison and remedie against all venom. So superstitious are people oftentimes in such frivolous and foolish toies as these. Heereto accordeth well that Diodorus Siculus in the same sense hath termed these Priests of the Gauls Druides, which word, (as they all know), who have skill in the Greeke tongue, betokeneth Okes. And Maximus Tyrius writeth thus of the Celts, i. the Gauls; That they worship Jupiter, whose symbole or signe, is the highest Oke. Furthermore, it may seeme to proceede from these Druides, that our Saxons (as we read in Alfricus) called a Druid winer or wise man in their Language, Eufy. Of these if you bee willing to learne more, I referre you to Mela, Lactantius, Eusebius De Preparatione Evangelica, and the Comedie Aulularia of Pseudo-Plautus.

Bardi.

The Frenchmen or Gauls, had likewise among their religious persons, the Bardi, who to the tune of the Harpe sung Dirges in verse, containing the famous exploits of brave and noble men. From whence it is, that the same Lucan before cited speaketh thus unto them.

Vos quoq, qui fortes animas, belloq, percipitis,

Laudibus

Laudibus in longum, vates, dimittitis avum, Plurima securi fuditis carmina, Bardi.

And yee the Poets, Bardi call'd, who knights redoubted prife
Praise-worthy most, that died in the field, and them doe eternise;
Pour'd fourth now many a verse in song, and that in carelesse wife.

And even those also doe our * Britains still at this day terme by the very same name: * Welchmen;
For them they call Bard, who besides the exercise of that function, doe especially address themselves to the skill of Heraldry, and the drawing of Pedigrees. But whether the Britaines in like manner as the Gauls, believed, That they were descended from Pluto, we have no record to lead us. Whereas the Gauls did for that * cause; deter- * That is, their mine and end all their spaces of times, by reckoning nights and not daies, so as the descent from day might in order follow the night, the very same have our Britains observed. For, that which the Latines call Septimana, and two Septimane, they terme with-nor, that is, eight nights, and Pimthec-nor, that is, fifteene nights.

* That is, their descent from Pluto.

Likewise both peoples seeme to have framed unto themselves, one and the same forme of Common weale and government. For, ruled they were not by one mans scepter: but right as Gaul, so Britaine also had many Kings. And even as the Gauls in cases of greater waight and danger called an assembly of the whole nation and elected one chiefe governour: so did the Britaines also, as it may bee gathered out of these words of Cæsar, *The severaignty of command, and managing the warre, was by a common Counsell granted to * Cassivelaunus.*

Their Republique or common wealth,

Neither were these two Nations unlike in manners, customes and ordinances. For to let this passe, that both of them were most warlike, and exceedingly given to laughter: certaine it is, that in joyning of battels, and adventuring of dangers, they were one as forward as the other: as may appeare by Strabo, Tacitus, Dio, Herodi-an and others. For manners and conditions, faith Strabo, the Britains are in part like to the Gauls: and anon he addeth, In fight for the most part they be fierce and cruell like unto certaine Gauls. And Tacitus according with him, The Britans, faith he, that were not vanquished by the Romans, remaine such as the ancient Gauls were. And in another place, Next neighbours to the Gauls and like unto them be the Britaines.

* Cassivelaunus; Their Manners,

That the Britaines fought, armed after the Gaulish fashion, Mela doth report. The Britaines in their wars use a number of Chariots as Strabo writeth, like as some of the Gauls.

The manner was of the one people and the other, in time of warre to range their battels apart by severall nations, that the distinct valour of them both might more evidently appeare. That the Gauls practised this, Cæsar witnesseth in these words:
The Gauls being divided by their sundry cities and states kept the fowles and passages.
Which also Tacitus affirmeth of the Britaines in the battell of Catatacus, The nation stood by troupes and companies before the fortifications.

The Gauls, faith Strabo, were of a docible wit, and apt to learne: as also the Britaines, whose wits Agricola in Tacitus preferred before the students of Gaul, as being now curious to attaine the eloquence of the Roman language, whereas they lately rejected the language.

The Gauls, Strabo reporteth to have been of an ingenuous nature and single hearted: which Tacitus seemeth to note and observe in the Britans, writing that they are ready and willing to endure levies of men and money, and all other burdens imposed by the Empire, if wrongfull insulences herein be forborne.

Cæsar reporteth, that the Gauls upon an unconstant and variable mind that they carried, loved evermore change and alteration in the government: The Britains likewise, faith Tacitus, were variable, given to factions and siding. By means of this in-constancie of the Gauls, which Cæsar more mildly calleth an Infirmitie, so great credulitie crept into their minds, that the credulity of the Gauls grew to be a proverbe, and one Poet hath written thus thereof:

*Et tumidus Gallæ credulitate fruar:
And full of this conceit will I Make use of Gauls Credulitie.*

Neither

* Old wives tales.

Neither have our Britans as yet therein degenerated from them, who most readily give care even to * Mileſian fables, and either through ſuperſtitious hope or like ſome doe preſently believe moſt fooliſh prophecies.

We read in Strabo, that the Gauls grieved exceedingly and tooke to heart the buſe which they ſaw done unto their kinred. That there is the ſame Sympathie and fellow feeling in our Britans above all other nations, it is better knowne than can be uttered, and riſe in every mans mouth.

Ambaſſi.

The Gauls, as Cæſar recordeth, according as every one excelled others in noble birth and wealthy eſtate, ſo kept they about them a greater traine of ſervants and dependants whom they called Ambaſſi: which was the onely grace, countenance, and port they carried. Neither know our Britiſh Noblemen or gentry of Wales at this day, any other ſhew of reputation: From whom, as it is thought, the Engliſh have learned to leade after them ſo great a retinue of followers and ſerving men: in which thing they have not long ſince out-gone all other in Europe.

That the Britiſh buildings were in every reſpect ſutable with thoſe in Gaul, and compaſſed round about with woods, Cæſar and Strabo doe ſhew unto us.

The Gauls, as witneſſeth Strabo, ware chaines of gold, about their necks: and Bunduica the Britiſh Lady, ſaith Xiphilius, had likewiſe a golden chaine, and was clad in a garment of ſundry colours. And where at this day is that ornament more in uſe than in this Iſle and among our Britans?

That Britans and Gauls both, adorned their middle finger with a ring Pliny doth report.

The ſame Strabo maketh mention of the Gauls, that they nourished the buſh of their heads; and Cæſar teſtifieth that the Britans went with long haire.

It appeareth in many authors, that the Gauls uſed certaine garments which in their mother tongue they termed Brachæ; that theſe were alſo common to our Britains, this verſe of Martiall doth prove;

Quam veteres Brachæ Britoniæ pauperis:

Than Brachæ old of Briton poore.

I paſſe over that which Silius Italicus writeth of the Gauls:

Quinetiam ingenio fluxi, ſed prima feroces,

Vaniloquum Celtae genus, ac mutabile mentis.

The Gauls though fierce at firſt, ſoone yield and hold not out, by kind; A nation given to vanitie of words and change of mind.

Beauſe theſe qualities are common to moſt nations, I might adde hereto other particulars, wherein theſe people have jumped juſt together: but I feare me leſt malicious evill-willers would wreſt them to the detraction and ſlander of the ſaid nations. Beſides, that ſaying pleaſeth me exceeding well, All in a meane and within meaſure: and the argument perhaps which is drawne from common manners, may ſeeme not of the greateſt validitie.

Language.

Now are we come to the language, in which lieth the maine ſtrength of this diſputation and the ſureſt prooffe of peoples originall. For no man, I hope, will deny, that they which joyne in communie of language, concurred alſo in one and the ſame originall. And if all the hiſtories that ever were had miſcarried and periſhed; if no writer had recorded, that we Engliſhmen are deſcended from Germans, the true and naturall Scots from the Irith, the Britons of Armorica in France from our Britans; the ſocietie of their tongues would eaſily confirme the ſame: yea and much more eaſily, than the authoritie of moſt ſufficient Hiſtoriographers. If therefore I ſhall prove, that the ancient Gauls and our Britans uſed one and the ſelfe ſame language, then the very truth will of force drive us to confeſſe, that they had alſo the ſame beginning. Neither paſſe I what Cæſar hath written, that the Gauls were of divers languages: ſince that Strabo ſaith, They differed only in dialect. They did not all, quoth hee, every where uſe the ſame tongue, but ſomewhat, little though it were, it varied. But that the language of the old Gauls was all one with the Britiſh (unleſſe haply in variety of dialect), Cæſar himſelfe doth ſhew, writing that the maner was of the French

Gauls who deſired further knowledge in the diſcipline and learning of the Druides, to goe over into Britaine unto our Druidæ. Now ſeeing that they had no uſe of bookes, it ſtands to good reaſon, that in teaching they ſpake the ſame tongue that the Gauls did. Which Cornelius Tacitus more plainly affirmeth; the Britiſh ſpeech, ſaith he, and the French or Gauliſh differ not much. Whence it is that Beatus Rhennanus, Deſſer, Horſtman, Peter Daniel, Picardus, and all others that have ſubſcribed and done honour to venerable antiquitie, are all become of this opinion: except ſome few who will have the Gauls to have ſpoken the German language. But leaſt my muſherin ſhould caſt duſt in our eyes, let us our of authors gather and conſider many words as we can out of the old Gauls, as it were ſhip-planes caught up from a ſhipwrecke (ſeeing that the ſaid tongue is now even drowned under the waves of oblivion). For very many words we ſhall ſee not hardly nor violently framed, but paſſing eaſily, and in manner without any wreſting, to agree with our Britiſh, both in ſound and ſenſe.

Divona Seltarum lingua ſons addite Divis:

Thou fountaine added to the Gods in Gauliſh Divona hight.

witneſſeth, that Divona in the French language ſigniſieth, Gods fountaine. Now doe our Britaines call God, Dyn, and a Fountaine, Vonan: of which is compounded Divonan, and by the Latine Analogie, and for the verſe ſake, Divona.

That Jupiter, whom the Greekes, of Thunder call Jovis, and the Latines Jovans, Jovis is, Thunderer was worſhipped of the Gauls under the name of Taranis; there bee writers, not a few that have reported. But Taran with the Britaines betokeneth Thunder. In which ſignification the Germans ſeeme to have named Jupiter, Thor: For Jupiters day or Thursday, they call Thunderday, which is as much, as The Thunderers day.

The Gauls had another God, by Lucane named Hefus, and by Lactantius Hefus, whom alſo the Author of Querels termed Annubis laurus; that is, Barking Annubis; for that, painted he was in the forme of a Dog: and Huid with our Welch Britaines betokeneth a Dog.

Moſt certaine it is that the Gauls worſhipped Mercurius under the name of Tesates, as the Inventors of Arts, and guide of their journeyes: And Dio Taiſh in the Britiſh or Welch tongue, is as much as the God of Travelling: And that Plato in his Phædrus and Philebus calleth Mercurius Theus, I am not ignorant. Howbeit I know there be ſome, who will have Tesates to be the ſame that the Germans called Tuſco in Tacitus, and is all one with Mars; as alſo that we the off-ſpring of Germans name thereupon Mart day, Tuiſday. Concerning theſe three Gods of the Gauls, take with you, if you pleaſe, theſe three verſes of Lucane,

Et quibus immis placatur ſanguine divo

Tesates, horrendi, ſeræ uharibus Heſus,

Et Taranis Scythicæ non miſior aræ Diana.

And they that uſe with curſed bloud their Idol-gods to pleaſe,

Tesates fell, and Hefus grim, whom thought elſe may appeale

But ſacrifice of humane fleſh: and Taranis likewiſe,

Worſhip'd as curſt Diana is, juſt after Scythicke guiſe.

That the ſoule Spirits named Inebis, were of the Gauls termed Duffi, becauſe they praſiſe that ſikky angleanneſſe of theirs continually. Saint Auguſtine and Iſidorus both doe teſtifie: But that which is continually and daily, the Britans ſtill doe expreſſe by the word Durh.

Pomponius Mela writeth, That the religious women attending upon a certaine God, whom the Gauls worſhipped, counted holy vorarics of perpetuall virginitie, were called of the Gauls, Senn, or Lena rather I would read if I durſt. For, ſuch conſecrated Virgins, whom now folke name Nuns, the Britans, as it is an old Gloſſarie, termed Leanes: whence a moſt ancient Nunnery, Lean-minifter, now called Leamſter, drew the name.

- Gesta. The Gauls, saith Polybius, in their owne tongue called their mercenarie soldiers Gestae: and at this day the Welsh Britains doe call their hired servants Gestae.
- Gest. Valiant men were, as Servius saith, named of the Gauls Gestae: and Gestae among the Britains importeth the same that in Latin, Vir fortis & strenuus, that is, valorous and hardie man.
- Gessum. Hitherto may bee referred Gessum, which was a weapon proper to the Gauls, Pilum to the Romans, and Framica to the Germans. But of this, anon.
- Caterva. As Phalanx was properly the Macedonians Legion, so was Caterva peculiar to the Gauls, as we may see in Vegetius. Neither is this word grown out of use with the Britains, who use to call a troupe Caturfa, and war Kad, and the strength of war which is in a Legion Kaderne, yea and Carcna, as is found in some Copies of Vegetius.
- Caesia. To this Kad, may well be reduced Caesia, which was a kind of warlike weapon among the Gauls, as Isidorus reporteth.
- Gessa. Gessa, a Gaulish weapon, Servius doth interpret to be a mans speare, whereas the British Cethilou seemeth to come neere, which Ninnius expoundeth to be as much as Stakes burnt at the end, and a warlike seede or generation.
- Trimarcia. The Gauls whom Brennus marched with into Greece, named in their owne language that order of Horse fight which consisteth of three horses [in a ranke] as Paulanias, Trimarcia: For a horse they called Marca, which in that very signification is meere and British. For Tri significeth three, and March an horse.
- Thireas. Paulanias in the same booke recordeth, that the Gauls termed their owne country shields Thireas: which even to this day the Britains name Tarian.
- Cesar. Caesar hath in his Journals or Day-booke written, as Servius saith, That he in Gaul being caught up of the enemy, and armed as he was carried upon his horse backe, one of his enemies that knew him chanced to meete him, and insulting over him said, Caesar: which in the Gauls tongue is as much as Let goe Caesar: now, among the Britains Geduch betokeneth as much.
- Rheda. Rheda, a Gaulish word, is of the same signification, saith Quintilian, that Caruta, that is, a chariot, or waggon, among the Latins. This word the British tongue doth not now acknowledge: howbeit, that it hath been in use among the Britains, Rhediad is a course, Rheder to run, and Rhedesa a race, doe plainly shew: which words that they spring from the same stocke, no man need to make doubt. And what absurditie wee find from hence to derive Eporadia, a City of the Salassians, which Pliny writeth, took that name of Horse-breakers.
- Eporadia. Another kind of waggon a charriot there was, used of both these people, which by one name they called Covinus, and the driver Covinarius. And albeit this word together with that kind of waggon it selfe be quite growne out of use, yet the primitive thereof, as I may so say, remaineth still among the Britains: in whose language the word Covain significeth to carry or ride in a waggon.
- Essendum. Essendum likewise was a Gaulish waggon or charriot rather, meet for the warres: which together with Caesar, Propertius attributes to the Britains in this verse,
- Essedacala in siste Britannia jugis.*
- Circius. Stay there your British chariots with yokes so faire engravn.
- Circius* is a wind by name passing well knowne, unto which Augustus Caesar both vowed and also built a temple in Gallia. That the word is Gaulish, Phavorinus a Gaulois borne declareth in Agellius. Our Gauls, saith he, call the wind blowing out of their land, and which they find to be most fell and boisterous, by the name of Circius, of the whirling and whistling, I suppose, that it makes. Of all winds this is known to be most blustering and violent: now, Cyrch, with the Britains betokeneth force and violence, as may be scene in their Letany.
- Penninus. The Pennine Alpes, which Caesar calleth the highest Alpes, had this name imposed upon them, as Livie writeth, not of Annibal Pœtus, that is the Carthaginian, but of that Hill which with the highest top among the Alpes the Mountainers of Gaul consecrated and named Penninus. But Pen with the Britains even in these daies significeth the tops of hills: whence the highest mountaines that we have, to wit, Penninus.

- Apenninus*, Pendle, Pen, Pentob-cloud, and Pennigent get their names. Neither have the high mountaines Apennini in Italy their name from ought els.
- The cities and States of Gaul coasting upon the Ocean, were called, as Caesar writeth, after the custome of the Gauls.
- Armerica*: with whom the Britains accord in the same name for the same thing. For, with them Ar-more, is as much as by the sea, or upon the sea: And in the very same sense Strabo nameth them in Greek Armeria.
- In the reigne of Dioclesian the Emperor, the rural people in Gaul made a commotion. And to the crue of that faction of theirs they gave the name Baucade. And among the Britains, Swineheards and country gnosfs, be called Beichiad.
- The inborne thieves of the land, the Gauls, saith Sidonius, named Varge: And I have found in the Glossarie of the Cathedrall Church of Lbandaff, that thieves in the British tongue were in old time knowne by the name of Veriad.
- The Allobroges, saith that ancient and excellent Scholiast upon Juvenal, were so named, because Broge in French significeth a land or Territorie, and Alla, another: As one would say, Translated out of another place. But Bro in British, is a region or country, and Allan, without, or external: so that the Erymologie in both tongues, holdeth very well.
- There is an herbe like to Plantain called in Gaul Glastrum, saith Plinie, wherewith the Britans died and coloured themselves, as writers testifie. This is the herbe which we terme Wood, and it giveth a blew colour: which colour at this day, the Britans terme Glasfe. This was the Greeks Isatis, by the testimony of Plinie, and the Diars, vitrum, by the authority of Oribasius. Whereby, Pomponius Mela may easily be corrected, if instead of Ultro, you put Vitro: where he saith thus, Britanni incertum ob decorem, an ob quid aliud, ultro corpora infecti, that is, whether the Britans died their bodies with wood for a beautifull shew, or in some other respect, it is uncertaine.
- The Gallathians who spake the same language, as S. Hierome witnesseth, that the ancient Gauls did, had a little shrub called Coccus; of which that deep red skarlet colour was made: and this very colour the Britans usually name Coco.
- That Brache were garments common to French and Britains we have shewed before. Diodorus Siculus calleth such, unshorne, or undressed and of sundry colours. And even now adaies the Britans terme foule and ragged clothes, Bratt.
- If Laina was an old Gaulish word, as Strabo seemeth to tell us, when he writeth thus, The Gauls weave them cassocks of thicken wooll which they call Lainas; the Britans are not gone far from them, who in their tongue name wooll Glawn.
- Bardus* in the Gauls tongue significeth a Singer, Festus Pompeius is mine author: and this is a meere British word.
- Bardocucullus*, as we are taught out of Martial and others, was the cloake that the Gaulish Bardi woore. And like as Bard, so the other part also of the foresaid word, remaineth whole among the Britans, who call such a cloake, Cucull.
- Gaul, saith Plinie, yeelded a kinde of Corne of their owne, which they called Brance, and we Sandalum, a graine of the finest and nearest sort. Among the Britans likewise, meale of the whitest graine is named Guineth Urane.
- The herbe which the Greekes, of five leaves doe call Pentaphyllon, was named of the Gauls Pempedula, as sheweth Apuleius. Now, Pymp in British, is five, and Pempedula, a leafe.
- As the Gauls by Pymp meant the number of five, so by Petor, foure, as wee learne out of Festus: who sheweth, that Petorium was a chariot or wagon of the Gauls, so called of foure wheeles: and this word Pedwar in the British tongue significeth foure.
- Among wooden instruments, Canterium, in English a Leaver, was among the Gauls called Guvia, as Isidorus writeth: and novv the same in the British language, is named Gwif.
- Beulla*, which we call Byrch, Plinie nameth a Gaulish tree. Hee would if he lived novv call it the British tree. For it groweth most plentifully in Britaine, and in the British tongue is named Bedw.

The Elder tree, in Latine Sambucus, in the old Gaulish Scorvis, is in British lfeaw. The herbe in Italy, Serapula, in old Gaulish, Petonica, the Britans and we call Betany. That which in Plinie the Latines name Terra adeps, that is, the fat of the ground, the Gauls Marga, is of the Britans called Marle. The white or bright marble named of the Latines Candida Marga, of the Gauls Glysmarga, might of the Britans be termed Glysmarl: For Gluy, with them is as much as Bright or Shining. The three-footed stooke, which the Latines name Sellula Tripes: the Gauls, as we read in Sulpinius Severus, Tripetia, is among the Britans termed Tribet. That which the Latines mean by Centum pedes, that is, a hundred foot, the Gauls in Columnella understand by Candetum, and the Britans by Cantrved. A Birds bill, in Latine Arvis rostrum, the Gauls, as we read in Suetonius, called Becca, and the Britans name Pic.

Neither should I bee as fancy-full as Coropine, if I reduced Suetonius his Galba, which signifieth exceeding fat, to the British word Galvus, that betokeneth passing high, or Bulga in Valerius Flaccus for a leather Budget, unto the British Burfiel: or the Soldan in Caesar, put for men  Devoted*, unto the Britans Sandwys: or Plinie his Plamarat, for a plough, unto Arat, which in the British tongue signifieth a plough: or Isidorus his Taxca for Lard, unto the Britans Tew, or Diodorus Siculus his drinke called Zithum, unto their Sider, or Cervisia, unto Keirch, that is, Otes, whereof the Britans in many places make that drinke (or rather by Cwrms) which we in English terme Ale.

That all these were the ancient words of the ancient Gauls, appeareth evidently out of those Authors; and you see how fitly they for the most part agree and accord as it were in consent with our British words, in sound and sense both.

Hereunto thus much moreover may be added, that seeing the ancient names of places end with both people in the same termination, to wit, in Dunum, Briva, Rinn, Dunum, Magus, &c. it may be gathered that these were not divers nations. And even from hence verily a sound reason may be drawn, that we Englishmen are sprung from the Germanes, for that the later and more moderne names of our townes end in Bury, Berry, Ham, Steed, Ford, Thorp, and Wick, which carrie a just and equall correspondence unto the terminations of the Dutch townes; Burg, Berg, Heim, Stadt, Furd, Dorp, and Wic.

Again, the reason of certaine old Gaulish words may bee so fitly given out of our British tongue, the property and nature of the thing agreeing also therunto, that of necessity we must confesse, either they were names imposed by the Britans, or els the Britans spake French. But let it suffice to alledge one or two for all.

The third part of Gaul, saith Caesar, they inhabite, who in their owne language be named Celte, and in ours Galli, but of the Greeks Callatæ. But whence they were called Celte and Callatæ the best learned of all the French, could never as yet tell: But let them consider and see, whether it come not of the British word Emall, which even yet among the Britans betokeneth the haire or bush of the head, as also Gualtic, that signifieth Comata, that is, with long haire: whereof it may seeme that Celtica, Callatæ, and Galli, are termes mollified by variety of pronunciation. Now that the Celte were called Comati, of their long haire which studiously they cherished, all learned men doe joyfully grant: and as for the letters, C. and K. Q. and G. how should one (considering their force and native sound) put a difference betweene them?

That the famous and noble river  Carnum* in France carrieth a swelling stream, and as if the waves were angry and chafed, whereupon Poets name it with these attributes, Validum, Aequoreum, and Rapidum Garumna, that is, the strong, scalelike, and swift Garumna, it is so well knowne as nothing more: And all that doth Garn in the British tongue import.

The river  Arar* passeth marvellous gently, so as by the celerity it can be discerned which way the streame goeth, whereupon the Poets give these Epithets unto it.

Arar.

Arar is tardior, and Lentus Arar, that is, Slow and Still Arar. But Ars with the Britans betokeneth Still and Slow.

Rhodanus, into which Arar doth fall, runneth downe amaine with an exceeding swift, and violent current: and therefore it is termed, Incitus, Celer, and Præceps, that is, swift, quicke, running headlong: Which name, Rhodanus, disagreeeth not much from the British Rhedec, that signifieth a speedynesse in running.

That the Hills  Gebenna* runne out farre into Gaul, in manner of a long continued ridge, Strabo and others doe make mention. And that Keven among our Britaines poundeth as much as the backe or ridge of an Hill, appeareth by the British Dictio. ie: and I my selfe have seene a long chaine of hills in Yorke-shire, which the Inhabitants there doe call the Kivin.

Considering that stones were in old time erected in Gaul by the high waies side, at the distance just of every  thousand* and five hundred paces: see it also that the Gaul-like Leuca, or League, containeth, as Jornandes writeth, just so many paces; and Leuch in the British tongue betokeneth a Stone, I would have the learned Frenchmen say, whether the said Leuca tooke not that name thereof. About the Sea side of that part of France, which was called Narbonensis, where (as the fabulous report goeth) Hercules and Albion fought together, there lie so many stones every where all abroad, that a man would verily thinke it had rained stones there: whereupon writers name it, the Stonie Strond, and stonie field: The French in these daies call it Le Craux. And yet they know not the reason of this name. But Stones in the British tongue, be termed Craig.

They that heretofore inhabited the maritime tract of Gaul, which is next unto us, were in their owne language called Morini: and seeing that the Sea is named Mor in British, it seemeth that thereupon they were so termed. For the Britans call such as dwell upon the Sea coast Morinwy: like as Aremorica betokeneth long since in Gaulish, and now in British, By the Sea side.

Thus Arelate a most famous citie of Gaul, seated in a moist and waerie soile, may seeme to have taken that name of the very cite thereof: For Ar in British signifieth Vpon, and Laith, Moisture.

Vxellodunum, saith Caesar, was a towne having on every side a steepe access unto it, and situate upon an high Hill. But Vchell among the Britaines is as much as steepe or loftie, and Dunum with the ancient Gauls, betokeneth a high place or hill: as Plutarch hath taught us out of Clitophon, in his booke of Rivers: and the same was also in use among the old Britaines.

The Promontorie  Citharistes*, Plinie placeth in Gaul neere unto Marfiles, where now is seene the towne Tolon: but if you aske our Welsh Britains, what is Cythara, in their language, they will tell you by and by Telen.

Again, that no doubt may herein bee left behind, seeing it is evident that the late French tongue is come from the Latine and Germane, yet so as therein nevertheless there remaine very many words still of the old Language: I have heard of those that be skilfull in both tongues, that very many of those French words, which cannot be reduced, either to the Latine or Germane Originall (and therefore may be thought of the old Gallique) doe come as neere unto the British as is possible. As for example, the French men at this day use Guerir, and the Britans Guerif for To heale. The French say Guaine, the Britans Gwain, for a sheath: The French, Derechef, the Britaines Dercheshu, for again: The French Camur, the Britaines Cam, for crooked: the French Bastien, the Britaines Bad, for a Boad: the French Gourmand, for an over-great eater, the Britans Gormod, for Overmuch: the French Bastion, the Britans Pastwn, for a stafte or cuttill: the French Accabler, the Britans Cablu, for to oppreffe: the French Haure, the Britans Aber, for an Haven: and Comb is still used of both the nations for a Valley. There are of this sort very many more, which haply the Reader may distaste, although they serve especially for this purpose now in hand.

But whereas Tacitus writeth, that the people of the Aestii, used the fashions and habit of the Suprians, but in language came neerer to the Britans, that maketh nothing against my my Assertion. For the Languages most remote, in some points agree. And of late gerius Busbequius, Embassadour from the Emperour to the great Turke, hath served many Dutch and English words in the Biland Taurica Chersonesus. Hereupon it may be concluded, that the ancient Gauls Inhabitants of the now named France, and Britaines of this Isle spake one and the same language by necessary consequence the originall of the Britaines is to bee reduced unto Gauls. For we must confesse, as I said before, that France or Gaul was peopled by Britain, as lying neerer unto Armenia: and as it was plentifull in corne, so, by the testimony of Strabo, more fruitfull of men: Seeing also, that the Gauls sent out planted their colonies all abroad, in Italy, Spaine, Germanie, Thracia and much more then by all reason and congruities in Britan so neere, and no lesse place than the rest. Neither can it chuse but make for the Britaines reputation even in the highest degree, to have derived their beginning from the ancient Gauls, who martiall prowesse have surpassed all others: with whom the Romans for many maintained war, not about superioritie in glory, but for the very main-chance of and living: and who (to use the Poets words rather than mine owne)

Neither must we here passe over in silence those reasons which others have alleged to prove the Britans first rising from the Gauls. George Buc, a man both well descended and well learned, observeth out of Mekercus, that the Germans call a French man Wallon: And when the Saxons of Germany came hither, and heard the Britans speake Gaul-like, they termed them Walli; that is, Galli, that is to say, Gauls. Chananus saith moreover, that [Walch] doth not simply among the Germans signifie a stranger, but rather in a better sense, a Gaul. And withall, he noteth thus much that the French at this day doe name that country Galles, which we call Wales: all that the ancient Scots divided all the British nations into Gaul, and Galle, that is to say after his Interpretation, into the Gallaci and the Galli.

But if our Britans will needs be descended from the Trojanes, they shall not want have me to gainsay them: and yet shall they in mine opinion ascribe their originall to the Trojanes best of all, by the old Gauls. For some say, as we read in Aimarus, that some few who after the destruction of Troy fled, possessed themselves of Gaul at the time void and unpeopled. But when wee thus consider these languages, we cannot but highly admire and set forth, the divine goodnesse of the most high Creatour towards our Britaines, the posteritie of that ancient Gomer: who although the Romans, Saxons and Normans have subdued them and triumphed over them, yet hitherto they they preserved their old name and originall language safe and sound: notwithstanding the Normans sought to abolish the same even by their lawes enacted for that purpose. So much as an old Britan, one of their nobilitie being demanded of Henry the second, King of England, what he thought of the Britans power and the Kings warlike preparation made against them, answered not impertinently after this manner; This Nation, O King, may now by the assaults of your selfe and others be molested, and for the part destroyed or weakened, like us heretofore and oftentimes it hath been. But, be the disfigure of man what it will, unlesse the wrath of God concur withall, it will never bee utterly destroyed and consumed. Neither shall any other nation or language else, (as I suppose) answer in straight day of judgement before that supream Iudge (for this angle of the World) what may happen furthermore, than the Welsh, that is, the British nation

THE NAME OF BRITAIN.

But you will say, If Cumero be the primitive name of the Inhabitants, whence comes Albion, whence comes Britaine? which name hath so growne in ure that in some sort it hath caused the other to be quite forgotten. But heare, I pray you, that, whereof I am most assured, because it is most true. As the selfe same things, may be considered by divers circumstances, so they may be called also by sundry appellations, as Plato teacheth in his Cratylus: if you run over all particulars severally both new and old; you shall find, that every nation was of others called by divers names, from those that they themselves used. Thus they that in their native tongue had Israelites to their name, according to the Greeks were called Hebrewes and Jewes, and by the Egyptians Huasi, as Heseth Manetho, because they had Heardmen for their governours. So the Greeks named them Syrians, who, as Iosephus writeth, calleth themselves Aramaeans. They that named themselves Chusians, were by the Grecians of their blacke faces called Ethiopians. Those which after their owne speech were named Celtae, the Greeks termed Galatae, of their milke-white colour, as some would have it, or of their long tush of haire, as I said erewhile. So, they that nominated themselves after their own language Teutsch, Numidians and Hellenes, by the Romans were named Germans, Maurians and Grecians. Even so in those daies, (not to speake of many other), they which in their owne Idome are called Muselmans, Magier, Czecchi and Besermans, are by all nations in Europe named Turkes, Hungarians, Bohemians, and Tartarians. And even wee our selves in England, called in our naturall speech Englishmen, are named by the * Britaines, Irishmen and the high-land Scots, Sassons, that is to say, Saxons. By the same reason we are to deeme, that our ancestours, which termed themselves Cumero, were upon some other cause either by themselves or others, named Britaines: From whence the Greekes framed their Britania, and delivered the same as it were from hand to hand unto the Romans. This ground being laid let us enquire now into the names of our Island.

* Welchmen.

As for the name Albion I passe not much, considering that the Greekes gave it to this Isle for difference sake, seeing that all the Islands bordering round about it were called Britanish and Britaines. The Island Britaine saith Plinie, renowned in the Greek records and ours both, lieth betwixt North and West over against Germanie, France and Spaine, but with a great distance betweene them, they being the greatest parts by far of all Europe. Albion it had to name when all the Isles adjacent were called Britannies. Whereupon Caecilius writing against Caesar said thus;

Hunc Gallia timent, timent Britannia.

Him Gaul doth feare, him Britaine dreads.

Who also in the same traine of verses, calleth it the utmost Isle of the West. And it may seeme that this name Albion, sprung from the vanitie, the fabulous inventions, and that unconstant levity of the Greeks in coining of names, which they themselves termed deceit or fiction. For seeing they have in fabulous wise named Italy Hesperia or Hesperum

Hesperus the sonne of Atlas; France Gallatia of a sonne of Polyphemus: I cannot therwise believe, but that in the same veine also of fabling they called this Island bion, of Albion Neptunes sonne: which thing Perottus and Lilius Giraldu have downe in writing. Unless a man would derive it rather of Albus, which, as Festus saith, in Greeke signifieth White, whereupon the Alpes also have their appellation. For environed it is with white rocks, which Cicero termeth Mirificas moles, the wondrous Piles: and hereof it is that upon the coined pieces bearing the stamp of Antoninus Pius and Severus, Britaine is pourtraied sitting upon rocks in wondrous habit. And the British Poets themselves name it Inis wen, that is, The white Isle. I say nothing of Orpheus in his Argonauticks, (if so be they be his), who called this Island next unto Hibernia or Irenis, that is, Ireland, which must needs be this of Albus that is, the white land: and which a few verses before, he may seeme have named Niber or Nibis, for Nibis is white. Fracastorius also writing how that pestilence day-fever in Britaine, which commonly we call the British or English sweate, happened by occasion of the foile, as if the same had stood much upon plaister, supposeth this Island gat the name Albion of the said plaisterish foile. As for that pretty how Albion was also called of Albina, one of those thirtie daughters of Diocles, the King of Syria, which at their very wedding solemnitie, slew their husbands, being brought hither by ship without rowe tooke possession of this Island first, conceived by spirits, brought forth a breede of giants, who can abide to heare it without indignation, as the most loud lie of some leaud losell.

Neither is there any cause wherefore I should so curiously search, why Britaine that ancient * Parodia against Ventidius Bassus, is named Insula Caruli, confident that it is compassed round about with the Ocean, which the Poets call Carulum. Whereupon Claudian of Britaine, writeth thus:

Cuius vestigia verrit

Whose feet the Azure Sea
Doth sweepe.

ROMANIA.

I passe over to speake of Aristides, who named it The great, and the furthest Isle. That it was called also Romania, Gildas after a fort doth intimate, who writeth, subdued it was of the Romans so, as that the name of Roman servitude stuck to the foile thereof: and by and by after, so as it might not be counted BRITANIA, but ROMANIA: as one or two pages after, speaking of the same, The Island, quoth he, keeping indeed the Roman name, but neither their custome nor law. And prosper Aquitanus in expresse words called it the Roman Island: heereunto may be referred also thus much, that when the Statutes of Tacitus and Florianus the Emperors were by lightning overthrowne, the Soothsayers answered out of their learning, that an Emperour should arise out of their family, who among other things was to set presidents over Taprobane, and to be a Proconsull to the Roman Island, which the learned understand of our Britaine, though it was a Province * Præsidiall, and never Proconsular, as afterwards wee will declare. But that sometime it was named Samothea of Samothes the sixth Sonne of Taptes, believe it who that will, for me. Out of whose shop and forge this comes, I wote full well: even from Annius Viterbiensis forsooth, who under a goodly title, as the manner is of craftie retailers, hath in the name of Berosus published, and thrust upon credulous persons his owne fictions, and vaine inventions.

But touching the name and originall of Britaine, the truth by reason of the divers and sundry wits of men is very doubtfull and wavering. In which point, that I may lawfully interpose mine owne conjecture, I will by way of Preface, beseech our Britains to speake and think favorably of me, that while they are desirous to learne, they would be willing to pardon, and not debarre me of that course, which Eliot, Leland, Lhuid, and the rest have taken. For if it was lawfull for Humfrey Lhuid a most learned Briton, without any prejudice at all to Brutus, (nay if hee were commended rather for it,) to derive the name of Britaine otherwise, than from Brutus; let it not be imputed as a hainous offence unto me, who am unwilling to impugne the storie of Brutus.

Popiscus Florianum.

* Haply, governed by Presidents.

Brutus, to deduce it from somewhat else, if I can. And that out of the very British tongue, and from nothing else, which as it is least mingled with other languages, and withall most ancient, so in this search it seemeth greatly to helpe and further us. For, ancient tongues are reputed passing necessarie, for the searching out of Originals: and Plato teacheth us, That the first names being through the long continuance of time growne out of use, are preserved in barbarous tongues, as being more ancient than others. And although those things so farre remote from all memory, are over-cast with such mists and darkenesse, that the truth seemes rather to be wished than hoped for: yet for all that, will I doe my best to trace out the truth, and declare as briefly as I can, what my judgement is: not minding to put downe ought prejudiciall to any man, but most willing, if any one shall bring more probable matter to welcome and embrace the same. For I affect and love the truth not in my selfe more than in another, and in whom soever I shall see it, I will most willingly and gladly entertaine it.

First, by the Readers good leave, I will take this for granted and proved, that ancient Nations in the beginning, had names of their owne: and that afterwards, from these, the Greeks and Latines, by wresting them to the analogie or proportion of their speech, imposed names upon regions and countreys: to speake more plainly, That people were knowne by their names, before regions and places, and that the said regions had their denominations of the people.

Who can deny that the names of the Jewes, Medes, Persians, Scythians, Almans, French or Gauls, Betulians, Saxons, Englishmen, Scots, &c. were before Jewry, Media, Persia, Scythia, Alamaine, France or Gaule, Betulia, Saxonic, England, Scotland, &c. And who sees not, that these words sprang out of the other? Of the Samnites, Insubres and Belgæ, we read that Livie and Cæsar first named the countreys themselves * Samnitium, Insubrium, and Belgium.

Of the Franci in the time of Constantinus Maximus, as is to be seene in his coines, the place where they were seated took the name of Francia first: & from the Burgundi Sidonius Appollinaris first framed Burgundie. In the same sort we must of necessity think, that this our Island Britaine, tooke denomination from the Inhabitants, or from the Gaules their neighbours: That these first Inhabitants were called Brit or Brith, some things induce me to thinke: First and formost, that verse which goeth about, under the name of Sybilla:

* Επειτα δὲ Βριτανίαν καὶ τὴν Ἰνσουλὴν ἐκαλεῖται
Βριτανίαν καὶ τὴν Ἰνσουλὴν ἐκαλεῖται

Twixt Brits and Gaules their neighbours rich, in gold that much abound,
The roaring Ocean Sea with bloud full filled shall rebound.

Moreover, the authoritie of Martial, Juvenal and Ausonius. Procopius also, who nameth this Isle BRITTA. In like manner the old Inscriptions set up by the Britaines themselves, wherein are read, BRITO, BRITONES, BRITTUS. COH. BRITTON. ORDINIS BRITTON: and at Rome in the Church of Saint Mary the round NATI-ONE BRITTO: as also in this which is seene at Amerbachinm in Germanie, which I will put downe here underneath because it maketh mention of Triputium, a place in Britaine, not knowne.

* Βριτανία

The

BRIT.

The Saxons also themselves called the Britans in their language Briton, and Wend chindas the Saxon every where named the Britans Brita: so that the word Brit is doubtlesse the primitive, from whence Brito is derived, and from whence the double of light leading to the word Britaine, seemeth to appear.

Considering now that Nations devised their names of that, wherein they excelled others or were knowne from others: whether in regard of their first leaders honour; as the Iones of Javan, the Israelites of Israëll, the Chamanites of Cham: the sonne of Cham: or whether in respect of their nature, conditions, and inclinations; as the Iberi, after the Hebrew Etymologie, because they were miners; the Assi, for that they were fraglers; the Nomades, because they gave themselves to breeding and feeding of Cattell; the Alemans or Germanes, for that they were armed valiant men; the French or Frankners, for being free; the Pannonians, for wearing coats with cloth-sleeves, as Dio conceiteth it: the Ethiopians of their black haire, and the Albanes, because they were borne with white haire: whereupon, (mark I pray you) as Solinus saith, The colour of the haire upon the head gave name unto a people. Seeing also that our country men, who were (by a name common to them and their neighbours) called Cimbri and Cumeri, had no marke whereby they might be distinguished and knowne from the borderers, better than by that manner of their top: their bodies: for the most sufficient Auhors that be, as Cæsar, Mela, Plinie, and the rest doe shew, that the Britaines coloured themselves with woade, called Glass, Latine Glastum, (and Glass at this day with them signifieth Blew.) What if I should conjecture, that they were called Britans of their depainted bodies? For, whatfoever is thus painted and coloured, in their ancient country speech, they call Brith. Neither is there cause why any man should thinke this Etymologie of Britaines to be idle and absurd; seeing the very words found alike, and the name also as an exact image representeth the thing, which in Etymologies are chiefly required. For Brith Brit, doe passing well accord: and that word Brith among the Britans, implieth which the Britans were indeed, to wit, painted, depainted, died, and coloured, as their Antient Poets describe them; and Ambrosius, that is, having their backs pide, or medly dyed red, as Oppianus termeth them.

Neither will it be impertinent, (as small a matter as it is) to note here, that as I have observed, in the names, of well nere all the most ancient Britaines, there appeare some signification of a colour: which no doubt, arose from this kind of painting. The red colour is of the Britaines called Coch and Goch, which in my judgement lieth couched in these names, Cogidunus, Argentocoxus, and Segonax. The same Britaine call the blacke colour, Dû, which after a sort sheweth it selfe in Maudubrain, Cartimandua, Togodumnus, Bunduica, Cogidunus. The white colour is with them named Gwin, the very prints, as it were, and expresse tokens of which word, me thinketh in Venutius and Immanuentius. Gwellw among them signifieth that, which Color among the Latines doth, that is to say, a wan or waterish colour: and this appeareth evidently in the names of Fellocatus, Carnilius and Suella. Glass in the British tongue is as much as Blew, which is seene in the name of King Cuniglasus. For Gildas interpreteth it to be all one with Fulvus, or as some copies have Furvus Lano: that is, Lion tawny, or coale blacke Butcher. Aure, which betokeneth a faire yellow golden colour, bewraith it selfe in Cungetorius and Arviragus. A lively and gallant colour is with them called Teg, which maketh some little shew in Prasutagus and Crastacus. But if we be perswaded, that the Britans borrowed the names of mingled colours, together with the very simple colours themselves of the Romans; for certaine it is that they tooke from the Romans, Verith, for Viridis, that is, Greene: Melin, for Melinus, that is a Quince yellow colour: then if I thinke that there lieth also some note of the colour Prasinus, that is, Leeke blade greene, in Prasutagus; and the red vermillion or Sinopre colour, called of the Latins Minium, in the name of Adiminus, King Cinobelinus his sonne, no man I hope will stand against mee. Moreover Rufina, that most learned British Lady, tooke that name of the colour Rufus, that is, Red: like as Albane the first martyr in Britaine of Albus, that is, White. And any one that is skilfull in the old British tongue, would examine the rest of British names, which in the ancient Writers are not past foure or five more in all, wee may well suppose, that he shall find in those names, as few as they be, some signification of a colour. Neither must we omit this observation, that the commonest names at this day among the Britans, Gwin, Dû, Goch, Lhuid, were imposed upon them, from the white, blacke, red, russet, or tawny colour. So that now it may be thought no wonder, that the whole nation it selfe, drew the denomination from painting: considering verily, that they in generall painted themselves: and the very Inhabitants, both in times past, and also in these our daies imposed upon themselves their names, of Colours. But now to the matter, if haply, all this hath bene beside the matter.

This also is certaine, that in stories a Britaine is called in the British tongue Brithon. care not for the note of aspiration, seeing that the Britaines (who, as Chrysostome saith, had a hissing or lipping pronuntiation) delight in aspirations, which the Latines have carefully avoided. Now, as Brito came of Brith, so did Britannia also in my opinion. Britannia, saith Isidore, tooke that name from a word of the owne nation. For what time as the most ancient Greeks (and these were they that first gave the Island that name) sailing still along the shore, as Eratosthenes saith, either as rovers, or as merchants, travailed unto nations most remote and disjoyned farre asunder, and learned either from the Inhabitants themselves, or else of the Gauls, who spake the same tongue, that this nation was called Brith, and Brithon; then they unto the word Brith added TANIA: which, as we find in the Greek Glossaries, betokeneth in Greek, a region: and thereof they made a compound name Brithania, that is, the Britons-land, for which they have written false, Britania. But Lucretius and Cæsar, the first Latines that made mention thereof, more truly Britannia. That this is so, I doe the more firmly believe, because that besides our Britaine, a man shall not find, over the face of the whole earth above three countries of any account and largenesse, which end in the termination TANIA: and those verily lying in this west part of the world, namely, MAVRITANIA, LYSITANIA, and AQVITANIA. Which names, I doubt not but the Greeks made and delivered to the Latines, as who first discovered and surveied these lands. For, of Mauri they framed Mauritania, as one would say, the country of the Mauri, which the home-bred people of that land, as Strabo witnesseth, called Numbria: of Lusus the sonne of * Liber, Lusitania, as it were, the land of Lusus: and Aquita, perhaps ab aquis, that is, of waters, as Ivo Carnotensis is of opinion, being a region seated upon waters: in which sense, as Plinie writeth, it was before time named Arimorica, that is, coasting upon the sea. As for Turditania and Bastitania, names of smaller countries, they may hereto also be reduced, which likewise were in this westeme tract, to wit, in Spain, and may seeme to signifie as much as the regions of the Turdi and the Bastii. Neither is it a strange and new thing, that a denomination should be compounded, of a forreign and a Greek word, put together. Names are compounded, saith Quintilian, either of our own, that is, Latine, and of a strange word put together, as Bichinium, that is, a roome with two beds or two tables: and contrariwise, as Epitaphium, that is, a garment worne upon a gowne; Anticato, that is, a book written against Cato: or of two forreign words joyned in one, as Epirrhedum, a kind of wagon. And this manner of composition is most usuall in the names of countries. Came not Ireland by composition of the Irish word Erin, and the English word Land: Did not Angleterre, that is, England, grow together of an English and of a French word: and did not Frangland (for so our Saxons named Francia or France) proceed from a French and Saxon word: Came not Poleland likewise from a Polonian word, which among them betokeneth a plaine, and a Germane: Lastly, was not Danmarch compounded of a Danish word, and the Dutch March, which signifieth a bound or limit: But in so plaine and evident a matter I will not use any more words. Neither have we cause to wonder at this Greeke addition TANIA, seeing that S. Hierome in his questions upon Genesis, proveth out of most ancient authors, that the Greeks inhabited along the sea coasts and Isles of Europe throughout, as far as to this our Island. Let us read, saith he, Varroes bookes of Antiquities, and those of Silius Capito, as also the Greeke word Phlegon, with the rest of the great learned men, and we shall see, all the Islands well neere all the sea coasts of the whole world, yea and the lands neere unto the sea, to have bene inhabited up with Greeke Inhabitants, who, as I said before, from the mountaines Amanus and Taurus even to the British Ocean, possessed all the parts along the sea side.

That the Greeks came to Britaine.

And verily, that the Greeks arrived in this our region, viewed and considered the scite and nature thereof, there will be no doubt and question made; if we observe what Athenæus hath written concerning Phileas Taurominites (of whom mention is made) who was in Britaine in the clx. yeare before Cæsars comming: if we call to remembrance the Altar with an Inscription, Vno Phylles, in Greek letters; and lastly, we marke what Pytheas before the time of the Romans time, hath delivered in writing as touching the distance of Thule from Britaine. For who had ever discovered unto the Greeks, Britaine, Thule, the * Belgicke countries, and their sea coasts especially, if the Greeks ships had not entred the British and German Ocean, yea and noted the description thereof unto their Geographers? Had Pytheas, thinke you, come to the knowledge of fixe daies sailing beyond Britaine, unlesse some of the Greeks shewed the same? Who ever told them of Scandia, Burgos, and Nerigon, out of which men may faile into Thule? And these names seeme to have been better knowne unto the most ancient Greeks, than either to Plinie or to any Roman. Whereupon may testifieth, That Thule was much mentioned and renowned in Greek letters: and Plinie likewise writeth thus; Britaine an Island famous in the monuments and records both of the Greeks and of us. By this meanes therefore, so many Greek words have crept into British, French, & withall, into the Belgicke or low-Dutch language. And if Lazæ Baysius, and Budæus, do make their vant and glory in this, that their Frenchmen have bene of old antiquities, that is, Lovers and Students of the Greekes, grounding their reason upon few (French) words of that Idiome, which retain some markes and tokens of the Greek tongue: if Hadrian Junius joyeth no lesse, because in the Belgicke words there ly covertly Greek Etymologies: then may the Britaines make their boast, whose language many words there be derived from the Greeks. Howbeit, Sir Thomas Smith Knight, sometime Secretary to Queene Elizabeth, a man most learned every way, thinketh verily, that this hapned thereupon, for that when all Europe began to be much troubled and shaken with wars, very many of the Greeks flocked hither for refuge, as it were into a sanctuary.

Thus have you, as touching the Originall and name of Britaine mine error or conjecture, whether you wil, which if it swerve from the truth, I wish it were by the time it selfe reformed. In this intricate and obscure study of antiquitie, it is thought profitable, somewhat to erre: and remember we should withall, that such things as the first sight being slightly thought upon are deemed false, after a better review and further consideration oftentimes seeme true. Now if any man should summon me to appear before the Tribunall of Verity, I have no other answer at all to make. And for our countrymen the Britans, such as be of the learned sort, I doe most earnestly beseech and desire them to employ all their labour, industry, wit, and understanding in the searching out hereof, so long, untill at last, the truth with her owne cleare beames, may scatter and dissolve all mists of conjectures whatsoever.

THE MANERS AND CUSTOMES OF THE BRITAINES.

The Manners of Britaines.

Concerning the Britaines, what A&S at the first they explored, what forme of common-wealth they used, after what order and lawes they lived, M. Daniel Rogers, a very good man, and lately well learned, and my especiall friend, promised in his writings to informe us: but for that he being cut off by untimely death, hath performed nothing, take here these few notes touching their ancient maners and customes collected word for word out of ancient authors.

Cæsar. The Britans use for their money, brazen pieces, or * rings of iron duly weighed ^{* Annulli.} divided to a certaine just poize. To taste of hare, hen, and goose, they thinke it unlawfull ^{Some read, lawfull, that is, thine places.} where, these they keepe for their delight and pleasure. Of them all, these are most civill and courteous by far, that dwell in Kent, which is a country altogether lying upon the sea coast: whether doe these Inhabitants differ much in custome from the Gauls. The Inlanders for the most part sow no corne, but live of milke and flesh; and clad themselves in skins. But the Britans all in generall depaite themselves with * woad, that maketh a blew colour; ^{* Luteo.} whereby they are the more terrible to their enemies in fight. The haire of their heads they keepe long, and shave all parts of the body, saving the head and upper lip. Ten or twelve of them together use their wives in common, and especially brethren partake with brethren, and parents with their children: but looke what children they beare, theirs they are reputed who first married them virgins. In battell for the most part, they were wont to employ their chariottiers. First these ride about into all parts of the battell, and sling darts ^{Effedavil.} with the very fearefull sight of horse, and with the rattling noise of the wheeles, they doe the most part breake the rankes and put them in disarray, and when they have once wounded themselves within the troopes of the horsemen, they alight from their chariots, and fight on foot. The chariot-guiders in the meane time depart a little out of the medly, and bestow themselves so, that if the other be overcharged with the multitude of enemies, they may readily and without let retire in safetie. Thus in their battels, they performe the nimble motion of horsemen, and steadinesse of footmen: by daily practise and experience so ready in their service, that they were wont to stay in the declivity of a steepe hill their horses being in their full carriere, quickly turne short and moderate their pace, runne along the spire and beame of the chariot, rest upon the yoke of and harness of their steeds, and from thence leape againe into the chariots most speedily at their pleasure. These chariottiers could retire also many times of purpose, and when they had trained and drawne our men a little way off from their legions, dismount from their chariots and encounter them on foot, having thereby the vantage of them in flight. Furthermore, they never fought thicke and close together, but thinn and with great distance betwene, having set stations or wards of purpose, so as one might succour another, receiving the wearied, and putting forth new and fresh supplies.

The manner of their Effedavil dances or Chariottiers fight.

Strabo. The Britans be taller of stature than the Gauls: their haire not so yellow, nor their bodies so well knit and firme. For proove of their talenesse, I saw my selfe at Rome very many and springalls, higher by halfe a foote than the tallest man. Many, they had but bad feet to support them. As for all other lineaments of the body, they shewed good making and proportionable feature. For disposition of nature they partly resemble the Gauls: partly they be more plaine, more rude and barbarous; inasmuch that some of them for want of skill, can make no cheeses, albeit they have plenty of milke: others againe, are altogether ignorant in hardening and planting of orchards, yea and in other points of husbandry. Many Lords and Potentates they have among them. In their warres they use a number of chariots, like as some of the Gauls. Woods stand them in stead of Cities and townes: for when they have by felling of trees, mounded and fenced therewith a spacious round plot of ground, there they build for themselves halles and cottages, and for their cattell set up stals and folds: but those only for the present use, and not to serve long.

Cæsar likewise. A towne, the Britaines call some thicke wood, which they have enclosed and fortified with a ditch and rampier, and made for a place of refuge and retreat, to avoid the incursions of the borderers.

Diodorus Siculus. The Britans live after the manner of the old world. They use chariots in fight, as the report goes of the ancient Greeks at the Trojane war. Their houses are for the most part of reed or wood. Their corne they inne and house with care and all: threshing out thereof from hand to mouth as their need requires. Faire conditioned people they are, plaine and of upright dealing, far from the subtiltie and craft of our men. Their food whereupon they live is simple, and nothing daintie nor like the full fare of rich men. Their Island is replenished with people.

Pomponius Mela. Britaine bringeth forth nations and Kings of Nations, but they be all uncivill, and the farther they are from the continent, the lesse acquainted they be with other kind kind of riches: onely in cattell and lands they be wealthy. Their bodies are died with whether it bee for to make a gallant ſhew, or for what elſe, it is uncertaine. They pick of warre at their pleaſure to ſaſiſie their owne wills, and ſo oftentimes moleſt one another but principally upon an ambitious deſire of rule and ſoveraignty, and an encroaching they have to enlarge their owne poſſeſſions. Their fight is not onely with horſe or ſword but alſo with wagons and chariots harneſſed and armed after the Gaul-like manner, ſo they call Covinos: and in thoſe they uſe axeltrees armed at both ends with hooked ſides.

Cornelius Tacitus. The Britans neereſt unto * Gallia reſemble likewiſe the Gauls either becauſe they retaineth ſtill ſomewhat of the race from which they deſcended, or the countries butting one againſt another the ſame aſpects of the heavens doe yield the complexion of bodies. But generally, if a man conſider all, it is moſt likely, the Gauls lay neereſt peopled the land unto them. In their ceremonies and ſuperſtitious perſwaſions there is to bee ſeene an apparant conformitie: The language differeth not much: Likewiſe to challenge and ſet into dangers: when dangers are come, like feare in reſuſing: ſo that the Britans make more ſhew of courage, as beeing not mollified yet with long ſervice. For the Gauls alſo were once, as we read, redoubted in war, till ſuch time as giving themſelves over to eaſe and idleneſſe, cowardly crept in, and ſhipwrack was made both of valour and libertie together. And ſo is it alſo befallen to thoſe of the Britans which were reduced of old: The reſt remaine ſuch as the Gauls were before. Their ſtrength in the conſiſteth of footmen. Yet ſome countries there, make war in wagons alſo. The greater ſonage guideth the wagon, his waiters and followers fight out of the ſame. Heretofore they were governed by Kings, now they are drawne by petty Princes into Partialities and Factions: and this is the greateſt helpe wee Romans have, againſt thoſe puſſant Nations, they have no common counſell. Seldome it chanſeth that two or three States meete together and concur to repulſe the common danger: So, whiſt one by one fighteth, all are ſubdued.

In another place. An uſuall manner it was with the Britans to ſeek for the direction the Gods, by looking into the inward of beaſts: and to make warre under the conduct of women; neither mattereth it whether ſex beare rule over them. Whereupon learned Aristotle ſpake of the Britaines, where he writeth, That certaine warlike nations beyond the Celtes, were ſubject to the government of women.

Dio Nicanus, out of the Epitome of Xiphilinus, as touching the Britans in the North part of the Iſland. They till no ground: They live upon prey, veniſon and fruits. Few fiſh, although there is exceeding great plenty thereof, they will not taſte: their abode is in tents, naked and unſhod: Wives they uſe in common, and the children borne of them all doe ſoſter among them: the Comminaltie for the moſt part doth governe: moſt will they bee to practice robbing. In warre, their ſervice is out of Chariots: the horſes they be little and ſwift of pace: their footmen runne moſt ſpeedily: whiles they ſtand, they are the ſtrongest: the armour and weapons that they uſe, are a ſhield and ſhort ſpeare, in the other part whereof, there hangeth a round bell of braſſe like an apple, that when it is ſhaken they might with the ſound terrifie and maskre the enemies: they have daggers alſo. principally, they can endure hunger, cold, and any labour whatſoever. For, ſticking ſtill the bogs up to the head many daies together, they will live without food; and within woods they feed upon the barks and roots of trees. A certaine kind of meat they provide ready for all occaſions, whereof if they take but the quantitie of a Beane, they are not wonted to be hungry or thirſtie.

Herodian. They know no uſe at all of garments, but about their belly onely a necke, they weare yron; ſuppoſing that to be a goodly ornament, and a prooſe of their wealth like as all other Barbarians eſteeme of gold. For why? their very bare bodies they man with ſundry pictures, repreſenting all manner of living creatures; and therefore it is verily that they will not be clad, for hiding (for ſooth) that painting of their bodies. Now they are a moſt warlike nation, and very greedy of ſlaughter, content to bee armed onely with a narrow ſhield and a ſpeare, with a ſword beſides hanging downe by their naked bodies. Vnſkilfull altogether how to uſe either corſlet or helmet, ſuppoſing the ſame to be an hinderance unto them, as they paſſe over the bogs and marſh grounds: through rough the hot vapours ariſing, from whence the ſkie and aire is there moſt part ſoggy.

The reſt of the particulars, which are very few, I will lightly gather, and crop here and there. Plinie writing of Magicke: But what ſhould I (quoth he) rehearſe theſe things, as an art that hath paſſed over the Ocean alſo, ſo far, as beyond which, nothing is to be diſcovered but aire and water? And even at this day verily, it is in Britaine highly honoured, where the people are ſo wholly devoted unto it, and that with all compliments of ceremonies, as man would thinke the Perſians learned all their Magicke from them.

The ſame Plinie. There groweth an hearbe in Gaule like unto Plantaine, named Glaſtum, hatis, Wood, with the juce whereof, the women of Britaine, as well married wives, as their young daughters annoint and die their bodies all over; reſembling by that tincture the complexion of Aethiopians, in which manner they uſe at ſome ſolemne feaſts and ſacrifices to goe naked. Againe, Their is not a daintier diſh of meate known in Britaine, than are the Cheneſes, ſowles leſſe than wild geefe. Alſo, The Britaines wore rings on their middle finger. Likewiſe, The Britaines manured their grounds with Marle inſtead of dung.

That they inammelled or branded themſelves (as it were) with certain marks which Tertullian termeth Britannorum ſtigmate, that is, The Britans marks, Solinus ſheweth: The Country (ſaith he) is partly peopled with Barbarians, who by the meanes of artificiall diſciplines of ſundry formes, have from their childhood divers ſhapes of beaſts incorporate upon them: and thus having theſe their marques deeply imprinted within their bodies, looke now a man groweth more and more, ſo doe theſe pictured characters likewiſe waxe. Neither doe theſe ſavage Nations repute any thing to ſignifie their patience, more than by ſuch durable ſcars to cauſe their limbs to drinke in much painting and colour.

Dio. The Britaines worſhipped as their Goddeſſes, Andate, that is, Victorie and Andates.

Cæſar and Lucan. Ships they had, of which the Keeles, the footſtocks alſo, or upright ſtandards were made of light timber: the reſt of the body framed of windings and Oſſer covered over with leather.

Solinus. How long ſoever they held on their courſe under ſayle, ſo long the Saylorſ forſwore to eat. They uſed a drinke made of barley: and ſo doe wee at this day, as Dioſcorides writeth, who nameth Curmi wrong for Kwrw, for ſo the Britaines call that, which we terme Ale.

Many of them together had but one wife among them, as Eufebius recordeth in Evangelica Preparatione 6.

Plutarch reporteth, That they lived one hundred and twenty yeares, for that the cold and frozen country wherein they dwelt, kept in their naturall heat.

But what thoſe ancient times of cruell Tyrants were, whereof Gildas writeth, I know not, unleſſe he meaneth them that in this country rooke upon them the ſway of government againſt the Romans, and were at that time called Tyrants: for ſoone after, he addeth ſuch much out of S. Hierome: Porphyrie raging in the Eaſt-parts as a mad dog againſt the Church, annexed thus much to his furious andraine ſtile: Britaine (ſaith he) a Province plentifull of tyrants. Neither will I ſpeake of their ancient religion, which is not verily to be counted religion, but a moſt lamentable and confuſed Chaos of Superſtititions: For when Satan had drowned the true doctrine in thicke miſts of darkeneſſe, The ugly ſpectres of Britaine (ſaith that Gildas) were meere Diabolically, exceeding well meere in number thoſe of Egypt: whereof ſome we doe ſee within or without deſert walles, with deformed lineaments ſtill, carrying ſterne and grim looks after their wonted manner.

But, whereas it is gathered, that the Britaines were together with Hercules at the rape of Heſione, and that, out of theſe verſes which they take to bee made by Cornelius Nepos, whiles he deſcribeth the marriage of Telamon and Heſione:

— Et in aurea pocula fuſi

That

That is altogether poetically, and I can cleerely by good evidences, as it were, under hand and seale prove, that the author thereof, was not, as the Germans would have it, Cornelius Nepos, but one Ioseph of Excester: who hath made mention of our King Henrie the second, and Thomas, Archbishop of Canterbury.

Whether Ulysses entred thus farre, whose arrivall in Caledonia, a certaine is engraven with Greeke letters, as Solinus saith, hath testified, Brodæus maketh doubt, and I would judge, that erected it was rather in the honour of Ulysses, than by Ulysses himselfe: although they avouch Ulysses to bee the very same Elizza, that Japheth sonne. For, apparant it is out of Histories, and already I have said as much, that the most ancient Greeks undertooke long voyages by sea and land: no more, then it ought to seeme, if their be also some names and monuments of theirs found in divers places. And often times they derived those names, not so much from their owne denominations, as from Worthies, who were held in as much reverence, if more, among them, as were either Confessors or Martyrs among Christians. Like therefore the names of Saint John, Saint Dominicke, Saint Francis, and infinite other Saints departed, are imposed upon new-found places, so also that it happened time of mind with the Greeks, who will denie: but who among all the worthies, made either more wandring voyages, or of longer continuance at Sea, than did Ulysses? No marvel then, if Sailers made vowes very often unto him above all others; and unto those places where they arrived and landed, did consecrate according to the vowes, names from him. Thus * Ulyssippo upon the mouth of the river Tagus tooke the name: and thus elsewhere other monuments of Ulysses, Lactes and their companions; which are not properly to be referred unto Ulysses as the founder: but we must think, that by the Greeks who discovered strange and forraine coasts, they were dedicated in the honour of that Worthy, who of all others had travelled and seen most.

Whereas John Tzetzes in his Treatise intituled, Varietie of Stories, hath written that our British Kings bestowed upon that renowned Cato the elder, who had perpetual conflict with the manners of the Roman people, certaine presents for his troubles sake; let him make good and save his owne credit himselfe: yet thus much the world knoweth, how that Writer is full fraught with fables.

Neither would I have you believe, that Alexander the Great came out of the East Indies, to Gades, and so forward to Britaine, howsoever Cedrenus, many all other Historiographers, writeth thus: Εκ τούτου δὲ τοῦ Αἰγυπτίου καὶ τοῦ Περσικοῦ ἱστορικοῦ that is, And from thence being come unto Phasis, Gades, the British nation, and having furnished himselfe with a thousand hulkes &c. Of the same stampe is that also which Trithemius reporteth out of Hunnibald, that Basianus put away his wife, the King of the Orkneys daughter, in the 284. yeare before the birth of Christ, and thereupon he with the aid of the Britaines Kings, made warre upon Basianus.

Nor let any man thinke that Hanniball ever warred in Britaine, because wee read thus in Polybius in the Eclogues of his tenth Booke οὗτος δὲ ἦν ὁ Ἰνδὸς, οὗτος δὲ ἦν ὁ Περσικὸς ἱστορικός Thus much in brieft; now that Hanniball was enclosed within the straits of Britaine.

For the place is corrupt, and for οὗτος δὲ ἦν ὁ Περσικὸς ἱστορικός, as it is in Dionysius booke 42. For in both places there is a speech of the Brutii in Italie. And yet I may deny, but that about this time the Greeks came to our Island. For, Athenæus in describing out of Moschion a most ancient author, that ship of Hiero, at the hugeness and workmanship whereof all men wondred, reporteth, that the maine mast thereof was with much adoe found by a certaine swineheard in the mountaines of Britaine, and by Phileas Taurominites the Mechanick conveyed into Sicillie. But I feare, lest the Criticks judge that the true reading here also should bee οὗτος δὲ ἦν ὁ Περσικὸς ἱστορικός for οὗτος δὲ ἦν ὁ Περσικὸς ἱστορικός, and likewise understand it of the Brutian mountaine in Italy.

But it seemeth, that the Britaines were entermingled with the Cimbri and the Gauls in those expeditions which were made into Italy and Greece. For, besides the name common to them both, it is recorded in a most ancient British Booke entitled Triadum, wherein mention is made of three mightie hosts leaved from among Britans, That a certaine forraine captaine leaved a marvellous puissant army from hence, which having wasted a great part of Europe, at the last sat him downe and a hard by the Greekish sea (meaning perhaps Gallatia). That Brennus a King so famous in Greek and Latine writers both, was a Britan, there be that thinke they can easily prove. For mine owne part, thus much onely I know, that his name is not yet come out of use with the Britans, who in their language call a King Brennin, whence in honorable memory of him I dare not determine. Certes, that Britomarus the famous captaine among them, of whom Florus and Appian speake, was a Britan, the same doth evince, which signifieth as much, as A great Britan. Neither will I say to my purpose for to make the said Brennus a Britan borne, that place of Strabo, wherein he writeth, That Brennus was by birth a Praufian. Ne yet dare I (wherein Ortho Frisingensis writeth, That the Briones, a generation of the Cimbri, seated themselves at the head of the river Dravus.) change Briones into Britones. And yet dare not our Criticks doe now daies?

But yet truly, to speake my mind once for all: As the Romans for all they grew that greatnesse above others, were not for a long time knowne, either to Herodotus or to the Greeks; the Gauls also and the Spaniards for many yeares utterly unknowne to the old Historiographers: so, of this mind I have alwaies beene, that late it were the Greeks and Romans heard of the Britans name. For, that little booke, The World, which commonly goeth abroad under the name of Aristotle, and maketh mention of the Britans, of Albion and Hierne, is not so ancient as the time where Aristotle lived, but of later daies by far, as the best learned men have judged. Pomponius verily, the famous Historian, who accompanying that noble Scipio travelled over a great part of Europe cccclxx. yeares or there about before Christs nativitie, is an ancient author; as far as I remember, that mentioneth the Britan Isles, where he saith: Of the utmost Ocean, the Britan Isles, the plenty of tynne, gold and silver in Spaine, the writers with different opinions, have reported much. But they seeme to have beene more than by name may be gathered by this hee writeth before in the same booke. Whatsoever, saith he, betwene Tanis and Narba bendeth Northward, to this day there is no man knoweth: and whoever they be, that either speake or write any thing thereof, they doe but dreame. And no lesse may they seeme to do in these daies, who in a prodigious humour of credulitie are perswaded, that Himilco being commanded by the King of Carthage to discover the Westerne sea-coast of Europe, entred into this many yeares before that time, seeing we have no records of the said navigation, but onely a verse or two in Festus Avienus. But why it was so late ere Britaine was knowne, the reason may seeme to be, partly the scite of the Island so remote and distanced from the continent: and in part, for that those old Britans, then barbarous as other people in these parts, and living close to themselves, had no great commerce and traffique with other nations. And surely in this point Dio is of the same opinion. The ancientest, saith he, as well of Greeks as Romans knew not for certaine so much as that there was any Britaine at all: and those of later times after them, made question whether it was the maine or an Island: and much writing there was pro & contra of both opinions, by those who verily had no assured knowledge thereof (as who had neither seene the country nor learned of the native inhabitants of what nature it was) but relied onely upon bare conjectures every one according to his time and diligence employed that way. But the first Latine writer to my knowledge, that made mention of Britaine, was Lucretius in these verses concerning the difference of aire:

Et quod in Aegypto est, quâ mundi claudicat axis?*

For aite, what difference is there in Britaine Ile thinke we,
And Egypt land, where Artick pole to stoupe men plainly see?
Now that Lucretius lived but a little before Cæsar, no man denieth: at what time heare taught out of Cæsar himselfe, that Divitiacus King of the * Soissons, and the most mightie Prince of all Gaule governed Britaine. But this is to bee understood of the maritime coasts. For Cæsar himselfe witnesseth, that no part of Britaine, save the sea-side, and those countreys which lie against Gaule, was knowne unto the Gauls. Howbeit, Diodorus Siculus writeth, that Britaine had experience of the reiners rule: for neither * Dionysius, nor Hercules, nor any other Worthy or Durable Acts is called Divus, was the first that subdued the Britans, and forced them to certain tribute.

Historicall.

From this time and no further off, must the writer of our Historic fetch his beginning, of his worke, if he thoroughly weigh with judgement what the learned hath in times past written, and my selfe already heretofore signified: Namely, there bee of times three differences: the first from the creation of man unto the Flood or Deluge, which for the ignorance of those daies is called AAHAON, that is, scure & uncertaine: the second from the Flood to the first Olympias, (being 3189 years after the Creation, and 774. before Christ) which in regard of many fabulous names reported in that time, is named MOIKON, that is, Fabulous: the third from the first Olympias unto our daies, and that is termed ISTOPION, that is, Historicall, because the Acts therein done, are contained in true Histories. And yet I am not ignorant, that albeit the learned nations (setting aside the Hebrews) have attained to knowledge of nothing before this age, yet the British History of Geoffrey, touching three hundred and thirtie yeares before the first Olympias, being a very ignorant age in these parts, which he called Fabulous. And even from hence, feare least the ground-woke being ill laid, the rest of the building would goe on better, because both the present place seemeth to require it, and also from it the slight may arise to the traine of the narration ensuing; let mee summarily gather matter here and there briefly deliver the acts of the Romans in Britaine, not onely feined fables, which were vanitie to recite, and meere folly to beleve, but out of incorrupt and ancient monuments: wherein, I will not intercept matter of glory or commendation from them, who shall take in hand to pursue this argument in ample manner.

When Fortitude and Fortune were so agreed, or Gods appointment rather had thus decreed, that Rome should subdue all earth, Caius Julius Cæsar, having now by conquests overcome Gauls, to the end, that by a successive traine of victories achieved both by land and sea, he might joyne those Lands together which nature had severed, (as if the Roman would not suffice) cast an eye unto the Ocean; and in the four and fiftieth yeare before the incarnation of Christ, endeavored to make a journey into Britaine; either for that in all his Gaulish warre, there was under-hand aid from thence, or because the Britaines had received the * Hellogari were runne from him, or as Suetonius writeth, allured with hope of the Britpearles, the bignesse and weight whereof hee was wont to prize, and trie by his hand, or rather upon an ardent desire of glorie: which wee must most easily believe, considering that he rejected the Embassadors of the Britaines, who having intelligence of his designement, repaired unto him, and promised to put in hostages, and to become obedient to the Roman Empire.

But his entrance into the Island, I will compendiously set down, even in his own very words: Considering the coasts, ports, and landing places of Britaine, were not well knowne unto Cæsar, he sent C. Volusenus before with a galley, to discover what he might: who, having taken what view of the countrey hee could in five daies space, returned. In the meantime, the resolution of Cæsar being made knowne unto the Britans by merchants, many particular States sent their Embassadors to him into Gallia, promising both to put in pledges, also to submit themselves unto the Roman Empire. Having then exhorted these to continue in that mind still, he sent them home backe againe, and together with them Comius of Arras, a man in those countreys of great authoritie, (for the * Atrebatens had before time started out of Gaule, and planted themselves there) to perswade the said Cities and States to accept of the friendship and protection of the people of Rome. No sooner was hee set a foot on shore, but the Britaines cast him into prison and hung him upon him. Meane while, Cæsar having gotten together and put in readinesse about fourescore ships of burden, for the transporting of two Legions, and eightene others besides, which hee appointed for the * Morini at the third watch, and a * The coast of Picardy, sent out to sea from the countrey of the * Morini at the third watch, and at the fourth houre of the day arrived upon the coast, at an unfit landing place: the billes lay so steepe over the sea, that from the higher ground a dart or javelin might be cast upon the shore beneath. Having therefore at one time both wind and tide with him, hee weighed anchor, and sailed eight miles from that place unto a plaine and open shore, where hee rid at anchor. But the Britaines perceiving the Romans determination, sent horse and chariots before, and there kept the Romans from landing. Here the Romans exceeding much distressed; For, the ships were so great, that they could not ride nere the shore, where the sea was ebbe: the souldiers in strange and unknowne places, being then with heauey armour, were at one instant to leape downe of necessitie from those tall ships, withall to stand amid the very billowes, and to fight with their enemies: whereas contrariwise the Britaines were perfect in the knowledge of those places, lightly appointed, as being all parts of their bodies at libertie, fought either from the dry shore where they had footing, or wading not farre into the water. Hereupon the Romans being terrified, behaved not themselves with the like courage and alacritie as before time. But after that Cæsar caused the Gallies to be remoored from those hulkes, to bee rowed and laid against the open side of the Britaines, and so from thence the enemye to be beaten backe, and displaced with slings, ordinance, and shot of arrowes; the Britans being troubled with the strange forme of those Gallies, the stirring of the Oares, and the ununsual kind of their engines, recoiled. Then the Eagle-bearer of the tenth Legion, earnestly beseeching the Gods, that it might fall out happily for the Legion: Leape downe, quoth he, my fellow souldiers, unlesse ye will forsake your standard and betray it into the enemies hands: For mine owne part, I will bee sure to doe my devoir both to the common weale and also to my Generall: so forthwith hee cast himselfe into the sea; and began to advance the * Eagle against the enemye: so, all the rest followed hard at his heeles (But if we believe * Julian, Cæsar himselfe was the first that came downe from his ship). The fight on both parts was very eager. The Romans encombred with their heauey armor and weapons, tossed with the waves, were not able to get any firme footing; and put out of array, were wonderfully troubled; untill the time as Cæsar had caused the ship-boats, pinnaces and smaller vessels to bee manned with souldiers; and when he saw need of helpe sent them to rescue such as were overboard. As soone as the Romans got footing on the dry land, they made head together, and forced the Britaines and put them to flight: but they were not able to follow them in chase, want of the horsemen, that were not arrived in the Island. The Britaines being overcome in battell, presently dispatched Embassadors unto Cæsar to treat of peace, and to deliver with themselves the foresaid Comius of Arras; whom they had detained bound in prison, and withall, laid the fault upon the multitude, and excused all by their owne ignorance. Hee soon pardoned them, and commanded hostages to be delivered unto him: which they readily performed in part, and gave their word to bring in the rest. Thus was peace concluded four daies after that Cæsar was landed in Britaine.

At the same time, those eightene ships which transported the horsemen, approaching so neere the coast of Britanny that they were within view, by reason of a suddaine tempest that rose, were cast upon the west part of the Island: from whence with much ado they recovered the continent of France. In the same night also it hapned, that the Moone being in full, and the tides very high, both the Gallies which were drawne up to the shore, were shaken with the tide, and the ships of burden also that lay at anchor, so shaken with the tempest, that they became altogether unserviceable. This being knowne to the Princes of Britaine, when they understood also, that the Romans now wanted horsemen, shipping, and provision provision of corne, they rebelled and resolved to cut off their provision of grain suspecting that which fell out indeed, brought corne daily out of the fields into his camp with the timber and other stuffe of those twelve ships which were most weather beaten and dismembred, repaired the rest. While these things were in action, the seventh Legion sent out to fetch in corne, and busie in reaping, the Britains suddenly set upon, and so the horsemen and chariots all at once, encompassed them round about.

Assedart, Chariotiers.

The manner of their fight from out of these chariots, is thus, as I related a little First, they ride up and downe into all parts, and cast their darts; and with the vehemence of the horses, and rattling of the wheeles, often times disorder the ranks, and have wound themselves betwene any troups of horsemen, they forsake their chariots and fight on foot. In the meane time the guiders of the chariots, drive a little a side out of the way, and place their chariots so, as that if the other chance to bee overcharged with multitude of enemies, they might have an easie passage unto them againe. Thus they performe all their fights the nimble motion of horsemen, and the firme stabilitie of footmen: with daily practise & exercise, that in the declivity of a steepe hill, they could stay the in the very full carriere, quickly turn short, & moderate their pace, run along the beam of the Chariot, stand upon the yoke and harness of the horses, yea, and from thence thrice into their chariots againe. But by the coming of Caesar to rescue them in so good time, the Romans took heart afresh, and the Britains stood still, who having conceived good hope of themselves for ever, presuming upon the small number of the Roman forces, together with the scarcitie of corne among them, had assembled a great power, and were come into the camp of Caesar. But he received them even before the campe with a battell, put them to many of them, and burnt their houses far and neare. The same day came messengers from the Britains to Caesar, intreating peace, which they obtained: upon condition, that they should bring the number of their hostages, whom he commanded to be brought into Gaul. And after, because the * Aquinox was at hand, hee put to sea, hoised saile from Britaine, brought all his ships safe unto the continent of France. And thither, two onely of all the of Britaine sent hostages unto him, the rest neglected it. These exploits thus performed on the relation of Caesars Letters, the Senate decreed a solemne procession for the twentieth daies: although he gained nothing to himselfe, nor to Rome, but the glorious an expedition enterprized.

* In Autumn or September, when daies and nights are equall.

Dio. lib. 39.

The yeare next ensuing, Caesar having gotten together a great fleet, for what was for convey of corne and victuals, and what with other private vessels that every one built for to serve his owne turne, there was 800. saile and above, and the same with five Legions, and 2000. horsemen, he launched from the port called * Iccius, ded his forces in that part of the Isle, where hee did the yeare before. Neither was enimie to be scene in the place. For albeit the Britains had bene there assembled with power, yet terrified with so huge a number of ships, they had secretly withdrawn selves into the upland country. Here Caesar encamped in a place convenient, and cohorts, and three hundred horsemen as a garrison or guard for his ships. Himselfe he might marched forward twelve miles, espied the enemies: who having gone forward as to the river, began to give battell: but beaten backe by the cavallery, they committed themselves into a wood, and there lay hid, as lodging in a place strongly fortified, both by nature and mans hand. But the Romans with a Testudo, or target-roofe, which they may mount that they raised against their fortifications, tooke the place, and drove them into the woods; neither followed they them with any long pursuit, for they were to fortifie the that very place.

* Neere Calai.

The next day, Caesar divided his forces into three regiments, and sent them out to sue the Britains: but straightwaies called them back againe, for that hee had intelligence by messengers of such a tempest at sea the night before, that his navie was fore beaten, and against another, and cast on shore. And thereupon himselfe in person returned to the land, and with the labour of ten daies haled them all up to land, and enclosed them and his together within one and the same fortification, and so goeth to the place from whence he returned. Thither also had the Britains assembled themselves with greater forces, and conduct of Cassivellaunus or Cassibelinus, unto whom, in a publike counsell of all the

the whole government and managing of the warre was committed; whose cavallery and chariots together, gave the Romanes a sharpe conflict in their march, wherein many of the Brits lost their lives: But the Britans after some intermission of time, whiles the Romanes were busie in fortifying their campe, charged fiercely upon those that kept ward before the campe, unto whom when Caesar had sent for rescue two cohorts, and those the principall and choicest of two legions, they most boldly, and with full resolution, brake through the thickest of the enemies, and from thence retired in safety. The next morrow, the Britans bewed themselves here and there in small companies from the hills; but about noone they made an assault upon three legions, and all the horsemen sent out for to forage, yet beaten backe they were, and a great number of them slaine. Now by this time were all their auxilliary forces that had met together, departed; neither encountered they afterward the Romanes with their maine power. Caesar then marched with his army to the river Thames, and so to the confines of Cassivellaunus: Upon the farther banke of this river, yea and under the water, they had covertly sticke sharpe stakes, and embattelled themselves with a great power. But the Romanes went and waded over with such violence, notwithstanding they had but their heads cleere above the water, that the enemy was not able to endure the charge, but left the banke, and betooke themselves to flight: not skared, as Polyenus writeth, at the sight of an Elephant with a turret upon his backe.

The river Thames.

Cassivellaunus having now no courage to contend any longer, retained onely foure thousand Chariotiers with him, and observed the Romanes journeys: and so often as their horsemen went forth and strayed out in the fields for forage or booty, he sent out his chariots, and kept them from ranging all abroad. Meane while, the * Trinobantes submit themselves unto Caesar, and intreated that he would defend Mandubratius (whom Eutropius and Bede out of the Fragments of Suetonius now lost, call Androgorius, and our Britans Androgeus) from the oppression of Cassivellaunus, and send him unto them to be their soveraign. Of them Caesar required and received forty hostages, and corne for his army, and thereunto sent Mandubratius. Then the * Cenimagni, * Segontiaci, * Ancalites, * Bibroci and * Cassi, following the example of the Trinobantes yielded unto Caesar: By whom he understood, that Cassivellaunus his towne was not far off, fortified with woods and bogs: which as he assaulted in two severall places, the Britans flung out at a back-way: but many of them in their flight were taken and put to the sword.

Trinobantes: * Where now Essex and Middlesex lie. Mandubratius, who also is named Androgous. Now Suffolk, Norfolk, Cambridge, Huntingdon-shires.

Whiles these things were a doing, foure petty Kings that ruled Kent, to wit Cingetorix, Carvilius, Taximagulus and Segonais, by a mandate from Cassivellaunus did set upon the campe where the Romanes navy was kept, but by a sally that the Romanes made, they were driven backe: and Cingetorix one of the said Kings was taken prisoner. Then Cassivellaunus, having received so many losses, and troubled most of all with the revolt of the states, sent Embassadour to Caesar by Catus of * Arras, tending unto him a surrendry. Whereupon Caesar, being determined to winter in the continent of France, commanded pledges to be brought unto him, and imposed a yearly tribute that Britaine should pay unto the people of Rome. But withall he inhibited Cassivellaunus and commanded him to doe no harme either to Mandubratius or the Trinobantes. And thus with a great number of captives he embarked his army, and transported it backe at two severall passages. Thus much Caesar of his owne warre in Britaine.

But Eutropius out of some writings of Suetonius now not extant, addeth thus much moreover. Scava one of Caesars souldiers, with foure other fellow servitors, crossed over sea before, in a small barke unto a rocke neere the Island, and by the reflow or ebbe of the Ocean the while, was there left. The Britans many in number set upon the Romanes being but few: howbeit the rest who here and there had been his companions returned in a ship: Scava tarieth behind still undanted, notwithstanding he was overlaid with darts from every side: First he made resistance with his pike or masie speare: and at length tooke him to his sword and fought alone with many of them. When he was weary and wounded, and had with all lost his helmet and target after many a stroke, with two habergeons he swum unto Caesars campe, and craved pardon of his Generall for his fool-hardy rashnesse: whom Caesar advanced to the honor and degree of a Centurion.

the second place, hath put downe in a Greeke Commentary of his, concerning the Romane Common-wealth) of such temperance he was, and so far short of the pomp of our age, that he had no more servants and attendants ordinarily in his domestick retinue, but three.

What time as Cæsar, saith Seneca, travelled into Britaine, and could not containe his owne felicitie within the Ocean, he heard that his daughter was departed this life, drawing with her a traine of publike calamities, But he passed over this griefe of heart as lightly as was wont all things else. Being returned with conquest out of Britaine, he dedicated unto Venus genitrix in her temple, a breast-plate made of British pearles. Some of his British prisoners, he appointed for services in the Theatre, and about these rich hangings of Tapestry there, wherein he had woven in colours his victories in Britaine. Which the Britans were wont, being themselves therein wrought, to remove and take away whereupon Virgill,

Let Britans purple Tapestry rid, wherein themselves are wrought.

Neither were the Britans appointed to the ministeries, and offices onely about the Theatre, but also (I note it by the way) to the Emperors Lictor, as it appeareth manifestly by an antique inscription of this age, wherein there is made mention of a De curio, over the British Lictor-bearers. Of this victorie of Cæsar, an old Poet hath thus written:

Vix invicta viri reparata classe Britannos

Vicit, & hostiles Rheni compefcuit undas.

Lo here the mans undaunted heart! with navie rigged new,
He Britans vanquish'd, and fell waves of Rhene he did subdue.

Hitherto may be referred those verses also of Claudian, touching the valour of the Romanes.

Nec stetit Oceano, remisq; ingressa profundum, Vincendos alio quæsit in orbe Britannos.

In Ocean rhode it rested not, nor put to sea for nought,
But Britads in their otherworld, for conquest sake it fought.

Moreover Cicero in a certaine Poemenow lost, which hee entituled Quadrigas, caried Cæsar in poetickall Chariots of triumph, through the midst of all praise and commendation, for his acts achieved in Britaine, as Ferrerius of Piemont perswaderth us: for thus he writeth, Pingam Britanniam coloribus tuis, penecillo autem meo, that is, I will depaint Britaine in your colours, but with mine owne pencill. Howbeit in the judgement of others, he terrified onely the Britans with a fortunate fight, or as Lucane (who nothing favoured the house of the Cæsars) wrote;

Territa quæsit ostendit terga Britannis.

He fought the Britans, and for feare to them his backe he shew'd.

And Tacitus a right grave and substantiall author, writeth, That he discovered onely, but delivered not unto the Romanes, Britaine: and Horace implieth, that he scant touched them at all, when to flatter Augustus, hee saith, That the Britaine was not medled withall, in these words:

Intactus Britannus ut descenderet

Sacrâ catenatus uia:

Or that the Britans heretofore not dealt withall in fight,
Might, chained now, the sacred street descend, in all mens fight.

And Propertius,

Te manet invictus Romano Marte Britannus.

The Britans yet unconquered by Romanes, stay for thee.

So farre it is off, that it should be true which Velleius Paternulus, a flattering Historian of the Emperours Court wrote, Bis penetrata Britannia à Cæsare, that is, twice Cæsar passed through Britaine, when as hee scarce made entry into it: For many yeeres after this entrance of Cæsar, this Island was left to the free government of their owne Kings, and used their owne Lawes.

Augustus

Augustus seemeth of purpose, and with good advise to have neglected Britaine, when as he called that * Consilium, as Tacitus saith, that is, Politicie, or a point of state, haply because it was thought the best pollicie, and safest for the State, That the Romane Empire should be kept, and held within bounds, to wit, the Ocean, the rivers Ister and Euphrates limites set by nature, to the end it might be a State Adamantine, (for so Augustus himselfe speaketh in Julian,) that is, invincible; and left, as a ship of exceeding great bulke, it might not possibly bee well governed and managed; but endangered through the owne unweldy hugeness to sinke anone, and fall downe at once, which usually befallerth unto over-great States: or, as Strabo is of opinion, he despised it, seeing neither any cause at all of feare, nor hope of much profit from the Britans; and yet it seemed, that no small dammage would be presented from other nations, lying round about the said Island. But what cause so ever it was, certes, after Iulius, and the edge of Romane armes turned upon the Common-wealth it selfe, Britaine was a long time forgotten, even in time of peace. Neverthelesse at last Augustus departed from Rome, with a purpose to transerre the warre into Britaine: At which verie time Iostatus framed this kinde of prayer unto the Goddesse Fortune at Antium.

Serves iturum Cæsarem in ultimos

Orbis Britannos.

Save Cæsar now that readie is, a journey long to take,

Against the Britans most remote, a conquest there to make.

But after he was come into Gaule, the Britans sent Embassadors unto him to crave peace: and verily the British Princes and Potentates, having by Embassages and dutifull services obtained his amity, dedicated presents and oblations in the Capitol: and brought the whole Island in a manner to be familiar unto the Romanes, and as it were their owne: so as they could endure taxes and imposts, which now are nothing grievous unto them, raised out of such merchandise and commodities as are shipped to and from out of Gaule and Britannie: and those be Ivory workes, Bits and bridles, chaines and wreathes, * *vessels of the mettall * Electrum* and of glasse, with other base and common wares of like sort. And therefore there needes no garrison for that Island. For it would require one Legion at the least, and some horsemen; if tributes were to be levied from thence: and the said tributes would but countervaile the charges of maintaining a garrison there: for of necessity by imposing a tribute, the revenues coming by tollage and poundage and such like imposts, would be lesse: and if any violent course were used, some perill or other must be looked for. The yeare following likewise, Augustus intended a second expedition into Britain, because there was some variance about the Covenants: but by occasion of some insurrection made in Spaine by the Cantabri and others, that journey was staid. Neither hath any man reason to believe Landinus, or Servius, or Philargyrus, who have recorded that Augustus triumphed over the Britans, and that out of these verses of Maro.

Et duo rapta manu diverso ex hoste trophaa,

Bigâ triumphatas utroq; a littore gentes.

And trophies twaine caught by strong hand from divers enemies hoasts,
And nations twice triumphed of likewise from both the * coasts.

Surely, in regard of that surrendry of the Britans, Horace wrote thus;

Cælo tonantem credimus Iovem

Regnare: Præsens Divus habebitur

Augustus, adjectis Britannis

Imperio, gravibusq; Persis.

We thought before, that Jupiter in heaven above doth raigne
For thundering there: but now shall be on earth Augustus here Reputed God, because he did to Romanes Empire gaine
Both Britans and fierce Persians, of whom they stood in feare.

Tiberius nothing transported with an inordinate desire of extending the Empire, seemeth to have rested in that Counsell of Augustus; For hee brought out a booke written with Augustus his owne hand, wherein was contained the whole wealth and estate of the common-weale, what number as well of Romane Citizens as Allies were in arms, how many Navies, Kingdomes and Provinces, what tributes and imposts [belonged to the State] with a resolution annexed thereto of containing the Empire within the bounds. What advice and resolution of Augustus contented him so well, as Tacitus reporteth, that he would attempt nothing in Britaine, nor maintaine any garrison or deputies there. But whereas Tacitus reckoneth up the number of Legions, and what coasts or countries they defended at that time, he maketh no mention at all of Britain. And yet it seemeth that the Britans entertained amity with the Romans. For when as at the same time Germanicus failed the Ocean, some of his company by force of tempest driven to this Iland, were by the Princes thereof sent backe againe.

C. Caligula.

That Caius Caesar cast in his mind to enter this Iland, it is certaine: but that by his shittie braine, sudden repentance, and wonderfull attempts against Germany, it came to nothing. For to the end that he might terrifie Britain and Germany (over which he hovered) with the fame of some mighty piece of worke, he made a bridge between Baie and the Piles of Puteoli, three miles, and 600. paces in length. But having achieved no greater exploit, than taken to his mercy Adminius the sonne of Cinobellinus King of the Britans, who being by his father banished had fled over sea with small power and traine about him, he sent magnificent and glorious letters to Rome, as if the whole Ile had beene yielded up into his hands: warning and wishing the posts ever anon, to ride forward in their wagon, directly into the market place and the Curia: and in wise to deliver the said misdeeds unto the Consuls, but in the temple of Mars, and therein frequent assembly of the Senate.

Suetonius in Caligula,

Adminius,

After this to the Ocean he marcheth, as if he minded to translate the warre over into Britaine: Where even upon the very shore he embattelled his souldiers: himselfe tooke scaine Galley, and after he had lancht out a little way from the land, returned againe, and then mounting up an high pulpit, sate him downe, gave his souldiers the signall of battell, and commanded the trumpets to sound: and soon a sudden charged them to gather cockles, muskles, and other small shell-fishes. Having gotten these spoiles (as one indeed wanting enemies spoiles for to adorne a Trophye) he waxed proud as if he had conquered the Ocean: and having rewarded his souldiers, he brought some of those cockles, and the other shell fish to Rome, that there also he might shew the bootie which he had gotten. In token and memoriall of this brave victory he raised an high turret, out of which, as from a watch-tower, there might blaze all night long, lights and fires for the better direction of ships at sea in their course. The ruins whereof are sometimes seene at a low water in the shore of Holland, and by the people there inhabiting is called Britenbuus. Who also finde oftentimes stones engraven with letters: of which one had these Characters, C. C. P. F. which they (I wote not how truly) expound thus Caius Caligula Pharum Fecit, that is, Caius Caligula the Pharum made. But of this watch-tower more at large, I will write in my discourse of British Islands.

Claudius.

Afterwards, the inland parts of Britaine, wasted rather with Civil warres and factions, than by the force of the Romans, after sundry overthrowes and slaughters of both sides, came at the length by little and little under the subjection of the Romans. For, while the States fought severally one by one, they were all vanquished: running so one upon anothers destruction, that untill they fell to utter confusion, they had not in grosse, a feeling of the particular losses that each one sustained. And thus farre forth also wrought ambition in them, that many became false and disloyall, yea, and some fled from their country-men, making choise of the Romans protection, swearing allegiance unto them, and practising by all meanes to subject their native country, unto their government. Among whom the principall was one Bericus, who moved and persuaded Claudius the Emperour, to give the attempt upon Britaine, which none assaied to doe since the time of Julius Caesar, and which then was up in a broile and commotion, for that the said Fugitives were not rendered againe unto them. Whereupon he commanded Aulus Plautius, at that time Prator, to goe with an Army into Britaine: who had much ado to withdraw the said army out of Gaul, as being much dissatisfied to make warre without the compasse of the world; and therefore drawing out the time in length with many delays. But when Narcissus sent from Claudius, began to mount up into the Tribunal of Plautius, and to make a speech unto the host the souldiers more incensed with indignation straightwaies cried all at once, Io. Saturnalia (for the manner is of Slaves, during the Saturnalia, to celebrate that festivall time in the habit of their Masters) and so presently with willing hearts followed Plautius. The forces being divided into three parts, for feare lest if they arrived all in one place, they might be put by their landing; carried backe by a gale of wind, found some trouble in their passage: yet taking heart againe, because as they sailed along, there was seene a fire drake in the Element shooting from the East the West, they were conveyed over into the Island, and no man stopped them. For the Britans supposing verily, in regard of those things which I have related, that they would not come, had not assembled themselves: and therefore without any conflict, they lay hidden within bogs, marshes, and woods, in hope by lingring delays to wearie the Romans, that they should be forced without any service exploited to retire hence, like as it had befallen unto Julius Caesar. Wherefore, Plautius tooke great paines in seeking of them out. After he had found them (now they were not free States, but ruled under divers Kings) first he discomfited Caractacus, afterward Togodumnus, the sonnes of Cunobellinus, for their father was deceased. When these were fled, part of the Bodunni, who were subject to Catuellani, he received into his protection: and having left a garrison there, he went forward to a certaine river: but because the Britans thought the Romans could not possibly passe over without a bridge, they lay encamped more carelessly on the farther side thereof. Plautius therefore, set the Germanes, who were wont to wade through the most swift and violent rivers, even in their very armour. These comming upon the enemies at unawares, hurt not a man of them, but wounded the horses onely that drew their chariots, who when they were troubled and disordered, the men were not able to sit them. Then sent hee Flavius Vespasianus, (who afterwards became Emperour) and his brother Sabinus with him as Lieutenant, who likewise having passed over the river, surprised very many of the Barbarians, and slew them. Neither fled the rest away, but the morrow after joyned battell, where in the victorie remained doubtfull: untill such time as C. Sidius Geta, at the very point to have beene taken prisoner by the enemies, vanquished them so, as that for his good service, triumphall honours were granted unto him, although he had not been Consul. From thence the Barbarians retired themselves to the river Thames, where it dischargeth it selfe into the sea, and with the slowe thereof riseth high.

This river they soone passed over, as being skilfull of such places as would afford them firme footing, and were passable fords. And the Romans in pursuing them were in danger. Soone after, when the Germanes had swum over a second time whiles some of them, passed over at a bridge, higher up the river, environing the Barbarians on every side, they made a great slaughter of them: but when unadvisedly they followed after the rest, they fell upon blind bogs and lost many of their men. Hereupon, and for that the Britans by occasion of Togodumnus his death abated not their courage one whit, but rather prepared themselves to fight the more fiercely in revenge of his death, Plautius for feare went no farther: but setting a guard to keep what he had gotten, sent for Claudius, having a warrant and commandement so to doe, in case he were overlaid with any extraordinary violence. For which expedition among much other Equipage, Elephants also were gotten together and prepared. Claudius advertised of these newes, committed the affaires of the City, and the souldiers likewise to the charge of Vitellius (upon whom, as also upon himselfe, he had conferred a Consulship for six moneths). Then went he downe in person by water from Rome to Ostia, and so from thence sailed to Marshills: and travelling the rest of the way partly by land and partly by sea came to the Ocean, embarked, crossed the channell into Britaine, and went directly forward to his forces expecting him by the Thames side. When he had received them into his owne charge, and passed over the river, he fought a set battell with the Barbarians, assembled against his comming, and obtained victory. Then tooke he in Camalodunum the roiall seat of Cunobellinus, and many thence he drave, others upon their yielding he tooke to mercy. For these acts performed, divers times he was stiled Emperator, a thing directly against the Romanes custome; for, lawfull it is not in one war to assume that name oftner than once. Furthermore, Claudius disarmed the Britans, and committed as well them to be governed, as the rest to be subdued, unto Plautius. Himselfe made speede Rome, sending before him Pompeius and Silanus his * sonnes in Law, with tidings of the victorie. Thus much Dio.

Howbeit Suetonius reporteth, that part of the Iland he tooke into his hands upon submission without any battell or bloodshed. Sixteene daies or thereabout himselfe stayed in Britain: in which time he remitted unto the Gentry and Nobility of the Britans the confiscation of their goods: For which benefit of his, they frequented his temple and adored him as a God. Thus returned he to Rome, in the first moneth after that he went forth from thence.

So great a matter it was and of such consequence to have conquered even so small a parcell of Britain, that the Senate thereupon decreed in the honor of Claudius, yearly Games, triumphall Arches both in Rome and also at * Gessoriacum in Gaul, and most honorable and stately triumph: to the beholding whereof the governors of Provinces also, yea and certaine banished persons were permitted to come into Rome: the Navall coronet was fixed upon the loure of the Palace, as it were the ensigne of the British sea subdued by him: the Provinces brought in Crownes of gold, and * Gallia Comara one above the rest, waighing 9. pounds: and the hither part of Spaine another of 7. pound weight. He mounted up into the Capitoll by the staires on his knees, supported and heaved up by his sonnes in Law on either side. He entered in triumphing wife the * Adriaticke sea, embarked in a vessell more like to some exceeding great house than a ship. Unto his wife Messalina was allowed by the Senate the highest place to sit in, as also to ride in a Carroch, or hanging coach. After this, he set forth triumphall plaies and games, having taken upon him for that purpose the Consular office and authoritie. The solemnities were exhibited at once in two Theatres, and many times when hee was gone aside from the fight, others had the charge thereof. Horse runnings for the prize hee promised as many as those daies would admit: Howbeit above ten there were not: for betwene every course of horses, Beares were killed, champions performed their devoirs, and choyce boies sent for out of Asia danced the warlike dance in armor. Moreover, upon Valerius Asiaticus, Julius Silanus, Silius Geta, and others, in regard of this conquest, hee heaped Triumphall ornaments. He suffered Licinius Crassus Frugi to follow after himselfe in this triumph, mounted upon a trapped courser with a rich caparison, and arraigned in a roabe of Date tree worke. Upon Posidius the Eunuch hee bestowed a speare staffe without an head: upon C. Gavius, cheines, bracelets, horse-trappings, and a coronet of gold, as is to be seene in an ancient marble at Taurinum.

In the meane time Aulus Plautius went on with the reliques of this war, and sped so well in his battels, that Claudius passed a decree, that he should ride in pety triumph ovant: and when he was entred into the City, himselfe went to meet him, giving him the right hand all the way both going and coming. And Vespasian even then shewed by the destinies, whom Claudius assumed unto him to beare a part of this British war, partly under the conduct of Claudius himselfe, and partly of Plautius, fought thirty battels with the enemy: two most mighty nations, and above twenty townes together, with the Isle of * Wight he subdued. For which worthy exploits, he received triumphall ornaments, and within a short space two facerottall dignities, with a Consulship beside which hee bare the two last moneths of the year. Thus also served here in quality of a Tribune under his father, with exceeding commendation for his industry and valour, (for valiantly he delivered his father when he was besieged): and no lesse report of his modest carriage: as appeareth by a number of his Images and titles to them annexed, thorowout the Provinces of Germanie and Britaine. The rest of the Occurrences which hapned in Britaine afterward unto the very latter end of Domitian, Tacitus, who best can do it, will declare by his owne words to this effect.

P. Ostorius Propator in Britan was welcomed at his first landing with troubles and tumults. The enemies ranged all over the Allies country, and used so much the greater violence, for that they thought the new capitaine was unacquainted with the army, (the winter also being now began) would not come forth to encounter. But he knowing well that the first successes alwaies breed either feare or confidence, gathered with all speed his readiest cohorts, advanced toward the enemy, and having slaine those which made head against him, pursued the rest that were dispered for feare they should joine againe: and left an basefull and faithlesse peace might give neither capitaine nor souldier any rest, he went about to disarme as many of them as he suspected, and by raising forts and setting garrisons upon the two rivers * Anfona and the * Severn to restrain and hem in the Britans. Which the Icenis first of all refused, a strong nation and unshaken with battels, because of their owne motion they had sought our alliance and amity. And at their instigation, the people adjoining chose a place to fight in, compassed about with a rude and rustical rampire, having a narrow entrance of purpose to hinder the coming in of horsemen. This sense the Romane capitaine, albeit he had under his conduct the power of his allies, alone without the maine forces of the Legion assaiesed to breake thorow: And having bestowed his cohorts in ranks setteth the troupes of horsemen in like readinesse to performe their service. Then after the signall given, they broke open the said rampire, and disordered the enemies encombred and penned within their owne hold. And they knowing in their owne conscience they were no better than rebels, and seeing all passages for escape stopped up, shewed great valour and courage in defending themselves. In which fight M. Ostorius the lieutenants sonne deserved the honor of saving a Citizen. Upon the discomfiture and slaughter of these Icenis, they that wavered betwene warre and peace became settled and were quiet: and so the army was led against the * Cangi. Whose territory they wasted, harried and spoiled all over: whiles the enemies durst not shew themselves in the field, or if privily by stealth they attempted to cut off the taile of our armie as they marched, they paid for their craft and deceit. Now by this time were the Romanes come well neere to the sea coast that looketh toward Ireland, when certaine troubles and discords sprung up among the * the Brigantes, brought their leader backe, being certainly resolved to attempt no new matters, before he had felled the old. But as for the Brigantes, some few being put to death that began first to take armes, he pardoned the residue, and all were quieted. The * Silures could neither by cruelty nor faire meanes bee reclaimed but they would needs war: and therefore no remedy there was but to keepe them under with garrisons of Legionary souldiers. Which to performe more easily, the colonie called Camalodunum consisting of a strong company of old souldiers was brought into the countries by conquest subdued, for succour and safeguard against Rebels, and an inducement to traine the Associates to observe the lawes. Certaine Cities and States were granted by way of Donation to King Cogidunus, according to the ancient custome of the people of Rome, that they might have even Kings to be instruments of servitude and abridalome.

Then went the Romanes from thence against the Silures, who besides their owne stoutnesse trusted much in the strength of Caractacus, a man whom many dangerous adventures which he had waded thorow, and as many prosperous exploits by him achieved, had so lifted up, that he carried the reputation and preheminence above all the British Commanders. But he in subtilcraft, and knowledge of the deceitfull waies, having the advantage of us, though otherwise weaker in strength of souldiers, translated the warre into the country of the * Ordovices: and here, joining to him as many as feared our peace, resolveth to bazarde the last chance, having chosen a place for the battell, where the coming in, and going forth, with all things else might be in commodious to us. But for his very advantageous. Then, against the high hills, and wheresoever there was any easie passage, or gentle access, he stopped up the way with heaps of stones raised in manner of a rampier: withall, there ranne hard by a river having a doubtful foord, and the severall companies of his * best souldiers had taken their standing before the fortifications. Besides all this, the leaders of every nation went about, exhorted and encouraged their men, by making lesse all causes of feare, and kindling in them good conceits of hope, with all other motives and inducements to war. And verily Caractacus bestirring himself, and courting from place to place, protested, That this was the day, this the battell, which should begin either the recovery of their libertie forever, or else perpetuall bondage. And here, he called upon his ancestors by name, who had chased Caesar the Dictator from hence, through whose valour they were freed from the Romane axes, and tribunes, and enjoyed still the bodies of their their wives, and children undefiled. As he uttered these and such like speeches, the general multitude of the souldiers made a noise about him, and bound themselves by oath every one according to the religion of his countrey, that they would not give way and yeeld; for any weapons or wounds whatsoever. This courageous and cheerefull alacrity of theirs, astonished the Roman captaine, considering the river just before his face, the rampier beside which they had cast up the high hills over their heads, nothing but terrible, and full of defendants, put him into a wondrous fright. Nevertheless the souldiers called hard for battell, crying still, that there was nothing which valour could not overcome. The Prefects and Tribunes also with like words, much enforced the ardour and courage of the whole armie. Then Ostorius having viewed round about what places were unpassable, and what yeelded passage, advanceth forward his men in boiling heat of choler, and easily wadeth over the river. Being come to the banke and rampier aforesaid, so long as the volley of darts continued on both sides, our men received more wounds, and in greater number were slaine. But after that by making of a target rooffe of fence, those rude and ill fashioned joyns of stones were plucked a sunder, and the fronts of both armies came close to hand-strokes, without ods; the Barbarians fled to the hill tops. But thither also, as well the heavie corslets, as the light armed souldiers brake in: whiles these shot their darts and javelins at them, the other preased thicke and close together upon them. Contrariwise the Britans ranks were broken and disordered, as who had neither head peece nor coat of fence. If they thought to resist our auxiliarie forces, they were beaten downe with the arming swords & masie pikes of the Legionarie souldiers: if they turned to make head against them, they were slaine with the Speares, and bastard swords of the auxiliaries. A noble and renowned victory this was. The wife and daughter both of Caractacus, were taken prisoners, his brethren also yeelded themselves. Himselfe, as generally there is no trusting to succour in adversitie, craving defence and protection of Cartismandua Queene of the Brigantes, was by her taken, bound with yrons, and delivered to the Conquerours, nine yeeres after the warre began in Britaine. Whereupon the same of him being carried over into the Islands, and spread abroad throughout the Provinces adjoining, was famous also in Italie: in so much as they desired to see who he was that so many yeeres had defied and contemned our forces. Neither was the name of Caractacus meanly esteemed of at Rome. And Caesar whiles he extolled his one worth and honour, made the conquered Prince more glorious. For why, the people also was assembled and called, as to see a notable spectacle. The cohorts of the Emperours guard stood all armed in good order within an open plaine lying before their campe. Then as King Caractacus his vassals and dependants marched before, the caparisons, chaines, and whatsoever he had wonne in wars against strangers, were brought in a shew: then, his brethren, wife and daughter: and lastly all himselfe was shewed to the people. The prayers of all the rest were by reason of feare, base, and nothing favouring of nobilitie: but Caractacus, neither hanging downe his head, nor with words craving any mercy, when he stood before the Emperours tribunall, spake in this wise.

If my moderation in prosperity had beene as great as my nobility and fortune was, I had come rather as a friend into this City, than a Captive: neither would you have disdained to receive me with covenants of peace, being a Prince descended of Noble Progenitors, and a commander over many nations. My present state, as it is to me dishonorable, so to you it is magnificent. I have had horses, men, armour and wealth: what marvell if against my will I have forgone them all? For if yee will be rulers over all men, it followeth that all men must abide servitude. If presently I had yeelded and been delivered into your hands; neither had my fortune nor your glorie been renowned: and oblivion would have followed my punishment. But if you save me alive, I shall be an example of your clemencie forever.

Upon these words Caesar pardoned him, his wife and brethren. And they being all bound, did their reverence likewise unto Agrippina, (who sat a loft not far off in another high seat to be seene) giving her the like praises and in the same degrees of stile as they did the Emperor himselfe. Surely a strange and unexampled precedent among all our ancestors, that a woman should sit and command the Romane ensignes. But shee carried herselfe as a fellow and associate in the Empire, gotten by her progenitors. After this, the Lords of the Senate were called together, who made long and glorious discourses as touching the captivity of Caractacus. Neither was this, as they affirmed, lesse honorable, than when Publius

What became of his daughters, Tacitus?

Scipio shewed Siphax: Luc. Paulus Perfes, or whosoever else exhibited, conquered Kings unto the people. As for Ostorius, decreed it was hee should be honoured with triumphall ornaments.

These conquests of Britain, writers have numbred among the most famous monuments and testimonies of the Romans prowess. And thereupon Seneca writeth thus; Claudius might make his boast that he first vanquished the Britans: for Iulius Caesar did but shew them only to the Romans. And in another place, writing of the same Claudius,

Ille Britannos
Vltra noti Littora Ponti,
Et caruleos
Scuta Brigantes, Dare Romuleis
Colla catenis
Iussit, Et ipsum
Nova Romana
Iura securis Tremere Oceanum.

The Britans, those, that seated are beyond the knowne sea coast,
And Brigants with blew-painted shields, he forced with his hoast,
To yeeld their necks in Romane chaines as captive to be led,
And even the Ocean this new power of Romane axe to dread.

And Seneca the Tragick poet in his Octavia, verified in this manner concerning Claudius,

Cuiq; Britanni
Terga dedere, ducibus nostris
Amic ignoti jurisq; sui.

And unto whom the Britans shew'd their backs, who erst unknowne
To all our Captaines liv'd by lawes and customs of their owne.

And in the same tragedie, for that he had passed over the Thames,

En qui ora Tamisis primus posuit jugum Ignorantis classibus textis freta:
Interque gentes barbaras tutus fuit,
Et sœva maria; conjugis scelere--Occidis.

Behold, who first the mouth and coast of Thamis, did subdew
And spread with mightie fleets those Firths, the like that never never knew:
With nations rude, in raging seas, who lived safe and sound,
By wicked hand of cursed wife his death at home he found.

Semblably Egesippus, saith thus of Claudius, Witnesse here is Britaine, which living without the world, is by the might of Romans reduced into the world. Whom the former age knew not, the Romans victory hath discovered: and even they now are become servants, who knew not what servitude was: being born only for themselves, and alwaies free unto themselves: even they who being by the interflow of the sea divided from the power of their superiors, could not stand in feare of them whom they knew not. A greater matter therefore it was, to have passed over to the Britans, than to have triumphed over the Britans. And in another place, Britaine also, which lieth hid amidst the waves, he gained to the Roman Empire by force of armes: by the triumph over which Island, Rome was thought to be more welthy. Claudius reputed more wary and politick, and Nero esteemed more fortunate. Also in another passage, which deserveth most of all to be put downe here, The very Elements also, have done homage to the name of the Romans: to whom likewise even the round world hath sworn allegiance already, which is enclosed and bounded with the Romane Empire: and in one word is of many called the ROMANE WORLD. For if we search into the truth, the whole army it selfe is comprised within the Empire of the Romans: upon which the Roman valour, having gone forward still beyond the Ocean, hath sought for it selfe another world, and in Britaine an Island remote from the confines of Lands hath found out for a selfe another possession. To conclude, they who are denied denied the benefit, not onely of the free burgesie of Rome but in manner also of all countries with men, are directed and awarded thither, there to dwell as persons banished out of the world. The Ocean now hath reined up his bounds: For the Romans know how to seeke into his inner secret parts. And Iosephus in the person of Titus, speaketh thus to the Iewes: What greater wall and barre than the Ocean? wherewith the Britans being fenced and inclosed, doe adore the Romans forces.

Moreover, as touching this argument, that renowned Ioseph Scaliger, in his C. taleets, hath saved and freed from rust and mouldineffe certaine verses of a most learned Poet though unknown: which, because they are not every where to bee found, I will not thinke much of my pains to put down: for they are as good as good may be. Now, that they be fundry Epigrams, and therefore distinctly to be considered, Iohn Obsopæus the German, a passing learned young man, hath out of ancient (manuscript) parchments very lately, enformed me:

That Britain from our clime far set and thence excluded quite,
Conquered of late is washed yet, with water ours by right.
Britain, I say, far set apart, and by vast sea disjoin'd, Wall'd with inaccessible banks and craggy cliffs behind;
Which father Nereus fenced had with billowes most invincible
And Ocean likewise compassed with ebs and flowes as fallible.
Britain that hath a wintry clime allotted for her fear,
Where cold North-Beaere shines alway bright with stars that never set Even at thy sight and first approach & Cæsar soone subdu'd, Submitted hath her necke to beare strange yoke of servitude.
Behold, the earth unpassable of nations makes commixtion,
What heretofore was world and world is now conjoined in one.

Now

Now let Tacitus proceed in his Story. Untill this time all went well with Ostorius. Soone after, his fortune stood in dolefull termes: either for that upon the displacing of ractacus, as if thereby all had bene subdued and the warre ended, the Romans intended so carefully their militarie service: or because the enemies in compassion of so puissant a man were more fervently enflamed to revenge. For they environed the Camp-master and Legionary cohorts which were left behind to build fortresses in the Silures country: And the villages and forts next adjoining had not speedily come to rescue, they had bene to the sword every man. Nevertheless the Camp-Master, with eight Centurions and forwardest maniples of common souldiers were slaine; and not long after, they put to flight our forragers, and the very troupes of horsemen that were sent out to succour them. Ostorius setteth out certaine companies lightly appointed, and yet thereby could not their flight, had not the Legions come in and undertooke the battell. By their strength fought with small odds on either hand, but afterward wee had the better of it, and the enemy betooke himselfe to his heels and escaped with small losse, because the day was farre spent. After this, they had many skirmishes, and for the most part in manner of rodes and skirmishes; in woods, on marshes, rashly or with foresight it skilled not: according as it fell out, as occasion by chance, or their owne hearts served them: one while for anger, another for booty: sometime by commandement from their Captaines, and sometimes againe with their warrant and privitie: but principally through the wilfull obstinacie of the Silures who were exasperated with a speech of the Roman Generalls, that was bruted abroad came to their eares: which was this, That as the Sugambri were rooted out and transported over into Gaul, so the name of the Silures should utterly be extinguished. And in heat they intercepted two auxiliary bands, as they through the avarice of their Praefects were seized and spoiled without advised circumspection. Also by large giving away of spoiles and prisoners, they drew the rest of the Nations to revolt. And then Ostorius wearied with griefe of heart yielded up his vitall breath. Whereat the enemies rejoiced, as at the death of a Captaine not to be despised, who though he died not in battell, yet was toiled out and by reason of the warres.

But Caesar having intelligence of his Lieutenants death, lest the Province should be destitute of a governour, appointed A. Didius in his place. He being thither come with great speed, yet found not all in good state. For in the meane space, the Legion whereof Maximus Valens had the charge, met with an unlucky and disastrous fight. The same whereof enemies had made greater than it was, to terrifie the captaine which was comming: who so in the like policie multiplied all that he heard, to win more praise by appeasing those troubles, or to purchase pardon more easily, if they continued still. The Silures were they that wrought us this displeasure and damage, whereupon they overran the province far and wide untill such time as by Didius his comming they were driven backe.

About this time Claudius departed this life: and Nero succeeded him in the Empire, who had no heart at all to attempt any thing in warfare: nay he was minded once to withdraw the forces out of Britain: Neither gave he over that intent of his but onely for that lest he might have been thought to deprave the glory of Claudius. After that Caracalla was taken, Venutius a very expert man above the rest in military affaires, borne and bred to the state of the Iugantes, long time trusty to us, and defended by the Romanes power, being vowing to wife Queene Cartismandua, by occasion soone after of a divorce, and then of a war between them, rebelled also against us, and proceeded to plaine hostility. At the first the quarrell was onely between them two: untill Cartismandua by policie and craft had intercepted the brother, and neere kinsmen of Venutius. Whereupon our enemies kindled with rage, and pricked forward with an ignominious indignity, lest they should be brought under the yoke of a womans government, with a strong power of choise youth, by force of arms invaded her kingdome, which was foreseen by us: and thereupon were cohorts sent to aid her, and they fought a hot battell: The beginning whereof was doubtfull, but the more joifull. The Legion also which Cesius Nafica commanded, fought with like success. For, Didius [ye must thinke] being stricken in yeeres, and having many honours bequeathed upon him, thought it sufficient to execute his charge and keep off the enemy by the mimicry of others. For what was woon by others he held: onely a few fortresses he built forward rather into the country: whereby he might purchase the name of enlarging his office. These exploits although they were achieved by two Propretors Ostorius and Didius in many years, as I thought good to joine together, lest being severed, they should not so well have bene remembered.

After Didius Avicus, there succeeded Verannius, who having with small rodes spoiled the Silures, was hindered by death, for warring any farther: a man while he lived carrying great name of precise severitie, but in his last will he shewed himselfe manifestly ambitious. For after much flattering of Nero, he added this, That he would have subdued the Province unto his obedience, if he had lived the next two yeeres.

But then Suetonius Paulinus governed the Britans, one in martill skill, and opinion of the people (which suffereth no man without a concurrent) striving to match Corbalo; desirous to equall the honour which he won in recovering Armenia, by subduing the enemies that stood out in this country. And therefore hee maketh all the preparation hee can to invade the Isle of * Monia, peopled with strong Inhabitants, and a receptacle of traiterous fugitives. To this purpose hee buildeth flat-bottom-vessels, for the shallowes and uncertaine landing places. Thus the footmen passed over: and then followed the horsemen by the foord, if the waters were any thing high, by swimming they put the horses over. Against them the enemies stood upon the shore in divers places embastelled thicke in array, well appointed with men and weapons; with women also running among: who all in blacke and mournefull array, with their haire about their eares, carried firebrands before them in their hands like the Furies of hell. The Druide likewise round about them, lifting up their hands to heaven, and pouring out deadly and cursing praiers, with this so strange and uncouth sight, amazed the souldiers so, as they stood still as stockes and stirred not a foot; as if they would expose their bodies to receive all wounds presented unto them. But afterwards, being encouraged by their Captaine, and animating one another, that they should not feare a flocke of women and franticke people: they displayed their ensignes and advanced forward. Downe they went with such as encountered them and thrust them within their owne fires. This done they planted garrisons in their townes, and cut downe their woods and groves consecrated to their execrable superstitions. For they accounted it lawfull, to offer sacrifice upon their altars with the blood of captives; and to aske counsell of their Gods by inspection of mens fibres and entrails.

As Suetonius was busie in these actions, newes came unto him that the Province was suddenly revolved. Prasutagus King of the Iceni, in wealth surpassing all others, had set down in his will Caesar with two of his daughters to be his heires; supposing by this kind of flattery to curry favour, and to make his kingdome and house most secured from all injuries. Which fell out farre otherwise: in so much as his kingdome by Centurions, his house by slaves were spoiled and reputed lawfull booties. And to beginne withall, his wife Boadicia was whipped, and his daughters deflowered. The chiefe of the Iceni, as if the whole country had bene given them by way of gift, are turned out of their ancient inheritances, and the Kings kinsfolke reputed as slaves. By reason of which consuetudinous indignities, and for feare of worse, considering they had bene reduced into the forme of a province, the Britaines began among themselves to cast and thinke upon the miseries of servitude, to lay together their wrongs and oppressions, in ripping of them up to aggravate them by constructions to the highest, in these tearmes: that no other good was to be looked for by sufferance, but that more grievous burdens should be imposed upon them still, as men ready to beare all willingly. Thus whereas in times past, their states had but one King a piece, now there were two thrust upon them: the Lieutenants, cruelly to suck their blood, and the Procurator as greedy to prey upon that substance: That the variance of these rulers was the torment; and their agreement the undoing of the poore subjects: the one vexing by souldiers and Centurions, the other by exortations and reprochfull abuses: so that now there was nothing safe from their unsatiable avarice, nothing freed from their unbridled lust. In warre and battell yet, the stronger man commonly is hee that maketh spoile; but now cowards for the most part, and weaklings are they that dispossesse them of their dwelling houses, bereave them of their children, enioyne them to murther, as if they were men that knew not to doe any thing else, save only to die for their country. For otherwise, what a small handfull thinke ye of souldiers: have come over to serve, if the Britaines would fall to reckon themselves: Thus Germany had ken off the yoke of obedience, and yet were defended by a river only: and not by the Ocean for these Romans, what motives have they of warre but their owne covetousnesse, rian, wanton lust? whereas we have our native country, our wives and children to provide thereto. Surely they would retire and bee gone as sometime Talus, their banished went his waies. if wee would endeavour to follow the valour and proesse of our ancestors and not be dismayed with the doubtfull event of one skirmish or two: and commonly in as are distressed and in miserie, there is more stomacke to attempt, and greater resolution continue. And even now the Gods also take pittie of the Britains poore estate, who keep Roman Generall out of the way, and confine the Lieutenant with his hands full in an Island: and themselves being assembled to advise together, had attained to the hardest part of all in an action of that nature, wherein without question it is more dangerous to be consulting, than in the very action.

With these and such inducements, inciting one another, they take armes under the conduct of Boadicia a Ladie of the roiall blood (for in matter of government in chiefe the Britaines make no distinction of sex) having stirred up the Tribunes to Rebellion, and as many as yet, not broken to the yoke of servitude, had in secret conspired, vowed to recover and resume their libertie, bearing a most bitter hatred against the old souldiers. For those who newly brought into the Colonie Camalodunum, thrust the ancient inhabitants out of their houses, disseized them of their Lands, Livings, calling them captives, slaves, while the new souldiers favoured, & maintained the insolent outrages of the old, in regard of conformitie in life & hope of like licentiousnesse. Besides, a Temple erected in the honour of Claudius of sacred memorie, as an Altar of perpetuall dominion over them, was another, & the Priests chosen under colour of religion, wasted & consumed all their wealth. Now it was not thought any hard piece of work to raze, & destroy that Colonie, not fenced with fortifications: a thing not circumspectly foretold of our captives, while they had greater taste of pleasure, than profit. Amid these occurrences, the image of victory set up in Camalodunum fell downe without any apparant causes, and turned backward, as if it would give place to enemies. And certaine women distempred with some fanaticall furie, went singing by night, fell house, their Theatre resounded with hideous howlings, and a strange spectre, or apparition was seen in the arme of the sea: there, a signe foretelling the subversion of that Colonie. Furthermore, the Ocean blowdy in shew, and the shapes of mens bodies left after an ebbe, with Britans construed favourably to feed their owne hopes; so the old souldiers interpreted to the increase of their feare. But because Suetonius was far off, they craved help of Catus Derianus the Procurator: who sent unto them not passing two hundred, and those but badly armed: and within the towne the number of souldiers which was not great, trusted to the fence of the Temple. And by reason that those among them, which being privy to the secret conspiracie of the town, troubled their designments, hindred them, they had neither made trench or rampier before the town, nor sent away their old folke, and women, keeping the lustie young men only, and so being secure, as it had been in the time of perfect peace, surprized they were at unawares, & enclosed round about with a multitude of barbarous people. And verily all other things were violently sacked or consumed with fire: the Temple only excepted, wherein the souldiers had gathered themselves round together, which also was two daies together besieged and so forced. Also, the Britans in their train of victory, encountering Petilius Cerealis Lieutenant of the ninth Legion, as he was coming with aid, put the legion to flight, & slew all the footmen. Cerealis himselfe with the Cavallery escaped to the campe, & saved himselfe within the fortifications. Upon which overthrow, & in regard of the provinciall peoples barred, driven through the feare, into Gaul. But Suetonius with constant resolution, passing through the midst of his enemies, went to Londinium, a towne verily by the name that it carried of a Colonie, nothing famous, but for concourse of merchants, & provision of necessities most of all other frequented. Being thither come, he stood doubtfull whether to chuse it for the seat of war or no. And considering well the small number of souldiers that he had, & by good proofs taught how Petilius paid for his rashnesse, he determined with the damage of one towne to save all the rest whole.

Neither

Neither could he bee won by the weeping and pitifull teares of those that besought his aide, but he would needs put out the signall of a remove, and receive all followers, as part of his armie to march along with him. As many therefore as weaknesse of sex, wearisomnesse of age, or pleasure of the place held back, were all put to the sword by the enemy. The like calamitie befell unto the free towne * Verulamium: because the Barbarians leaving the castles & forts of garrison souldiers, made spoile of the richest and fattest: and carrying their pillage into some place of safetie, as men glad of bootie, went on still to such as were of note and mark above the rest. And thus to the number of seventie thousand Roman citizens and associates together, by reports, were knowne to have been slaine in those places before named. For there was no saving of prisoners, no selling of them, nor any other commerce and traffique of war, but killing, hanging, burning and crucifying such haste they made to make havocke of all, as if they were requite the measure they had suffered, and anticipate in the meane while all revenge.

Now by this time Suetonius having with him the fourteenth Legion with the old souldiers, of the twentieth, & the auxiliaries from the parts next adjoining, was well neere ten thousand strong, when he resolved to lay aside all further delays, and to trie the chance of a main battell. And so he chooseth a place with a narrow entrance like a gullet, and enclosed behind with a wood: being well assured, that he had no enemies but in front, and that the plain lay open without feare of ambush. The Legionarie souldiers therefore, being marshalled in thick ranks, and close together, with the light armours about them, the horsemen were placed on either hand like wings. But the Britaine forces came leaping forth all abroad by troups and companies, in such a multitude as never the like else where at any other time, and with so fierce courage, as that they would needs bring their very wives with them, and place them in cars, which they had bestowed in the utmost parts of the plaine, to be witnesses of the victorie.

Boadicia, having her daughters before her in a chariot, ever as she came to any severall nation (for it was the custome verily of the Britans to make warre under the conduct of women) protested & told them, that she was come then, not as a Lady descended of so noble progenitors, to make either Kingdome or riches her quarrell, but as one of the common people, in revenge of her libertie lost, her body sore whipped, and her daughters chastitie assailed by maleforce handling: That the Romans lust and concupiscence, was growne to such a passe, that they spared no body, no not aged persons, nor left their Virgins undefiled. Howbeit, the Gods (which she) are with us, and favor just revenge. For the legion that came into the field, and durst hardly a battell, was cut in pieces: the rest are either hiddden within campe and hold, or else seek meanes to escape by flight: so that they will never abide so much as the noise and cry of so many shousands, much lesse then their violent charge, and close hand fight, if then they would weigh with her the power of their armed forces, and with all the motives of war, resolve they should either to vanquish in that battell, or to die: for her owne part, being but a woman, this was her resolution: the men might live if they pleased, and serve as slaves.

Neither could Suetonius himselfe, in so great an extremitie, hold his tongue: For although he presumed and trusted much upon valour, yet entered into exhortations & prayers. That they should contentment be lowd and waive threats of the Barbarians. Among whom there were more women to be seene, than lustie young men: & warlike as they were and unarmed, they would presently give ground, when they came once to feeble & acknowledge their weapons, & would of those conquerors, by whom so often they had bin put to flight. For given in many legions, a few they should carry away the honour of the battell, and to their greater glory, would turne, if with a small power they won the fame of a whole armie. Only this they must remember, marshalled close together as they stood, first with taunting their enemies, and afterwards with the bosses and pikes of their bucklers, and with their swords to continue in beating downe and killing them, and never so thinke all the while of any booty: for after victory, each goten, all would come to their share. These words of the Captaine, gave such an edge, and kindled their courage, so the old souldiers also experienced in many battels, had a bestirred themselves, and were so ready to let their darts fly, that Suetonius assured of the event, gave signall of forward. And first of all, the legion was stirring and foot, but keeping the straight of the place, after a while, as a sure defence, after that the enemies approached nearer within the just reach of shot, had spent all their darts, sathed out, as it were, in pointed battels. The auxilliary souldiers likewise were of the same stomack, and the horsemen stretching out their long lances, braked as was in their way, and made head against them. The residue shewed their backs, and had much ado to flee and escape, by reason of the carts and waggons placed round about the plaine, which had blocked up the passages on every side. And the souldiers forbore not the execution so much as of the women: the very horses and draught beasts, were thrust through with darts, which made the heape of dead bodies the greater. This was a day of great honour and renowne, comparable to the victories of old time: for, some report, that there were slaine few lesse in number, than fourescore thousand Britons: but of our souldiers, there died not all out foure hundred, and not many more hurt. Boodicia ended her life with poison. And Pannius Posithmus campe-Master of the second Legion, understanding of this prosperous successe of the fourteenth, and twentieth Legions, because he had defrauded his owne Legion of the like glorie, and, contrary to the order of service, refused to obey the Captaines commandment, thrust himselfe through with his owne sword.

After this, the whole armie being rallied together, kept the field still, and lay encamped, to end the residue of the warre: and Caesar augmented their forces by sending out of Germany two thousand Legionarie souldiers, eight cohorts of auxiliaries, and a thousand horsemen: by whose coming, they of the ninth Legion, had their companies supplied, and made up with the Legioners. The cohorts and cornets of horse, were appointed to lodge in new wintering places: and all those nations of the enemies, which were either doubtfull or knowne adversaries, were wasted with fire and sword. But nothing distressed them so much as famine, being negligent in sowing of corne, by reason that of all ages they were given to warre: for that also they made full account to live of our provision, and as all other fierce and stout nations, slowly give care to peace, because Iulius Clesicianus, being sent to succeed Catus, and at variance with Suetonius, hindered the common good with private grudges, and had given it out abroad, that they were to expect and tarry for a new Lieutenant, who without any hostile rancour and pride of a Conqueror, would gently entreat and use with all clemencie such as yielded unto him. With all, he sent word to Rome, that they should looke for no end of warre, unlesse some one or other succeeded Suetonius, upon whose overthrow he laid all his ill proceedings, and attributed all fortunate successe to the happy fortune of the common weale.

To see therefore in what state Britaine stood, Polycletus one of Neros freed men was sent for, good hope he had; that by his authoritie there should not onely be wrought a perfect agreement betwene the Lieutenant and the Procurator, but also that the rebellious minds of the Barbarians would be won to peace. Neither failed Polycletus, being with his mightie bookeburden some to Italie and Gaul, after he had passed the Ocean sea, to shew himselfe terrible even to our souldiers also. But to the enemies he was but a laughing stocke: who, whiles libertie was still fresh on foot among them, knew not what the power of these freed men was: and they made a marvell of it, that a Captaine and an armie, which had achieved so great a war, should yield to obey slaves. But of all these things the best was made to the Emperor. And Suetonius being busied still in these affaires, for that he had lost afterwards some few Gallies upon the shore and the gallie slaves in them, as if the warre continued still, was commanded to deliver up the armie to Petronius Turpilianus, who now was newly out of his Consulship, as unto a man more exorable, unacquainted with the delinquencies of the enemies, and therefore more ready to accept of their repentance: who neither, incensing the enemy, nor provoked by him, colouring a lazy and idle life with the honest name of peace, after hee had dared and done no more, but composed former troubles and debates, delivered the charge of the province unto Trebellius Maximus.

But he, a man unfit for action, and altogether unexpert in war service, by a kind of courteous and mild regiment entertained the country in quiet. For now the Britaines also had learned the good manners, not rudely to repulse the sugred assaults of flattering vices, and the disturbance of civill dissensions coming between, ministred a lawfull excuse for his doing nothing. But much discord arose among them whiles the souldier, accustomed to warfare, waxt wanton with ease, and grew to be mutinous: and he for his niggardly sparing and base taking of bribes, was both despised and hated of the armie. This hatred of theirs against him, was enflamed by Roscius Calius Lieutenant of the twentieth Legion, an ancient enemy of his, but now by occasion of civill dissensions, they were fallen out farther, and brake into more heinous tearmes. Trebellius objected ever and anon to Calius, and charged him him with factious behaviour, and confounding the order of discipline: Calius againe, that him with factious behaviour, and beggared the Legions. But in the meane time, whiles the Lieutenant Trebellius had spoiled and beggared the Legions. But in the meane time, whiles the Lieutenant thus jarred, the modest carriage of the armie was marred: and the discord as length grew so great, that Trebellius was driven away with the railing of the Auxiliaries also, in cohorts and wings sorting themselves to Calius side, was glad, as a man forsaken, to give place and flee to Vitellius. The Province although the Consular Lieutenant Generall was absent remained in quiet: whiles the Lieutenants of the Legions supplied the charge in right of equall authoritie: But Calius indeed bare the greater stroke, because he was of more boldnesse.

Whiles the Civill war betwene Galba, Otho and Vitellius grew hot, Vespasian Bolanus was by Vitellius sent to succeed him. Neither troubled he Britanny with any discipline. The same assaults continued still against the enemies, and the like licentiousnesse in the campe: saving onely that Bolanus a good honest harmlesse man, and not odious for committing any crime, had wonne himselfe love and good will in lieu of obedience: and albeit Vitellius sent for aids out of Britanny yet Bolanus made no hast for that Britain was never quiet enough. As for the Island, that great favour and reputation in warlike affaires, which Vespasian had gotten being Lieutenant there of the second Legion under Claudius, did easily win it unto him, yet without some stir of the other Legions: wherein many centurions and souldiers who had been advanced by Vitellius were loth to change that Prince whom they had proved already. And besides, the souldiers of the fourteenth Legion, called the subduers of Britain, removed from thence by Nero to the Caspian wars, and in the quarrell of Otho vanquished, were by Vitellius sent backe into Britanny, and called away againe by Mutianus letters.

For all this civill warre, no quarrell nor mutinies there were in the Britaine armie. And to say a truse, during all the troubles of civill warres, no Legions behaved themselves more harmlesse, either because they were farre off and severed by the Ocean, or for that they were taught by continuall service and souldierie, to hate the rather allbostility and dealing with enemies. Howbeit by meanes of these dissensions and rumours still of civill war, the Britaines tooke heart and rebelled, through the procurement of Vespasian: who besides a natural fiercenesse of courage, and hatred of the Roman name, was incensed particularly by private unkindnesse between him and his wife Quene Carishmandua. This Carishmandua was Queene of the Brigantes, of high and noble linage, who upon the delivery of King Caratacus whom shee tooke by fraud and sent to furnish and set out the triumph of Claudius (that glorious spectacle, I meane in manner of a triumph, wherein Caratacus was shewed) had woon favour with the Romans and greatly increased her strength. Whereupon ensued wealth: of wealth and prosperitie riotous and incontinent life: in so much, that casting off Venusius her husband, and intercepting his kinsfolke, shee joynd her selfe in marriage with Fellocatus his harnesser beaver, and crowned him King: which foule fact was the overthrow immediately of her house. The good will of the country went generally with the lawfull band: but the Quenes intemperate affections were peremptory and violent in maintaining her minion the adulterer. Whereupon Venusius, by the helpe of friends which he procured, and the revolt of the Brigantes themselves, made warre upon Carishmandua, and brought her into great extremities. Then upon her instant prayer unto the Romans for aid, our garrisons, cohorts and wings were sent to defend her: which after sundry skirmishes with divers event, delivered the Quenes person out of perill, but the kingdome remained to Venusius, and the warre unto us.

Now when as the state of Rome Citie, was for Vespasian governed by Mutianus, hee made Julius Agricola who was gone to side with Vespasian, and had behaved himselfe with great integritie and courage, Lieutenant of the two and twentieth Legion in Britanny, a Legion which slowly had sworne allegiance to Vespasian, in which province his predecessor by report seditiously demanded himselfe. For the said Legion was out of awe, or rather it over-awed even Lieutenants generall that had bene Consuls. Neither was the ordinarie Legions Lieutenant, who had bene but Prætor, of power sufficient to restrain and keepe it under, whether it were through his owne weaknesse, or the stubborn disposition of the souldiers: it is not certaine. Thus being elected both to succede and revenge, hee shewed an example of most rare moderation in making choice to bee thought rather to have found them, than to have made made them dutifull souldiers. And albeit that Vellius Bolanus Licutenant General of Britannie for the time being, governed in a gentler and milder manner, than was fit for so fierce a Province: Yet under him Agricola cunningly conforming himselfe to that humor, and unlearned to joyne profitable counsels with honest, tempered the heat of his owne nature that it might not grow upon him still.

Petilius Cerealis Proprætor.

But when as Vespasian recovered together with the rest of the world, Britanny also, brave capitaines, good souldiers were sent, and the enemies hope was greatly abated. For straightwaies Petilius Cerealis strooke a terror into them, by invading as his first entry the Brigantes, thought to be the most populous state of the whole Province. Many battels were fought, and some bloody: And the greatest of the Brigantes he either conquered or wasted.

Julius Frontinus Proprætor.

And whereas Cerealis would doubtlesse have dimmed the diligence and fame of another successor, Julius Frontinus a great man sustained also as bee might, after such a predecesser that weightie charge with reputation and credit: who subdued the puissant and warlike people of the Silures, where he had beside the verue of the enemy, struggled with the streights and difficult places.

Jul. Agricola Proprætor.

In this estate Agricola found the Province, and the wars thus far proceeded in, when as about the middle of summer he passed the seas: at what time the souldiers, as if the seasons were past, attended an end for that yeare of their service, and the enemy occasions to beginne to hurt. The Ordovices a little before he entred the land, had hewed almost wholly in pieces a wing which lay in their borders. Upon which beginning the countrey being awaked, as men desirous of warre allowed the example: and some staied to see how the new Licutenant would take it.

Anglesey.

Then Agricola, although the Summer was spent, and the bands lay dispersed in the Province, and his souldiers had fully presumed of rest for that yeare, which hindered much, and crossed directly his undertaking of warre, most men also being of opinion, rather to keepe and assure the places suspected, all this notwithstanding, resolved fully to encounter the danger, having gathered therefore the ensignes of the Legions, and some few Auxiliaries, because the Ordovices durst not descend into indifferent ground, himselfe before the vaward, to give others like courage in the like danger, led up in battell ray to encounter the enemy. And having slaughtered almost the whole nation, knowing full well that same must with instance be followed, and as the first fell out, so the rest would succede, hee deliberated to conquer the Island * Mona, from the possession whereof, as before I have rehearsed, Paulinus was revoked by the general rebellion of Britannie: But as in purposes not resolved on before, ships being wanting, the pollicie and resoluteness of the capitaine devised a passage over. For he commanded the most choise of the Aid-souldiers, to whom all the foords and shallows were knowne, and who after the usuall practise of their countrey, were able in swimming to governe all at once themselves, their armour and horses, laying aside their carriage, to put over at once, and suddenly invade them. Which thing so amazed the enemy, attending for a fleet, for shipping, for aide, that they surely believed nothing could be hard or invincible to men that came so minded to war. Whereupon they humbly intreated for peace, and yielded the Island. Thus Agricola at his first entry into this province (which time other consume in vaine ostentation or ambitious seeking of complements) entring withall into labors and dangers, became famous indeed and of great reputation.

Neither abused Agricola the prosperous proceeding of his affaires to vanity or braving in speeches, as to tearme it an exploit or a conquest, thus to have kept in order persons subdued before: or to bedeck with lawrell his letters of advertisement, but by stopping and suppressing the fame he augmented it the more: while men began to discourse, upon what great presumptions of future successe, hee should make so light an account of such great actions already performed, as not to speake a word of them.

Now as touching civill government: Agricola knowing right well the disposition and mind of the Province, taught also by the experience of others, that armes availed little to settle a new conquered State, if injuries and wrongs be permitted, determined to cut off all causes of warres. And beginning at home, his owne house first of all he reformed and restrained, a point of as much hardnesse with many as to governe a province. He committed no manner of publike affaires to bond men or freed: hee admitted no souldier, about his person either upon upon private affection of partiall suiters; or upon the commendation and intreatie of Centurions, but elected simply the best presuming the same to be the most faithfull. He would see into all things, but not exact all things to the rigor: Light faults he would pardon, and the great severely correct: not alwaies proceeding to punish, but often content with repentance: choosing rather not to preferre unto office and charge such as were like to offend, than after offence to condemn them. The augmentation of corne and tributes he mollified with equall dividing of charge and burthen, cutting away those petty extortions, which grieved the subject more than the tribute it selfe. For, the poore people were constrained in a mockery to waite at the barnes fast locked against them, and first to buy the corne, then after to sell it at a price. Several waies were enioyned, and far distant places by the purveyors commandement: that the country should carry from the neere standing camps to those which were far off & out of the way, till that which lay open to all, and at hand, was turned in fine to the gaine of a few. By repressing these abuses presently in his first yeare, a good opinion was conceived from him of peace, which either by the negligence or connivence of former Lieutenants was now no lesse feared than warre.

At this time died Vespasian, unto whom for these victories of the leaders, and his owne vertue under Claudius, Valerius Flaccus before his Poeme thus speaketh;

Tuq, ô pelagi cui major aperti

Fama, Caledonius post quam tua carbasia vexit

Oceanus, Phrygius prius indignatus Iulos.

And thou, for seas discovery whole fame did more appeare, Since time thy ships with sailes full spred in Northerne Ocean were,
Which of the Trojan Julii erst did scorne the sailes to beare.

But when that Noble Titus, THE LOVELY DEARELING AND JOY OF THE WORLD succeeded his father, Agricola when summer was once come, assembling his armie together, those souldiers of his who in marching behaved themselves in modest sort hee commended, the loose and dissolute straglers he checked. The places for pitching the campe hee designed himselfe: the friths he founded, and the thickets he proved first in his owne person: not suffering in the meane season any corner in the enemies countrey to be quiet: but wasting and spoiling with sudden excursions and roads: But when he had thoroughly terrified them, then would hee againe spare and forbear, alluring thereby their minds to friendship and peace. Upon which kind of proceeding, many states that stood upon termes of equalitie before that day, gave hostages and meekely submitted themselves: receiving garrison, and permitting to forisfe, which he so wisely and with such great foresight and reason performed that nothing was ever attempted against them: whereas before, no new fortified place in all Britannie escaped unassailed.

Titus Emperor.

The winter ensuing was spent in most profitable and politicke devises. For, whereas the Britaines were rude and dispersed, and therefore prone upon every occasion to warre, hee to induce them by pleasures unto quietnesse and rest, exhorted them in private, and helpt them in common to build temples, houses and places of publique resort, commending the forward and cheeking the slow: imposing thereby a kind of necessitie upon them while each man contended to gaine honour and reputation thereby. And now by this time the Noble mens sonnes hee tooke and instructed in the liberal sciences, preferring the wits of the Britaines before the students of France, as being now curious to attaine the eloquence of the Roman language, whereas they lately rejected their speech. After that, our atire grew to be in account and the Gowne much used among them. So by little and little they fell to these provocations of vices, to sumptuous gallies & banquets, yea and exquisite banquettings: which things the ignorant termed civility being indeed a part of their bondage. In the third yeare of his wars, he discovered new countrey, to which alone with him came to the first of * Faus: Which thing so terrified the enemies, that altho the arme was toiled out with cruell tempests yet durst they not assaile them: and the Romans moreover had leisure & space to fortifie there. They which were skilfull that way, observed what never any Capitaine did more adviſedly chuse his places. No Castle planned by Agricola ever was either forced by strength, or upon conditions surrendered, or as not defensible: for taken, at any times they issued forth: for, against a long siege, they were stored with victualles, so, they withstood them without feare, every garrison guarding it selfe and and needing no helpe of their neighbours, the enemies assailing sometimes, but in vaine, without success, and driven thereupon to despaire. For, the lasses of Summer they were commonly wont before, to repaire with winter events: but now, Summer and winter alike they ment the worse. In all these actions, Agricola never sought to draw unto himselfe, the glory of any exploit done by another: but were it Centurion, or of other degree, hee would faithfully witness the fact, and yield him alwaies his due commendation. By some, hee is said to have bene somewhat bitter in checks and rebukes: and indeed, the man was, as toward the good of a most sweet disposition, so to the bad and lewd persons unpleasant and sower enough. But this choler passed away with his words: closenesse in him and silence you needed not to feare: he esteemed it more honest to offend, then to hate.

The fourth summer was spent in perusing, and ordering that which he had over-run. And if the valiant minds of the armies, and glory of the Roman name, could have permitted or accepted it so, they needed not to have sought other limit of Britaine. For, Glotta and Baduria two armes of two contrary seas, shooting a mightie way into the land, are onely divided a furlong by a narrow partition of ground: which passage was guarded and fortified then with garison and castle: so that the Romans were absolute Lords of all on this side, having cast out the enemy, as it were, into another Island.

The fifth yeare of the warre, Agricola first taking sea there, went over, and subdued with many and prosperous conquests nations before that time unknowne: and he furnished with forces, that part of Britaine, which lieth against Ireland, more in hope, than for feare. For Ireland, if it might have bene wonne, lying between Britannie and Spaine, and fety also for the French sea, would aptly have united, to the great advantage of the one, and the other, these strongest members of the Empire together. In bignesse it is inferiour to Britannie: howbeit, bigger than the Islands of our sea. The soile, and temperature of the aire, the nature and fashions differ not much from the British. The ports and places of access, are better knowne by reason of more commerce and frequenting of marchants. Agricola had received before, a Prince of that country driven out by cruell diffention, whom under colour of courtship and friendship, he retained till occasion should serve. I have heard him oftentimes say, that with one Legion, and some few Aides, Ireland might be wonne and possessed: that it were also a strength for our British affairs. If the Roman forces were planted each where, and liketh banishes, as it were, quite out of sight.

About this time died Tiberius, who for these valiant Acts exploited by Agricola, was the fiftenth time named Imperator, as Xiphilinus writeth, and an ancient piece of coine witnesseth with him. Then Agricola under Domitian in the summer which began the sixth yeare of his office, because a generall rising in armes of all the farther Nations, beyond Bodotria was feared, & passages were all beset with a power of the enemies, manned a fleet to search the Creeks and Harbours of that ample region, which lieth beyond it. Which being by Agricola then first taken, and employed as a part of his strength, followed after a long, and made a goodly brave shew, while at one time warre both by sea and land went forward. And oft it so chanced, that the horseman, footman, and sea-souldier met, and made merrie in the same campe one with another, extolling and magnifying, each their owne promise and adventures: making their vaunts & comparisuns souldier-like, the one of the woods & high mountaines, the other of dangerous tempests and billowes: the one, of the land and enemy conquest, the other of the Ocean subdued. The Britains, as by the prisoners was understood, were amazed also, at the sight of the navie, as though now the secrets of their sea were discovered, and no refuge remained if they were overcome. Whereupon the Caledonians arming with great preparation, and greater bruit thereof, at the manner is of matters unknowne, having of themselves first set on hand to assault our Castles, braved our men, and put them in feare as Chalmers, in so much that some of our side, who would seeme to be wise, but were dastards indeed, counselled the Generall to retire on this side Bodotria, and that the best counsell was to depart of their own accord, rather than to be repelled with shame: in the mean while, Agricola taking knowledge, that the enemies meant to divide themselves, and to give the onset in severall Companies: whereupon lest hee should be enclosed about, and surrounded by their multitude, and still in the country, he also marched with his armie divided in three. Which when it was knowne to the enemy, they in a sodaine changing aduise, and uniting their forces together, joyntly assaulted saulted by night the ninth Legion, as being of weakest resistance: and having slaine the watch, partly asleep, and partly amazed with feare, brake into the campe. And now were they fighting within the very trenches, when Agricola having intelligence given him by Spies, what way the enemies had taken and following withall their footsteps, commanded the lightest horsemen and footmen to play on their backs, and maintaine the skirmish, and the whole armie anone, to second them with a shout. And when it drew neere to day, the glittering of the ensignes was sene. So the Britains were quailed with a double danger: but the Romans recovered courage againe, and being past perill of their persons, fought now for their honour, freshly assailing their late assailers. And verily within the freights of the gates, the conflict was sharpe and cruell, till in the end the enemies were forced to flie: whilest both our armies contended: the one would seeme to have helped their fellows, the other to have needed none other to help them: and if the bogs and wood had not covered their flight, that one victory had ended the warre. Upon this battell so manfully fought, so famously wonne, the armie presuming, that to their prowess all things were easie and open, cried; To lead into Caledonia, and to find out the limit of Britan with a course of a continued Conquests: and even those who ere while were so warie and wise, waxt forward enough after the event, and grew to speak bigly: such is the hard condition of warres. If ought fall out well, all challenge a part, misfortunes are ever imputed to one. Contrariwise, the Britans presupposing that not valour, but the cunning of the Generall, by using the occasion had carried it away, abated no whit of their stomacke, but armed their youth, transported their children and wives into places of safetie, and sought by assemblies and religious rites, to establish an association of their Cities and States together. And so for that yeare both parties departed away incensed.

The same summer, a cohort of Vesprians, levied in Germanie, and sent over into Britan, committed a bawious and memorable Act. For having slaine a Centurion, and certaine souldiers, intermingled among other maniciples, and set over them for direction of discipline, they fled, and embarked themselves in three pinnaces, compelling by force the Master of the said vessels, to execute their charge: and only one doing his office, the other two being suspected, and thereupon slaine, this strange going out, and putting to sea, the fact as yet not noised abroad, was gazed and wondred at: afterwards being driven uncertainly hither and thither, and having skirmished with the Britains standing in defence of their owne, often prevailing and sometimes repulsed, they came at last to that miserie, that they were enforced to eat one another, first the weakest, then as the lot lighted. Thus after they had floated round about Britan, and lost their vessels for lacke of government, they were intercepted first by the Suerians, then by Frisians, as Pirates and Rovers. Now, some of them there were, that being bought by merchants as slaves, and by change of Masters brought to our side of the river grew into a name by giving first notice of so great and so rare an adventure.

In the beginning of Summer, Agricola was deeply touched with a grievous mischance, that happened in his owne house: for, he lost his owne Sonne about a yeare old. Which unfortunately hap, he neither bare out, as most of these great men do in the like case, vaine-gloriously, nor took it againe so impatiently with sorrow and lamentation, as women are wont: and amidst his mourning, used the warre as one of his remedies. Therefore having sent his fleet, afore which by spoiling in sundry places, should induce a greater and more uncertaine terror upon his enemies, hee made ready, and followed after with his armie, joyning thereto some of the valiantest Britains, whom by long experience in peace, he had found most faithfull, and so came as farre as to the mount Grampias, where the enemies were lodged before. For the Britans nothing daunted with the event of the former battell, and attending for nothing else but revenge or servitude, and being taught at length, that common danger must be repelled with concord, by embassages and league made, had raised the power of all their Cities and States together. And now by this time there were entered into the field, the view being taken, above thirty thousand armed men: besides an endlessse number of youth, which daily flocked to them, full, yea, and lusty old men renowned in warre, and bearing every one the badge due to their honour: at what time, among many other leaders, Galgacus for his valour & birth the principall man, seeing the multitude thus assembled holly to demand battell, is said to have used this speech unto them: When I view and consider the causes of this warre, and our present necessities, I have reason, me seemes, to presume, that this day, and this your agreeing consent, will give give a happy beginning to the freedome of the whole Island. For, both have we all hitherto lived in liberty; & besides, no land remaineth beyond, no, nor so much as sea for our safeguard. The Romanie navie, thus as you see, hovering upon our coasts: so that Combat and armie which valiant men desire for honour, the daftard must also use for his best securitie: in former battels which have with divers events been fought against the Romanes, had the hope and refuge resting in our hands: Because we, the flower of the British Nobilitie, seated therefore the furthestmost in, never seeing the coasts of the countries which serve to flaverie, have kept even our eyes unpolluted, and free from all contagion of tyrannie. Beyond us is no land, beside us none are free; us hitherto this very corner, and the inner recesses, as it were, of fame hath defended. Now the uttermost point of Britannie is laid open & things, the lesse they have bin within knowledge, the greater is the glory to achieve them. But no nation now is there beyond us; nothing but water, nothing but rockes, and the Romans even among them, more infest than all besides. Whose intolerable pride in vaine shall man seeke to avoide with any obsequious service, and humble behaviour: Robbers as they are of the world, who having now left no more land to spoile, search also the sea. If their enemies be rich, they covet their wealth: if poore, they seeke to gaine glorie: Whom neither the East nor the West, is ever able to satisfie: the onely men of all memorie, that seeke in all places, be they wealthy, or be they poore with like affection. To take away by maine force, to kill and to spoile, they falsly terme Empire and government: when they lay all waste to a wilderness, that they call peace. That every man should hold his owne children and blood most deare, Nature hath ordeined: and even those are pressed for souldiers, and carried away to serve as slaves elsewhere. Our wives and sisters, if they be not violently forced as in open hostilitie, are in the meane time under the colour and title of friends, and goods often abused. Our goods and substance, they draw from us for tribute, our corne for provision. Our verie bodies and hands they weare out and consume, in paving of bogs; and riding of woods, with a thousand stripes and reproachfull indignities besides. Slaves yet, which be borne to bondage, are bought and sold once for all, and afterwards fedde and found at their owners expences. But Britannie daily buyeth, daily feedeth, and is at daily charge with her owne bondage. And as in a private retinue of household servants, the fresh man and last commer, is laughed and scoffed at by his very fellows: even so, in this old servitude of the whole world, our destruction only is sought, as being the latest and vilest in account of all other. For, fields we have none to manure, no mines to be digged, no port trade in, for which purposes and employments we should be reserved alive. And as for the manhood and fierce courage of the subject, it pleaseth not much the jealous Sovereign. At this very corner being so secret and far out of the way, the more securitie it yeeldeth them, in them it works the greater suspicion. So seeing all hope of pardon is past, as the length of courage, to defend and maintaine your safety as well as your honor, things most deare and precious unto you. The Trinobantes, led by a woman fired a Colonic, forced campe and fled; and if such a lucky beginning had not ended in sloth and security, they might with ease have shaken off the yoke. We as yet were never touched, never failed nor subdued: as we therefore that mind to maintain their freedome, not for the present but for ever, let us shew straitwaies in the first joining, what manner of men Caledonia reserved in store for her selfe. Or do you thinke the Romanes to be as valiant in war, as they are wanton in peace? No: it is not by their owne vertue, but by our jarrings and discords they are grown into fame, and the faults of their enemies they abuse to the glory of their owne armie, composed of wretched nations, and therefore as by present prosperity holden together, so if fortune once should it doubtlesse will dissolve: unless ye suppose, the Frenchmen and Germanes, and (as I have said) many of our owne Nation which now lend their lives to establish a foreign usurper, and yet have beene enemies longer than servants, to be led and induced with true harted and loyall affection. Nay, it is feare and terror, weak links and bands of love. Remove them once, those which shall cease to feare, will soon begin to hate. All things tending unto victory are on our side. No wife to encourage the Romanes, no parents to upbraid them if they flee: most have either no country at all, or els some other. A few fearefull persons trembling and gazing all about at the strangeness of heaven's selfe, of sea, of woods, and of things els, the Gods have delivered, mixed up as it were and fettered, into our hands: the the vaine shew and glittering of gold and silver terrifie us, which neither defendeth nor offends. And even amongst our enemies in the field we shall find of our side. The Britanes will agnize their owne cause. The French will call to remembrance their freedome and former estate: the rest of the Germans will leave and forsake them as of late the Visipians did. And what else then have we to feare? the Castles are empty, the colonies peopled with aged, and impotent persons: the free Cities discontent and in factions, whiles those which are under, obey with ill will, and they that doe governe, rule against right. Here is the Generall, and here is the armie: There are the tributes, there be the mettall mines, and other miseries inferably following them that live under the subjection of others: which either to continue and endure forever, or straight to revenge, it lieth this day in this field. Wherefore, as ye are going to battell, beare in your minds both the freedome of your ancestors, and the bondage of your posteritie.

This speech they cheerefully received, as well with a song after their barbarous manner, as with confused acclamations and dissonant noises. And as the companies clustered together and glittering armour appeared, whiles the boldest advanced forward, and withall, the ranks were putting themselves in array, Agricola, albeit his souldiers were glad of that day, and scarce with words could be withheld, supposing it best to say somewhat, encouraged them in this wise.

Fellow souldiers and companions in armes: Your faithfull service and diligence these 8. yeares so painfully shewed, by the vertue and fortune of the Roman Empire, hath conquered red Britanny. In so many journees, in so many battels, we were of necessity to shew our selves either valiant against the enemy, or patient and laborious almost above and against nature to selfe. In which exploits wee have hitherto borne our selves both, so that neither desired I better souldiers, nor you other Captaine. Inasmuch as we have exceeded the limits, I of my predecessor, and you of yours. To the end of Britannie wee have found, not by fame and report, but we are with our armes and pavillions really invested thereof. Britain I say, is found and subdued. In marching, when the passage over bogs, mountaines and rivers toiled you out, how oft have I heard every valiant souldier say, when will the enemy present himselfe? when shall wee fight? Lo, they are now put up out of their holes, and hither they are come. Your wish, lo, is here, and place for your vertue: yea and all things to follow in an easie and expedite course if you win: but all against you, if you lose. For, as to have gone so much ground, escaped through the woods, passed over the firths, is honourable forward: so if we do lose, the vantages wee have this day will become our greatest disadvantage. For wee are not skilled so well in the country, we have not the like store of provision: but hands wee have and weapons, and therein all things included. For my part, I am long since resolved, that it is no safetie either for souldier or Generall to shew their backs, and therefore a commendable death is better than life with reproach, and commonly, safetie and honour are dwelling together: or if ought should misshappen, even this will bee a glory, to have died in the uttermost end of the world and nature. If new nations and souldiers unknowne were in the field, I would by the example of other armies embolden and encourage you: now, recount you your owne victorious exploits, and aske your owne eyes. These are the same men, which the last yeare assailed one legion by stealth in the night, and were by a blast of your mouth overthrowne: These of all other Britans, have been the most nimble in running away, and therefore have escaped the longest alive. For, as in Forrests and woods, the strongest beasts are chased away by main force, the cowardly and fearefull are scared with the very noise of the hunters: so the most valiant of the British nation, long since have been by you dispatched and slaine, the rascall herd of daftardly cowards only remaineth: whom at length we have found, not as having intended to stay and make head, but at last overtaken, and by extreme passion of feare standing as stocks, presenting occasion to us in this place of a worthy and memorable victory. Make an end therefore once for all of your warfare: and to fiftie yeares travells let this day impose a glorious conclusion: Approve to your country, that the Armie could never justly be charged, either with protracting the warre, or presences for not accomplishing the conquest.

As Agricola was yet speaking, the souldiers gave great tokens of servencie, and when hee had ended, seconded the speech with a joyfull applause, and ran straightwaies to their weapons. Agricola seeing them sufficiently animated, and rushing furiously forward, ordered his men in this manner. With the auxiliary footmen being eight thousand, he fortified the middle-tell: three thousand of their horse he put on both sides in the wings: commanding the Legions to stand behind before the trench of the camp to the greater glory of the victory, if we were obtained without shedding any Roman blood, otherwise for assistance and succour, if the vanguard should be repelled. The Britans were marshalled on the higher ground, full both for shew, and also to terrifie: The first battalion standing on the plaine, the rest in the ascent of the hill knit and rising, as it were, one over another. The middle of the field was filled with the clattering of chariots and horsemen. Then Agricola perceiving the enemy to exceed him in number, and fearing lest he should be assailed on the front and flank both at one instant: displayed his army in length: and although by that means his battell would become disproportionably long, and many advised him to take in the Legions, to being more forward to hope, than yielding to feare, he rejected the counsell, and leaving his horse advanced himselfe before the ensignes on foot.

In the first encounter before the joining, both sides discharged and threw: Wherein the Britans both employing art, and shewing resolution with their great swords and little targets voided our shot, or shooke them off: darting withall great store of theirs against us: till at length Agricola spying his vantage, exhorted three Batavian cohorts, and two of the Tungrians to presse forward and bring the matter to handy strokes and dint of sword: a thing, which they in respect of long service were able readily to performe: and contrariwise to the enemy prejudiciall and hurtfull, by reason of their small bucklers and huge swords. For the swords of the Britans being blunt pointed were no way for the close or for the open fight. Now as the Batavians began to deale blowes and lay about them, to strike with the pikes of their bucklers, to mangle their faces, and having overborne in the plaine all that resisted, to march up the hill, the rest of the cohorts gathering heart, upon emulation, violently beat downe all about them, and many halfe dead or wholly unoucht were left, for hast of winning the victory.

In the meane time, the troups of the horsemen began to flee: and the chariotters mingled themselves with the battell of the footmen: who albeit they had lately terrified others, were now distressed themselves, by the unevennesse of the ground, and thicke ranks of their enemies. Neither was the forme of this fight, like a loose skirmish of horsemen to and fro. But standing still, and maintaining their places, they fought withall by maine weight of horses to breake in and beare downe one another. The wandring waggons also and masterlesse horse affrighted, as feare carried them, over bare many times, those which met them, or thwarted their way. Now the Britans, which stood aloofe from the battell, on the height of the hill, and at their good leisure disclaimed our feewnesse, began to come downe by little and little, and to wheele about the backs of our men that were now in traine of winning the field, but that Agricola suspecting as much, opposed against them foure wings of horsemen purposely retained about him, for sudden dispatch, and all chances of war; and so, by repulsing them backe, as sharply as they ran fiercely to assaile, put them in rout. Thus the counsell of the Britans turned upon their owne heads, and the wing, by commandement of the leader turning quite from the battell in front, followed the enemy at the back, and pursued the chafe. Then might you have seen in the open fields a grievous and pittifull spectacle, cursing, wounding, taking, and killing of them that were taken, when others were offered. Now whole regiments of the enemies according to their severall dispositions, armed though they were, and more in number, turned their backs to the fewer: others unarmed sought their own death, offering themselves voluntarily to the slaughter. Every where there lay scattered, weapons, bodies, and mangled limbs, and the ground was every where embred with blood: and sometime even in them that were overcome, appeared both anger and valour: For when they approached the woods, uniting themselves; they entrapped unawares some of the foremost of our men which unadvisedly followed, not knowing the country. And but that Agricola with his presence every where assisted at need, setting about them certain cohorts of his bravest and most ready footmen, as it were in forme of a toile, and commanding some of his horsemen to forego their horses where the passes were narrow, and others, where the wood was thin to enter on horseback, no doubt we had taken some blow by our overmuch boldnesse. But after they saw our men again in strong array and good order to follow the chafe, they fled, not in troups troups as before, and attending each other, but utterly disbanded and single, and eschuing all company, toward the farre remote and desert places. The night and our satietie of blood made an end of the chafe. Of the enemies side ten thousand were slaine: three hundred and forty of ours. Amongst whom was Aulus Atticus Capitaine of a cohort, upon a youthfull heat of his owne, and through the fierce spirit of his horse, being carried into the midst of his enemies. That night, the winners for their parts solaced themselves with the victorie and spoile: and the Britans scattering out of order, crying and howling, (men and women together) take and draw with them their hurt persons, call unto them that were not hurt, forsake their owne houses, and in despite also set them on fire themselves: chuse out holes for to lurke in, and straight-waies for sake them; communicate some counsels together, and then have some glimmering of hope: sometime at the sight of their dearest beloved moved to pittie, more often stirred to rage: and certaine it is, that some, as by way of compassion and mercie, slew their owne wives and children. The day following discovered more plainly the greatness of the victorie. Every where desolation and silence: no stirring in the mountaines: the houses fired and smoaking a far off: no man to meet with our spies; who being sent abroad into all quarters found by their footsteps the flight was uncertaine, and that they were no where in companies together. Whereupon Agricola, because the summer was spent, and the warre could not conveniently be divided; bringeth his armie into the borders of the Horrestians: where receiving hostages he commanded the Admirall of his navie to saile about Britaine, lending him souldiers and strength for that purpose, and the terror of the Roman name was gone already before. Himselfe, with easie and gentle journies, to terrifie the new conquered nations with the very stay of his passage, disposed his footmen and horsemen in their wintering places: and withall the navy with prosperous wind and successe arrived at the port * Truulensis, from whence it departed, and coasting along the neerest side of Britaine returned thither againe. Then and never before, the Roman fleet having doubled the point of the utmost sea discovered and reported, Britan to be an Island, and withall found out and subdued the Isles of Orkney, before that time never knowne, which Orosius and as many writers as follow him ascribe falsly unto Claudius. This state of affaires in Britaine Agricola signified by letter without any amplifying termes, to Domitian: who after his manner, with a cheerefull countenance and grieved heart, received the newes: being inwardly pricked, to think that his late counterfeit triumph of Germany, wherein certaine slaves bought for money were attired, and their haire dressed as captives of that country, was had in derision and justly skorned abroad: whereas now, a true and great victorie, so many thousands of enemies being slaine, was famous and currant in every mans mouth: that it were indeed a most perilous point if a private mans name should be exalted above the name of the Prince. Many then in vaine had he suppressed the study of Oratory, and all other worthy politick arts, if he should in military glory be despised by another: For other matters might more easily be passed over; but to be a good commander of an army was a vertue above private estate; and peculiar for a Prince. With these and the like cares being tormented, and musing much in his closet alone, which was atoken and signe of some crueltie intended, hee thought it yet best for the present to dissemble and put over his malice, untill the heat of Agricola his glory, and love of his souldiers were somewhat abated: for, as yet he remained in charge. Wherefore he commanded that all the honours of triumphall ornaments, image triumphall and what else usually was conferred in lieu of triumph, should in Senate be awarded unto him in most ample and honorable termes: and sending a successor, caused withall a bruit to be spread, that the province of Syria then lying void by the death of Atilius Rufus a consular Lieutenant, and reserved for men of great qualitie, was purposed unto him. And a common opinion went, that Domitian sending one of his most secret and trusty servants to Agricola, sent withall the patent of Syria with instruction, that if he were in Britaine it should be delivered: and that the same man meeting Agricola as he crossed the seas, without speaking unto him or doing his message, returned againe to Domitian. Whether this were true or fained and surmised probably, as correspondent to the Princes disposition, I cannot affirme: But in the meane season Agricola had delivered to his successor the Province in good and peaceable state. And left his arrivall at Rome should be noted, by reason of the multitudes of people, which would goe out to see or to meet him, cutting off that courtesie of his friends, he entered the City by night, and in this manner. The night and our satiate of blood made an end of the chafe. Of the enemies side ten thousand were slaine: three hundred and forty of ours. Amongst whom was Aulus Atticus Capitaine of a cohort, upon a yonshfull heat of his owne, and through the fierce spirit of his horse, being carried into the midst of his enemies. That night, the winners for their parts solaced themselves with the victorie and spoile: and the Britans scattering out of order, crying and howling, (men and women together) take and draw with them their hurt persons, call unto them that were not hurt, forsake their owne houses, and in despite also set them on fire themselves: chuse out holes for to lurke in, and straight-waies forsake them; communicate some counsels together, and then have

B some glimmering of hope: sometime at the sight of their dearest beloved moved to pittie, more often stirred to rage: and certaine it is, that some, as by way of compassion and mercie, slew their owne wives and children. The day following discovered more plainly the greatnesse of the victorie. Every where desolation and silence: no stirring in the mountains: the houses fired and smoaking a far off: no man to meet with our spies; who being sent abroad into all quarters found by their footsteps the flight was uncertaine, and that they were no where in companies together. Whereupon Agricola, because the summer was spent, and the warre could not conveniently be divided; bringeth his armie into the borders of the

C Horrestians: where receiving hostages he commanded the Admirall of his navie to saile about Britaine, lending him souldiers and strength for that purpose, and the serour of the Roman name was gone already before. Himselfe, with easie and gentle journeyes, to terrifie the new conquered nations with the very stay of his passage, disposed his footmen and horsemen in their wintering places: and withall the navy with prosperous wind and successe arrived at the port * Trutensis, from whence it departed, and coasting along the nearest side of Britaine returned thither againe. Then and never before, the Roman fleet having doubled the point of the utmost sea discovered and reported, Britan to be an Island, and withall found out and subdued the Isles of Orkney, before that time never knowne, which Orosius and as many writers as follow him ascribe falsely unto Claudius. This state of affaires in Britaine Agricola signified by letter without any amplifying termes, to Domitian: who after his manner, with a cheerefull countenance and grieved heart, received the newes: being inwardly pricked, to think that his late counterfeited triumph of Germany, wherein certaine slaves bought

D for money were attired, and their haire dressed as captives of that country, was had in derision and justly scorned abroad: whereas now, a true and great victorie, so many thousands of enemies being slaine, was famous and currant in every mans mouth: that it were indeed a most perilous point if a private mans name should be exalted above the name of the Prince. Many then in vaine had he suppressed the study of Oratory, and all other worthy politick arts, if he should in military glory be despised by another: For other matters might more easily be passed over: but to be a good commander of an army was a vertue above private estate; and peculiar for a Prince. With these and the like cares being tormented, and musing much in his closet alone, which was atoken and signe of some crueltie intended, hee thought it yet best for the present to dissemble and put over his malice, untill the heat of Agricola his glory,

E and love of his souldiers were somewhat abated: for, as yet he remained in charge. Wherefore he commanded that all the honours of triumphall ornaments, image triumphall and what else usually was conferred in lieu of triumph, should in Senate be awarded unto him in most ample and honourable termes: and sending a successor, caused withall a bruit to be spread, that the province of Syria then lying void by the death of Atilius Rufus a consular Lieutenant, and reserved for men of great qualitie, was purposed unto him. And a common opinion went, that Domitian sending one of his most secret and trusty servants to Agricola, sent withall the patents of Syria with instruction, that if he were in Britaine it should be delivered: and that the same man meeting Agricola as he crossed the seas, without speaking unto him or doing his message, returned againe to Domitian. Whether this were true or fained and surmised probably, as correspondent to the Princes disposition, I cannot affirme: But in the meane season Agricola had delivered to his successor the Province in good and peaceable state. And lest his arrivall at Rome should be noted, by reason of the multitudes of people, which would goe out to see & to meet him, cutting off that courtesie of his friends, he entered the City by night, and

and by night came to the palace as he was willed. Where, being admitted to the Prince's presence, and received with a short salutation and no speech, he sorted himself with the rest of the waiters.

Agricola had for his successor, as others thinke, Co. Trebellius, but, as I take it, Salustius Lucullus, whom Domitian straight after slew, because he suffered certain spears of a new fashion to be called Lucullæ. At which time also, Arviragus flourished in this Island, and not in the daies of Claudius, as Geoffrey of Monmouth dreameth. For these verses of Juvenall are to be understood of Domitian:

*Omen habes magni clariq; triumphi:
Regem aliquem capies, aut de temone Britanno
Excidet * Arviragus*

A powerfull offe and signe thou hast, presaging triumph great:
Some King (sure) thou shalt prisoner take in chafe or battell heate:
Or else Arviragus shall lose his British royall seat.

There flourished likewise at Rome Claudia Rufina, a British dame, passing well learned, and withall as beautifull, whom Martiall commendeth in these verses;

*Claudia caruleis cum sit Rufina Britannis Edita, cur * Latia pectora plebis habet?
Quale decus forma? Romanam credere matres Italides possunt, Atithides esse suam.*

Sith from blew Britans Claudia Rufina doth descend,
How comes a learned Latian brest her person to commend:
How beautifull! Italian dames may her a Roman make:
And Attick wives againe full well, her for their daughter take.

This was, as John Bale and Matthew Parker Archbishop of Canturburie have written, the very same woman, of whom S. Paul maketh mention in his latter Epistle to Timothy) neither is the computation of times repugnant, howsoever others be of a contrary opinion.

Thus under the Empire of Domitian, when that farther part thereof, as being rough and unfruitfull, was left unto the barbarous Britans, this hither side was reduced full and whole into the forme of a province: Which was not governed by any Consular or Proconsular deputy, but was counted * Præfidiālis, and appropriate to the Cæsars: as being a prouince annexed unto the Roman Empire after the division of Provinces ordained by Augustus, and had Propretors of their owne. Afterwards when as Constantinus Maximus had set downe a new forme of Common-weale, under a Prefect or Provost of Pretors degree of Gaule, there was set over it a vicegerent, and together with him in matters of war the * Count or Earle of Britan, an Earle or Count of the Saxony coast by Britan: and a Duke or Generall of Britan, besides Presidents, Auditors or Receivers & such others. Moreover out of those 29. Legions, which the Romans had appointed through their Imperial government, three of them lay in garison to restrain that Province, to wit, the second Legion Augusta, the first Legion victrix, & the twentieth victrix. But this is meant of the time of Severus: For before, we learn out of Authors, that other Legions there were, and more in number. And although Strabo writeth that there was neede of no more than one band of souldiers, to the keeping of Britaine in subjection, yet in the raigne of Claudius there were placed here, the second Legion Augusta, the ninth Legion Hispaniensis, & the fourteenth named Gemina Martia victrix. Yea and about the time of Vespasian, Josephus sheweth, that four Legions served in this Island: Britaine, saith hee, is compassed about with the Ocean, and almost as big as our world. The Romans there inhabiting, have brought it under their dominion, and foure Legions doe keepe in subjection an Island peopled with so great a multitude. And doubtlesse, the standing guards and Camps of Legions and Roman souldiers, were many times the Seminaries, as it were, and Seed-plots of Cities and townes, as in other provinces, so also in this our Britan. Thus was the yoke of subjection laid upon the Britans, first by a garison of souldiers, which alwaies with terror were ready to command the Inhabitants, afterwards by tribute and imposts: and in that

The beginning of Cities. The Roman yoke.

A that respect forced they were to have Publicans, that is to say, greedy cormorants and hordleeches, who sucked their blood, confiscated their goods and exacted tributes in the name of the dead: Neither were they permitted round the ancient lawes of their country, but magistrates were sent from the people of Rome, with absolute power and commission to minister justice even in capital matters. For, Provinces had Propretors, Lieutenants, Presidents, Pretors and Proconsuls. Every citie also and Towne had their municipall magistrats. The Pretor proclaimed yearly solemn sessions and Assizes, at which he determined the weightier causes sitting aloft upon a high Tribunal seat, and guarded with his Factors about him proudly executed his jurisdiction: on rods and whipping cheere were presented to the backs, the axe and heading to the necks of the common people, and every yeare they were forced to receive one new ruler or other allotted unto them. Neither was this sufficient: they maintained discord and dissention among them, some also they favoured among the rest, that they might have them to be the instruments of this their servitude.

This yoke of the Romans although it were grievous, yet comfortable it proved and a saving health unto them: for that healthsome light of Iesu Christi shone withall upon the Britans, whereof more hereafter, and the brightnesse of that most glorious Empire, chased away all savage barbarisme from the Britans minds, like as from other nations whom it had subdued. For Rome, as saith Rutilius.

Federe communis utroque cunctis fuit:*

Compassed the world with triumphs bringing lawes;
And all to live in common league doth cause.

And in another place speaking unto the same Rome most truly and in these elegant verses;

*Fecisti patriam deversis gentibus unam.
Proferat in justis te dominante capis.*

Dunig, offers victis proprii consortia iura,
Præm fecisti quod prius orbis erat.

Thou hast of divers nations one entire country framed,
Happy it was for lawlesse folke, that they by thee were tamed.

For offering use, to them subdued, of thine owne proper lore,
One civill state thou mad'st of that, which was wild world before.

For, to say nothing of the rest of the Provinces, the Romans having brought over Colonies hither, and reduced the naturall inhabitants of the Island unto the society of civill life, by training them up in the liberall Arts, and by sending them into Gaule for to learne perfectly the lawes of the Romans (whereupon Juvenal

Gallia caudicibus domui sacunda Britannus, Gaule eloquent of Britans hath good pleading lawyers made.)

E governed them with their lawes, and framed them to good manners and behaviour, so as in their diet and apparell they were not inferior to any other Provinces: they furnished them also with goodly houses and stately buildings, in such sort, that the reliques and rubbish of their ruines doe cause the beholders now, exceedingly to admire the same: and the common sort of people doe plainly say, these Roman workes were made by Giants, whom in the North parts they use to call in their vulgar tongue Eitians, for Heathens (if I be not deceived) or Eithicks. Certes, they are workes of exceeding great admiration, and sumptuous magnificence: but especially the Wall, whereof I will write more in due place: and those Caucies throughout the whole land; a wonderfull piece of worke, what with dreining and drying up the meres in some places, and what with casting up banks where low vallies were, in others so fenced and paved with stone, and withall of that breadth, that they can well receive and with roome enough, waies meeting one the other. Now what manner of Caucies these were, let Gallene tel you.

The wales, quoth he, Trajans repaired, by paving with stone, or casting with banks: as of such pieces of them as were most and myrie, by stocking up and ridding such as were rough and overgrowne with bushes and briars: by making bridges over rivers that could not be waded through: where the way seemed longer then needed by cutting out another shorter: if any where by reason of some steep hill, the passage were hard and uneasy, by turning it aside through easier places: now in aſcēt were haunted with wild beaſts, or lay waſt and deſert, by drawing it from thence through places inhabited, and withall, by laying ſeverall ſmall uneven and rugged grounds. But now adaies theſe of ours, being diſmembred, as it were, and cut one piece from another in ſome places, by reaſon that the country people digge out graveſſes from thence, and ſcarcelly to be ſcene: yet elſewhere, leading through paſtures and by-grounds out of the rode way, the bankes are ſo high, that evidently they ſhew themſelves.

Theſe cauſeys or Street-waies, the Romans called Vias Conſulares, Regias, Prætorias, Militares, Publicas, curſus publicos, and Actus, as it is to be ſcene in Ulpian and Julius Frontinus. Ammianus Marcellinus termeth them Aggeres itinerarios & publicos: Sidonius Apollinaris, Aggeres, and Tellures inaggeratas: Beda and the latter writers, Stratas, that is Streets.

Our Chronicles, doubtleſſe herein deceived, doe hold, that there were but onely foure ſuch cauſeys as theſe: of which, the firſt was Walling-ſtreet, ſo called of one Vitellian, I wote not what he was, who had the charge thereof (and indeed the Britans named Vitellian, in their tongue Gueſalin) and Werlam-ſtreet, for that it went through Verolanium, which elſewhere alſo, the people dwelling nere unto it, named, High dike, High ridge, Fortie-foot-way, and Ridge-way. The ſecond they commonly call Ikemildſtreet, becauſe it began in the ſcenes country: The third, the Foſſe, for that (as men thinke) it was fenced on both ſides with a ditch; and the fourth Ermiſ-ſtreet, by a German word, of Mercurie (whom as I am informed by Iohn okſpau a greace learned man) under the name of Ermifal, that is, the Colonne of Mercurie, the Germans our ancient progenitors, worſhipped.

Now, that Mercurie had the charge of waies, his name was among the Greekes, may ſhew ſufficiently: as alſo his Statues with foure ſides, called in old time Hermes, which were ſet every where upon high waies. It hath been generally thought, that one Mulmutius (I know not what he ſhould be) many hundred yeares before the birth of Chriſt, made theſe cauſeys: but ſo far am I from believing it, that I dare confidently avouch, the Romans by little and little founded and railed them up. Whileſt Agri-cola, ſaith Tacitus, governed Britaine, ſeverall waies were enjoyed, and farre diſtant places (by the purveyors commandement) that the country ſhould carry from the neareſt ſtanding camps, or wintering places, to thoſe that were farre off, and out of the way: And the Britans complained, as the ſame Tacitus writeth, That the Romans wore out, and conſumed their bodies and hands, in cleering of woods, and paving the Fens, with a thouſand ſtripes & reprochfull indignities. And ſo we read in ancient records, That in the daies of Honorius and Arcadius there were made in Britaine certain beaten high waies from ſea to ſea. That this was the Romans worke, Beda witneſſeth: The Romans inhabited (ſaith he) within the wall, which, as I rehearſed before, Severus had made overthwart the Iſland toward the ſoutherne ſide, which the Cities, Churches, and ſtreet waies there made doe witneſſe at this day. About the making of ſuch cauſeys and high waies, the Romans were wont to exerciſe their ſouldiers, and the common multitude, left being idle, they ſhould grow ſadious, and affe alteration in the Sate. The Romans, as Iſidorus writeth, made Cauſeys in ſundry places, almoſt through the world, both for the direction of journeys, and alſo becauſe the people ſhould not be idle: and to the making and paving of ſuch cauſeys, priſoners were many times condemned, as may be gathered out of Suetonius, in the life of Caius. And there are to be ſcene in Spaine, the Cauſeys called Salamantica or Argemica, as alſo in France certain Rode waies, called Via militares, paved by the Romans; to ſay nothing, of the way Appia, Pompeia, Valeria, and others in Italie.

A long theſe Cauſeys and high waies, Auguſtus placed young men at firſt, as poſts within ſmall diſtances one from another: and afterward ſwift wagons, to give notice with all ſpeed and out of hand, what was doing in every place. Nere, or upon theſe Cauſeys, Sueton. in Octavius.

A Cawſies, were ſeated Cities and Manſions, which had in them Innes furniſhed with all neceſſaries belonging to this life for travellers, and way-faring perſons to abide and reſt in, as alſo Mutations; For ſo they called in that age, the places where ſtrangers, as they journied, did change their poſt-horſes, draught beaſts, or wagons. He therefore that ſeeketh not about theſe Rode waies for thoſe places, which are mentioned in the Itinerarie of Antoninus, ſhall no doubt miſſe the truth, and wander out of the way.

Neither, thinke much of your labour, in this place to note, that the Emperors erected at every miles end, along theſe Cawſies certaine little pillars or Obelisks, with numerall Characters or Letters cut in them, to ſignifie how many miles: Whereupon Sidonius Apollinaris, writeth thus:

*Antiquis tibi nec teratur agger;
Cujus per ſpatium ſatis vetuſtus,
Nomen Cæſareum viret columna.*

That ancient cawſey, doe not decay,
Where on good old pillars along the way,
The Cæſars name ſtands freſh for aie.

Nere alſo unto theſe high waies, on both ſides were Tombs and Sepulchers, with Inſcriptions graven upon them in memorie of brave and noble men, that the paſſengers by, might be put in mind, that as thoſe ſometimes were mortall men, ſo themſelves are now. For the repairing likewise of the ſaid cawſeys, as wee may ſee in the Code of Theodoſius title, de ſanere muniendo, that is, Of making and mending waies, They all were willing upon a good and profitable devotion, who could doe beſt, and make moſt ſpeed in this buſineſſe. Furthermore, in our owne ancient lawes, there is mention made, de pace quatuor Chemoniarum, that is, Viarum ſub majori iudicio, that is, Touching the peace of the foure Rode-waies in ſome higher Court.

Under the raigne of Nerva, the writers have diſcontinued the ſtorie of Britannie. But in the time of Trajanus, the Britans may ſeem to have revolted and rebelled: and evident it is out of Spartianus, that ſubdued then they were. Moreover, while Adrianus was Emperour, Julius Severus ruled the Iſland: and when he was called away againſt the Jewes, who then were in an upſore, the Britans could not have beene kept in their allegiance to the Romans, had not Adrianus come among them in perſon: who being then Conſull the third time, in the yeare of Chriſt 124. ſeemeth by the proweſſe of his armie to have diſcomfited his enemies. For I have ſcene in one piece of mony of his coining, the ſtampe of an Emperour with three ſouldiers, whom I judge to repreſent three Legions, with this Inſcription, EXER. BRITANNICUS: and another bearing this Inſcription RESTITUTOR BRITANNY. This Prince reformed many things throughout the Iſland: and was the firſt that built a wall between the barbarous Britans, and the Romans foureſcore miles in length: laying the foundation thereof within the ground of huge piles or ſtokes; and faſtning them together, in manner of a ſtrong hedge or mound. For which expedition of his, Florus the Poet plaied upon him, thus:

*Ego nolo Cæſar eſſe Ambulare per Britannos, Scythicas pati pruinas.
I will in no wife Cæſar be,
To walke along in Britanic
The Scythicke froſts to feele and ſee.*

Unto whom, Adrianus wrote back in this wiſe:

*Ego nolo Florus eſſe, Ambulare per tabernas,
Latitare per popinas,
Culices pati rotundos.
And I will never Florus be,
To walke from ſhop to ſhop, as he;
To lurke in Tavernes ſecretly,*

Xiphilinus out of Dio.

Under Antoninus Pius (by whose ordinance as many as were in the Roman world, became Citizens of Rome) this warre brake out againe into a light fire, which hee so quenched by driving the barbarous Britans further off, under the conduct of Lollius Urbicus Lieutenant, and by making another wall of turfe, that thereupon he was named BRITANNICUS: and hee deserved singular commendation, for that hee had fined the Brigates with the losse of one part of their Lands, who had infested with roades Genouinia, a neighbour province under the protection and allegiance of the Romans. And at this time, as we collect out of Jabolenus, Sejus Saturnius was Archigubernus of the Navie in Britannie: But whether by this title, hee were an Admirall of the said Navie, or a principall Pilot, or the Master of a ship, I would have the Lawyers to tell.

But the Britans, giving occasions still of quarrels and warres, one after another began a commotion under Antoninus Philosophus: for the appeasing whereof, Calphurnius Agricola was sent, and seemeth to have ended the same with fortunate successe. Which commendation for the dispatching of this warre, Fronto, for Roman eloquence comparable to the best, and second to none, would needs give unto Antoninus the Emperour. For albeit he sitting still, and holding his Court in the very palace of Rome, gave out only his commission and warrants for to make this warre, yet he protesteth, that like unto the Pilot sitting at the helme to steere a galley, he deserved the glory of the whole course and sailing in that voyage. At the same time there served also in the wars of Britannie, Helvius Pertinax brought hither out of the Parthian warre, and here staid.

Whiles Commodus was Emperour, Britannie, was all of a Garboile, full of warres, and seditious troubles. For the barbarous Britans, having passed over the wall, made great waste, and hewed in pieces the Romans, both Captaine and Souldier. For the repressing of which rebels, Vipius Marcellus was sent: who had so fortunate an hand in taming their audacious stomacks, that his prowesse was soon defaced, and depraved with envie, and himselfe called backe. This Captaine was of all others most vigilant: and being desirous that the rest about him might be as watchfull, he wrote every evening xij. tables throughout, such as commonly are made of the Linden-tree wood: and commanded one of his attendants about him, to carry the same unto drivers of the souldiers, some at one houre of the night, and some at another, whereby they might thinke their Generall was ever awake, and so themselves might sleepe the lesse.

Of whose temperance thus much also is reported: And albeit otherwise his nature was able to resist sleepe, yet that he might doe it the better, he brought to passe by fasting and abstinence,

A sinence. For to the end that he would not feed of bread to the full, hee caused it to be brought from Rome to him into the campe; that by reason of the staleness of it, hee could not eat any whit more than was needfull. But when he, I say, was called backe, all licentious wantonnesse brake into the Campe, and the forces in Britannie, letting the raines loose of military discipline, became unruly, and refused the command & government of Commodus, although by some of his flatterers he was stiled Britannicus. Moreover, they that served in Britannie suborned and sent a thousand and five hundred of their owne ranke into Italy against Perrennius, a man that not onely carried an outward shew and countenance, but of all the Emperors minions could indeed do most with him: accusing him that he had made captaines over souldiers certain of the gentlemen's degree, and put Senators out of place, and withall, that he had laid wait to take away the Emperors life. Commodus gave care to this information, and believed it, whereupon he delivered the man into their hands: who after he had with many indignities bene whipped, lost his head, and was proclaimed a traitor to his country. Howbeit these seditious stirs Helvius Pertinax repressed, not without great danger, being himselfe almost slaine, and for certaine, left for dead among those that were slaine.

Now when Britannie was in peaceable estate, Clodius Albinus received it from Commodus, and withall, afterwards for his worthy exploits in Britannie the name of Cæsareus: but soone after, because in a publike assembly he had made an invective against the government of the Emperors, Junius Severus was placed in his roome.

At which very time, the thicke mists of superstition being scattered (not under M. Aurelius and L. Verus Emperors, as Beda writeth but under Commodus, when Eleutherus was Bishop of Rome) the heavenly light & brightness of Christianitie, by the means of King Lucius shone upon this Island. Which Prince, (as we find in the ancient * reports and lives of Martyrs, usually read in the Church) admiring the integrity and holy life of the Christians, made petition unto Eleutherus the Pope, by the mediation of Elvan & Meduan, two Britans, that both himselfe and his subjects might be instructed in christian religion. Then sent he hither forthwith, Fugiatius and Donatianus, two holy men, with letters, which at this day be extant, & (as very many are persuaded) are not forged but authentically, as bearing date, when L. Aurelius Commodus was second time Consul with Velpronius. Which holy men instructed the King and others in the mysteries of christian religion. Hereupon it is, that Ninnius writeth thus of this King, King Lucius quoth he, is surnamed Lever Maur, that is, a Prince of great glory, for the Faith which in his time came. Now for those that call these matters of King Lucius into question (as many doe in these daies) as if there had bene at that time no King in Britannie, which they suppose was full and whole reduced into a province before, I wish them to call to remembrance thus much, That the Romans by ancient custome had in their provinces Kings as the instruments of bondage; that the Britans even then, refused to obey Commodus; and that themselves possessed and

E held freely, those parts of the Island which were beyond the foresaid wall, had their Kings of their owne, and that Antoninus Pius a few yeares before, having ended warre, permitted Kingdomes to be ruled by their own Kings, and provinces by their own * Comites. What should let then, but that Lucius might be King over that part of the Island, unto which the Romans forces never came? And verily, that which Tertullian hath put downe, who wrote much about those daies, if we thoroughly weigh his words, and the time, may very aptly be referred to the Britans conversion unto Christ: Those places, quoth he, among the Britans, which yielded the Romans no access, are now subdued unto Christ: and somewhat after, Britannie is enclosed within the compasse of the Ocean. The nation of the Mauri, and the barbarous Getulians are beset by the Romans, for feare they might passe beyond the limits of their countries. What should I speake of the Romans, who with garrisons of their Legions fortifie their Empire? neither are they able to extend the power of their dominion, beyond those very nations. But the Kingdome and name of Christ reacheth farther still, it is believed in every place, and is worshipped of all those people above named, &c.

But our Ecclesiasticall writers who have emploied both time and diligence in the consideration consideration of this point endeavor and labour to prove, and that out of ancient authors of credit, that before this time, in the very dawning and infancy of the Church, Britanny had received christian religion: and namely that Joseph of Arimathea a noble Senator, sailed out of Gaule into Britanny, and that Claudia Rufina the wife of Aulus Pudens, which woman, as it is credibly thought, S. Paul nameth in his latter Epistle to Timothy, and whom the Poet Martiall so highly commendeth, was a Britan boine. They cite also the testimony of Dorotheus, who commonly goeth under the name of the Bishop of Tyre, who in his Synopsis hath recorded, that Simon Zelotes, after he had travailed through Mauritania, was at last slaine and buried in Britanny: as also that Aristobulus, whom S. Paul mentioneth in his Epistle to the Romans, was made Bishop of Britanny: (whereto Nicephorus inclineth) notwithstanding he speaketh of Britania and not of Britannia: they report likewise upon the authoritie of Symeon that great Metaphrast, and of the Greeks * Menology, that S. Peter came hither and spread abroad the light of Gods word: out of Sophronius also and Theodoret that S. Paul after his second imprisonment in Rome, visited this our country. Whereupon Venantius Fortunatus if he may be beleevd as a Poet, writeth thus of him, namely he speaketh of his doctrine.

Pass'd over Seas, where any Isle makes either port or bay,
And lands, so far as Britans coast or cape of Thule lay.

But to this purpose maketh especially that which erewhile I alleged out of Tertullian; as also that which Origen recordeth, How the Britans with one consent embraced the Faith, and made way themselves unto God by means of the Druides, who alwaies did bear upon this article of belife, That there was but one God. And verily of great moment and importance is that with me, that Gildas writeth, after hee had mentioned the rebellion of Boodicia, and treated of the revenge thereof, Meane while, quoth he, Christ, that true Sun, shining with his most glittering brightnesse upon the universall world, not from the temporall skie and firmament, but even from the highest cope of heaven, exceeding all times, vouchsafed first, his beames, that is to say, his precepts and doctrine in the time as wee know of Tiberius Caesar, unto this frozen Island full of Ice, and lying out as it were in a long tract of earth remote from the visible sunne. Chrysostome likewise, (to note so much by the way) writeth of the Christian religion in this Iland, as followeth: The British Islands seated without this sea, and within the very Ocean, have felt the power of the word (for even there also be Churches founded, and altars erected) of that word, I say, which is planted in the soules, and now also in the lips of all people. And the same Chrysostome in another place: How often have folke in Britanny fed of mans flesh? but now with fasting they refresh the soule. Likewise S. Hierome; The Britan divided from our world, if he proceed in religion, leaving the westerne parts toward the Suns setting, will seeke Hierusalem, a Citie known unto him by same only, and relation of scriptures. But now passe we forward from the Church to the Empire.

When Commodus was slaine, Pertinax being called to the Empire, sent presently Albinus againe over into Britanny. But after that Pertinax within eight hundred and two daies was made away, Didius Iulianus, (who likewise was within a while killed) at Rome, Pescennius Niger in Syria, Clodius Albinus in Britanny, and Septimius Severus in Pannonia, all together at once take upon them the sovereignty of the Empire. Severus being next unto Rome, hastneth first to Rome, and, with consent of the souldiers and Senate, proclaimed Emperor, straightwaies (because he would not leave an enemy behind at his backe) craftily createth Albinus, Caesar: this Albinus, chiefe commander of the forces in Britanny and Gaule, and having stamped mony with his image upon it, set up his statutes, and conferred upon him the honorable dignitie of a Consul, wisely with good foresight dulceth and kindly intreateth the men. Then maketh he an expedition into the East against Niger, whom in plaine field hee gave battell unto, vanquished and slew. The City * Bizantium after 3. yeares siege he forced and wonne: the Adiabenes, Arabians and other nations hee brought to his sub-

A section. Being now puffed up with pride, for these fortunate victories, and impatient of a companion in government, he sent under-hand murderers of purpose to dispatch Albinus: but seeing his secret practises tooke not effect, hee openly proclaimeth him Traitor, and an enemy to the State, and with all the speede he could make, hastneth into Gaule against him: where Albinus with the choice and chiefe strength of the British armie made head neere unto * Lyons. The Albinians fought most valiantly, in so much as Severus himselfe, throwing from him his purple robe, began with his hands to fight. But when the said British forces, as if now the victorie had bene in their hands, displayed their ranks in thinner arrayes, and ran furiously upon their enemies backs, discomfited and in rout, Laetus, one of Severus his Captaines, who with his selfe and unfoiled troupees, waited untill then, for to see the issue of the battell (having heard withall that Severus was slaine) with a purpose and resolution now to take the Empire upon him, charged upon them, and put them to flight. And Severus, having by this time rallied his men, and resumed the purple Robe asore said, followed likewise fiercely upon them, and having slaine Albinus with a number of other, obtained a most fortunate victorie.

Upon this, Severus (having alone the Sovereignty of the whole world) sent first Heraclianus to seize upon Britaine, and to rule it: when Virius Lupus, as Proprætor and Lieutenant (whom Vlpian the Civill Lawyer nameth President of Britaine) who, as we shall relate in place convenient, built many new Castles there: howbeit, driven hee was in the end to redeeme his owne peace, at the hands of the Maeatae, with a great summe of money, after hee had recovered some few prisoners, considering that the Caledonians kept not their word, who had promised to keepe under the said Maeatae. And being not able after many losses and calamities sustained, to repress the sudden rodes, and assaults made by the enemies, of necessity hee sent for Severus himselfe, who gladly and thankfully taking hold of this good occasion, to withdraw and weane his sonnes (given to licentious rioting) from the delightfull pleasures of Rome-Citie, and therewith to augment his owne file with the addition of Britannicus: albeit, he was above threecore yeares of age, and gowtie besides, fully resolveth with his two sons, Bassianus (whom he had named Antoninus, & Augustus) D Geta Caesar, and the Legions, to enter Britaine. The Britans forthwith sent Embassadors unto him for peace. Whom after he had of purpose detained with him a good while, till he might prepare all things meet for warre, hee sent away, as they came without obtaining their suit: and leaving his sonne Geta, (whom hee created Augustus at his first arrivall in Britaine) in the higher part of the Province which continued in obedience to the Romans, for the civill jurisdiction and administration of the affaires there: himselfe with Antoninus went into the farther parts, where being occupied in cutting down woods, making bridges, and drying up the meres, he fought no battell: howbeit, what with the ambuscadoes of enemies, and what with sickness, hee lost fiftie thousand of his men: Thus writeth Dio. But Herodian hath recorded, that in certaine light skirmishes, whiles the barbarous Britaines kept the sennie bogs, and most thick woods, out of which they might more safely assaile the Romans he had the upper-hand. Yet he enforced them in the end to a league, with this condition, that they should yield unto him a good part of their Countrey. And that which is the greatest honour and ornament of his Empire, he fenced it with a wall over thwart the Island, from one coast of the Ocean to another: For these victories, he stamped certaine pieces of money with this Inscription, VICTORIA BRITANNICA, assumed the surname of BRITANNICVS MAXIMVS; and his sonne Geta named BRITANNICVS bare it, as appeareth by his coines. Howbeit, the Britans afterward (having broken covenant) began to rebell, and make alteration in the State, whereupon his wrathfull indignation against them brake out into such termes, as that in an assembly of his souldiers, he gave them in charge to make a generall massacre of them all, using these verses out of Homer, to this effect:

Let none escape your bloody hands, but be they sure to die,
Spare not the very babes unborne, in mothers wombe that lie.

These rebels when he had in some sort repressed by the helpe of his own forces, sickned, not so much upon any bodily dis ease, as for griefe and sorrow of mind, occasioned by the desperate and unreclaimable mildemeanour of his Sonne Antoninus, who once or twice gave the attempt to kill him with his owne hand, and so he ended up his vitall breath at Yorke, uttering at the point of death these his last words: A troubled state of Common weale I found in every place: but, I leave it who in peace and quietnesse, even among the Britains. His body here was in militarie fort, carried forth by his souldiers, bestowed in a funerall fire, and honoured with a solemne funeral, and running at Tilt, performed by his owne souldiers and sonnes. I might peradventure be censured for my vanitie, if I should relate in this place the prodigies that were before his death, and namely, as touching the footie and black hostes or Sacrifices, as also the coronet made of the deadie and moutnefull cypresse, which a scurrile Buffon and jester presented unto him with these words, Thou hast bene all, now be a God: but after what manner he was canonized a God, I will not thinke much of mine owne paine, to annex hereunto, considering that the knowledge thereof may delight the reader also.

The Apotheosis, or Deification of the Emperour.

Herodian.

A Custome the Romanes have, to consecrate those Emperours that die, their Sonnes or Successors surviving. And whosoever are in this wise honoured, are canonized and registered in the Rolles of their Divi, that is, Gods. Now, during this complement, they hold a generall mourning thorow the whole citie, and the same mixed with a festiveall solemnitie. For, after the Princes death, they burie the bodie honourably, and with sumptuous funeral, according to the manner of other men: But withall, they frame an image of waxe, resembling in all points the party deceased, and lay the same openly at the entry of the palace, upon a most ample and stately bed of Iworie, erected on high, and covered with cloth of gold. And verily, that image both with a patish and wan colour like unto a sicke man. About the bed on both sides, there sit a great part of the day, the whole bodie of the Senate on the right hand, arrayed in their blackes: and on the left hand certain Dames and Ladies, who are by the place and dignity of the husband, or parents worshipfull. And there, not one of them seeme to weare any gold about them, nor to be adorned with jewels, but clad in white and slender garments, they represent mourners. This do they for seven daies together: during which time, the Physicians resort daily into him to touch his pulse, and consider of his disease, and thereupon as of their patient, judicially pronounce, that he groweth worse and worse. This after a seven night, when it seemed that he was departed, certaine of the noblest, and choise young gentlemen, as well of the Senators as Knights degree, take up the foresaid bed upon their shoulders, and carrie it thorow the high street, called Sacra, into the old Forum, where the Roman Magistrates had wont to lay down their rule and governments. Here, on both sides were certaine greses or steps in manner of staires raised, upon which, on the one hand was placed a quire of boies of noblest birth, and of the Partisan degree, and on the other, a company of women likewise of noble parentage, singing in commendation of the dead Prince, hymnes and sonets, entuned in a solemne and mournfull note. Which done, they take up the said bed or hearse againe, and carrie it out of the Citie into Campus Martius: where, in the broadest place of the said field, a frame or turret foure square with equall sides was raised, and the same made in manner of a tabernacle, of no other matter than main great pieces of timber. And verily within it was all over filled with dry fennell: but without, adorned with rich hangings woven with gold wire between, with divers ivory portraicts of Imagerie, and sumptuous pictures. Over this frame there stood another somewhat lesse: butbeit, in forme and furniture very like unto the former, with windowes and doores standing open. And so a third and fourth turret, smaller every one than that next beneath it, and others likewise still one after another, until you come to the last and utmost, which is the least and highest of all the rest. The manner of this whole building a man may well compare to these lanternes or light-towers standing by haven sides, and are commonly called Phari, which give light by fire in the night time, and direct ships at sea in their course to safe harbours. The hearse then being mounted up into the second tabernacle, they get together spices and odours of all sorts, likewise all the sweet smelling fruits, hearbs, juices and liquors, that the whole world can yield, and thereon poutre the same forth

by

by heape-meale. For their is not a nation, citie or state, nor any person of worth and make above the rest, but strive a vie every one to bestow in honor of the Prince, those last gifts and presents. Now when there is a mightie heape of the said spices gotten together, so that the whole roome is filled therewith, then all the Gentlemen of the Knights order, first ride about that edifice, marching in a certaine measure: and there with in their courses and recourses observe a warlike kind of motion round, in just measure and number. The open chariots likewise are driven about by courtiers in purple roabes of honor sitting thereupon to guide and direct them with vizards on their faces resembling all the redoubted captaines and renowned Emperors of Rome. These ceremonies thus performed, the Prince that next succeedeth in the Empire, takes a torch, and first himselfe sets it to the tabernacle afore said: then, all the rest from every side put fire under, so that forthwith every place being full of the said dry fuel and odors, kindle and catch fire mightily. Then straightwaies from the highest and least tabernacle, as it were out of some lower or high turret together with the fire put underneath, an Eagle was let flie, and the same was supposed to carry up the Princes soule into heaven. And so from that time forward was the Emperour reputed and by the Romans adored among the rest of the Gods. Thus much by way of digression and beside the matter: now let us returne.

Antoninus Caracalla.

Antoninus Caracalla the sonne of Severus, pursued the reliques of the war by his Captaines for a while in Britaine: but soone after he made peace, surrendering to the enemy their territories and castles. Howbeit in a spirit of ambition hee assumed to himselfe in his stile the name of BRITANNICVS, yea and of BRITANNICVS MAXIMVS. His brother Geta likewise, took upon him the title and addition of BRITANNICVS. For we have seen his money coined with this Inscription, IMP. CAES. P. SEPT. GETAPIVS. AVG. BRIT. PONTIF. TRI. P. III. COS. II. PP.

Nonius Philippus Propretor.

From this time forward, writers have in long silence passed over the affaires of Britaine: For Alexander Severus was not slaine, as some would have it, in Sicilla a town of Britaine, but in Gaule. This certaine evidence onely have wee out of an antique stone, that Nonius Philippus was here Propretor under Gordianus the yonger. While Gallienus the Emperour gave himselfe over to all manner of riotousnesse, the State of Rome either through the careless managing of affaires, or by some inclination of the Destinies lay dismembred as it were, and maimed in all parts: and a heave rent there was and revolt of this Province from the Roman Captaine. For thirty tyrants there were who in divers places usurped rule and dominion: among whom Lollianus Victorinus, Posthumus, the Tetrici and Marius bare soveraigne sway, as I suppose, in this Island: For their coines are here in great abundance digged up daily.

Bonofus. Now, Languedoc Province and Dauphine.

Under Aurelian, that notable bibber Bonofus, a Britan borne entred upon the Empire together with Proculus, who claimed to himselfe all Britaine, Spaine, and Braccata Gallia, which provinces Florianus had for two moneths governed, but being in a long and bloody battell vanquished by Probus, he hanged himselfe, whereupon this jest went commonly on him, There hangs a tankard, and not a man.

Probus Emperour. Zolimus.

Howbeit Probus was welcomed into Britaine with new troubles and commotions: For one, whom Probus himselfe, induced by the commendation of his familiar friend Victorinus Maurus, had promoted to an office of state, practised a revolt. For which he fell out by way of expostulation with Victorinus, who having gotten leave to depart unto the said party, and feining that he fled and was escaped from the Emperour, being kindly entertained of the tyrant flue him in the night and returned to Probus, and therewith was the province rid of these broiles. But who this tyrant was no man hath related: Howbeit, he may seeme to be that Cl. Corn. Lælianus, whose pieces of coine are found in this Island, and not elsewhere. Moreover, Probus sent hither the Burgundians and Vandals whom he had subdued, and granted them places to inhabit: who afterwards, so often as any one went about to raise sedition, stood the Romans in good stead. Now, whereas Vopiscus writeth, that Probus permitted the Britans to have vines, there is a right learned man that feareth lest hee have inconsiderately put this down in writing, as if this land were unfit for vineyards: & yet it hath vines, vines, and for certain it is knowne, that it had very many. In regard of so many tyrants rising up in these daies within this Province, Porphyrie, who lived in this age, crieth out in these termes, Britaine a fertile Province of tyrants.

After this, Carus Augustus the Emperour allotted by decree this our country, together with Gaule, Spaine and Illyricum unto his son Carinus. That he warred here, some there be that slightly indeed, but how truly I wot not, gather out of these verses of Nemesianus;

Nec tacam quæ nuper bella sub Arcto,

Dioclesian and Maximian Emperours.
Bononiam Galliz.

Under Dioclesian, Carausius a Menapian borne, a man of very base parentage, howbeit inventive and active withall, who for his valour shewed in battels at sea became renowned, was ordained Captaine of * Bologne in Gaule to put backe and drive away the Saxons and Frankners that troubled the seas. This Carausius having at first from time to time taken many of the Barbarians prisoners, and yet neither brought in all the bootie and pillage into the Emperours treasury, nor made restitution of goods unto the Provincials: afterwards when as hee vanquished and subdued but few of them, began deeply to be suspected, that of set purpose he admitted the Barbarians to enter, to the end in their passage by he might intercept them with booty, and so by this occasion enrich himselfe: whereupon Maximian Augustus the Emperour gave commandement that he should be killed. Whereof he having certaine intelligence, tooke upon him the Imperiall ensignes, and seized Britan into his own hands, withdrew the Navy that lay in defence of Gaule, built many ships after the Roman manner, adjoynd to himselfe the Roman Legion, kept out the companies of forreine souldiers, assembled and drew together the French Merchants to muster, fortified Bologne with a garrison, conveyed away, and tooke to his owne use the publike revenewes of Britan and Batavia, allured by the spoiles of whole provinces no small power of Barbarian forces to be his associates, and the Franks especially, whom he trained to sea-service, and in one word, made all the sea coasts every way dangerous for passage. To the vanquishing of him, Maximianus set forward with a puissant army, out of which * some there were who in the very voyage suffered death gloriously for Christs sake: but when he was come to the sea-side, being skared partly for want of sea-souldiers, and partly with the rage of the British Ocean, staied there; and having made a fained peace with Carausius, yielded unto him the rule of the Island, considering he was taken to bee the meeter man, both to command, and also to defend the Inhabitants against the warlike nations. Hereupon it is, that wee have seene in the silver coines of E Carausius two Emperours joyning hands, with this circumscription, CONCORDIA AVO. C. But Maximian turned his forces upon the Frankners, who then held * Batavia, and had secretly under hand sent aide unto Carausius: whom he surprized on such a sudden, that he forced them to submission. In this meane while, Carausius governed Britan with incorrupt and unstained reputation, and in exceeding great peace: against the Barbarians, as writeth Ninnius the disciple of Elvodugus, hee reedified the wall betweene the mouthes of Cluda and Carunus, and fortified the same with 7. castles, and built a round house of polished stone upon the banks of the river Carun, which tooke name of him, erecting therewith a triumphall arch in remembrance of victory. Howbeit Buchanan thinketh verily it was the Temple of Terminus, as we will write in Scotland.

* Of the Augusti, that is Emperours.
* Now Holland.

When Dioclesian and Maximian, as well to keepe that which was won, as to recover what was lost, had taken to them Constantius Chlorus, and Maximianus Galerius to bee Cæsars: Constantius having levied and enrolled an armie, came with great speed, and sooner then all men thought to Bologne in France, which also is called Gessoriacum, a towne that Carausius had fortified with strong garrison; and they laid

A laid siege unto it round about: by pitching logs fast into the earth at the very entry, and piling huge stones one upon another in manner of a rampire, he excluded the sea, and tooke from the towne the benefit of their haven: which damme, the strong and violent current of the Ocean beating against it forcibly for many daies together, could not breake, and beare downe: no sooner was the place yielded, but the first tide that rose made such a breach into the said rampire that it was wholly dis-joynd, and broken insunder. And whiles he rigged and prepared both heere and elsewhere an Armada for the recoverie of Britaine, he rid Batavia which was held by the Franks, from all enemies, and translated many of them into the Roman nations, for to till their waste and desert territories.

The Panegyrick of Eumenius.

B In this meane time Allectus a familiar friend of Carausius, who under him had the government of the State, slew him by a treacherous wile, and put upon himselfe the Imperiall purple robe. Which when Constantius heard, he having manned & armed divers fleets, drave Allectus to such doubtfull termes, as being altogether void of counsell, and to seek what to doe, he found then, and never before, that he was not fenced with the Ocean, but enclosed within it. And withall, hoyzing up saile in a tempestuous weather, and troubled sea, by meanes of a mist which over-spread the sea, hee passed by the enemies fleet unawares to them, which was placed at the Isle of Wight, in espiall and ambush to discoved, and intercept him: and no sooner were his forces

C. Allectus, Emperour.

C landed upon the coast of Britaine, but he set all his owne ships on fire, that his Souldiers might repose no trust in saving themselves by flight. Allectus himselfe, when he espied the Navy of Constantius under saile, & approaching toward him, forsooke the sea-side, which he kept, and as he fled, lighted upon Asclepiodotus Grand Seneschal of the Prætorium: but in so fearful a fit, & like a mad man, he hastned his own death, that he neither put his footmen in battell ray, nor marshalled those troopes which he drew along with him in good order, but casting off his purple garment, that he might not be knowne, rushed in with the mercenary Barbarians, and so in a tumultuary skirmish was slaine, and hardly by the discovery of one man found among the dead carcases of the Barbarians, which lay thick spread every where over all the plaines and hills.

D But the Frankners, and others of the barbarous souldiers, which remained alive after the battell, thought to sacke London, and to take their flight and be gone: at which very instant, as good hap was, the souldiers of Constantius, which by reason of a misty and foggy aire, were fevered from the rest, came to London, and made a slaughter of them in all places throughout the citie, and procured not only safetie to the citizens in the execution of their enemies, but also a pleasure in the sight thereof.

E By this victory was the Province recovered, after it had bene, by usurpation, held seven yeares or there about, under Carausius, and three under Allectus. Whereupon Eumenius unto Constantius, writeth thus; O brave victorie of much importance, and great consequence; yea, and worthy of manifold triumphs, whereby Britaine is restored, whereby the nation of the Frankners is utterly destroyed, and whereby upon many people beside, found accessarie to that wicked conspiracie, there is imposed a necessitie of obedience, and allegiance, and in one word, whereby, for assurance of perpetuall quietnesse, the seas are scoured and cleansed. And as for thee, O invincible Caesar, make thy boast and spare not, that thou hast found out a new world, and by restoring unto the Roman puissance, their glorie for prowess at sea, hast augmented the Empire with an element greater than all Lands. And a little after, unto the same Constantius: Britaine is recovered so, as that those nations also which adjoyne unto the bounds of the same Island, become obedient to your will and pleasure.

F In the last yeares of Dioclesian and Maximian, when as the East Church had bene for many years already polluted with the blood of martyrs, the violence of that furious persecution went on, and passed even hither also into the West, and many Christians suffered martyrdom. Among whom, the principall were * Albanus of * Uerlam; Julius and Aaron of Isca, a citie called otherwise * Caer Leon, &c. of whom I will write in their proper place. For then the Church obtained victorie with most honourable, and happy triumph, when as with ten yeares massacres it could not be vanquished.

the Great,

Panegyrick oration unto Constantine
the Great.

When Dioclesian and Maximian gave over their Empire, they elected that Constantius Chlorus for Emperour, who untill that time had ruled the State, under the title of Cæsar: and to him befell Italie, Africke, Spaine, France, and Britaine: but Italy and Africke became the Provinces of Galerius; and Constantius stood contented with the rest. This Constantius, what time as hee served in Britaine under Aurelian, tooke to wife Helena daughter of Coelus, or Coelius a British Prince, on whom he begat that noble Constantine the Great, in Britaine. For so, together with that great Historiographer Baronius, the common opinion of all other writers with one consent, beareth witness: unless it be one or two Greeke authors of late time, and those dissenting one from the other, and a right learned man, grounding upon a corrupt place of Iul. Firmicus. Howbeit, compelled he was by Maximian to put her away, for to marry Theodora his daughter. This is that Helena, which in antike Inscription is called * VENERABILIS and PISSIMA AVGVSTA, and for Christian piety, for cleansing Ierusalem of Idols, for building a goodly Church in the place where our Lord suffered, and for finding the Saving Crosse of Christ, is so highly commended of Ecclesiastical writers. And yet both Iewes and Gentiles termed her by way of ignominy and reproach * Stabularia; because shee (a most godly Princeesse) sought out the crib or manger wherein Christ was borne, and in the place where stood that hostelry, founded a Church. Hereupon S. Ambrose: They say that this Lady was at first an Inholder or Hostesse, &c. Well, this good hostesse Helena, hastned to Ierusalem and sought out the place of our Lords passion, and made so diligent search for the Lords crib: This good hostesse was not ignorant of that host, which cured the wayfaring mans hurts that was wounded by thieves: This good hostesse chose to be reputed a dung-farmer, that she might thereby gaine Christ. And verily no lesse praise and commendation goeth of her husband Constantius for his piety and moderation; A man, who having utterly rejected the superstition of the ungodly, in worshipping divers gods, willingly of himselfe acknowledged one God, the Ruler of all things. Whereupon, to try the faith and beleefe in God of his owne Courtiers, hee put it to their free choice, either to sacrifice unto those gods, and so to stay with him, or els to refuse and depart: But those that would depart rather than renounce and forsake their faith to God, hee kept with him still: casting off all the rest, who he supposed would prove disloyall unto him, seeing they had abandoned their beleefe in the true God. This most noble and worthy Emperour, in his last British expedition against the * Caledonians and the Picts died at Yorke, leaving behind him his sonne Constantine Emperour, his successor and Cæsar elect.

Some few daies before the death of Constantius, his sonne Constantius rode from Rome to Yorke on post horses: and the rest which were kept at the charges of the State, hee maimed and lamed all the way as hee went, because no man should pursue him, and there he received his fathers last breath. Whereupon an ancient Orator spake thus unto him: Thou entredst this sacred place not as a competitor of the Empire, but as heere apparant and ordained already, and forthwith that fathers house of thine saw thee, the lawfull successor. For, there was no doubt but that the inheritance duly belonged unto him, whom the destinies had ordained the first begotten sonne unto the Emperour. Yet for all that, constrained in manner by the souldiers, and especially by the meanes of Ercus King of the Almanes, (who by way of aid accompanied him) advanced hee was to the Imperiall dignity. The souldiers regarding rather the publike good of the common-wealth, than following his affections, invested him in the purple roabe, weeping and setting spurs to his horse, because hee would avoid the endeavor of the armie that called so instantly upon him, &c: but the felicity of the common-wealth overcame his modesty. And hereof it is, that the Panegyrist crieth out in these words; O fortunate Britaine and more happy now than all other lands, that hast the first sight of Constantine Cæsar!

And now Cæsar at his very entrance, having first pursued the reliques of that war, which his father had begun against the Caledonians and other Picts, and set upon those Britans more remote, and the Inhabitants of the Ilands lying there, the witness as one said of the Suns setting, some of them hee subdued by force and armes,

A others (for you must thinke he aspired to Rome and higher matters) by offering fees and stipends he allured and drew to be associates: and there were besides of them, whom of open enemies he made his friends, and of old adversaries his very familiars. Afterwards, having vanquished the Frankners in Batavia, and that with so great glory, that he stamped certaine golden pieces of coine, (whereof I have scene one) with the Image of a woman sitting under a Trophee, and leaning with one hand upon a crosse-bow or a brake, with this subscription, FRANCIA: and this writing about it, GAV-DEVM ROMANORVM: Having also overthrowne the Barbarians in Germany, won unto him the German and French Nations: and levied souldiers out of Britaine, France, and Germany, to the number in all of 90000. foot, and 8000. horsemen, hee departed into Italie, overcame Maxentius, who at Rome had challenged to himselfe the Empire, and having conquered Italy, and vanquished the Tyrant, he restored unto the whole world the blessed gifts of secure libertie, and as we find in the Inscription of an Antiquitie, INSTINCTV DIVINITATIS, MENTIS MAGNITVDINE, CVM EXERCITV SVO, TAM DE TYRANNO QVAM DE OMNI EIVS FACTIONE, VNO TEMPORIS IVSTIS REMP. VLTVS EST ARMIS, that is, By instinct of the divine power, with great magnanimitie, and the helpe of his owne armie, at one time in the behalfe of the Common-wealth, he was by lawfull warre revenged as well of the Tyrant himselfe, as of his whole faction.

C Howbeit, that he returned againe into Italy, Eusebius implieth in these words: Constantine, quoth he, passed over to the Britans enclosed on every side within the banks of the Ocean: whom when hee had overcome, hee began to compasse in his mind other parts of the world: to the end he might come in time to succour those that wanted helpe. And in another place: After he had furnished his armie with mild and modest instructions of pietie, he invaded Britaine, that he might likewise instruct those who dwell environed round about with the waves of the Ocean bounding the Suns setting, as it were with his coffs. And of Britan are these verses of Optatianus Porphyrius unto Constantine, to be understood:

*Omnia ab Arctoia plaga sinibus borrida Cauro,
Paci amat cana et comperta perennia iura,
Ex tibi fida tuis semper bene militat armis;
Resq; gerit victorie tuas, populasq; feroces
Propellit, ceditq; libens tibi debita rata,
Et tua victores fors accipit hinc tibi sortes,
Teq; duce invicta sustollunt signa cohortes.*

Prest alwaies in their loyaltie for service in thy right,
With valiant and courageous heart, dorch all thy battels fight.
Thus Nations fierce it drives to rout, and dorch in chafe pursue,
Yielding to thee right willingly all paiments just and due:
Victors from hence most valourous, thy lot it is to have,
And under thee unfoiled bands, advance their ensignes brave.

About this time as evidently appeareth by the Code of Theodosius, Pacatianus was the Vicarius of Britaine: for by this time the Province had no more Proprietors nor Lieutenants, but in stead thereof was a Vicar substituted.

This Emperour Constantine, was right happy for very many praises, & those I assure you most justly deserved: for hee not onely set the Roman Empire in free estate, but also having scattered the thicke cloud of Superstition, let in the true light of Christ, by letting open the Temples to the true God, and shutting them against the false.

F For now no sooner was the blustering tempest and storme of persecution blowne over, but the faithful Christians, who in the time of trouble and danger had hidden themselves in woods, deserts, and secret caves, being come abroad in open sight, repaired the Churches ruinate to the very ground, the Temple of holy Martyrs they found, build, finish, and erect, as it were, the banners of victorie in every place, celebrate festivall holy daies, and with pure heart and mouth also, performe their sacred solemnities. And thereupon he is renow-

For vertue most valiant, and for pietie most mercifull. Also, Who fortified the Roman Empire with the reverend Faith of the Christians. Sacred. Of sacred Memorie; Of Divine memorie, &c.* And hee was the first Emperour, as farre as I could ever to this time observe, who in coines of money and publike workes, was honoured with this Inscription, DOMINVS NOSTER, that is, Our Lord. Although I know full well, that Dioclesian was the first after Caligula, who suffered himselfe openly to be called LORD.

Howbeit, in this so worthy an Emperour, his politike wisedome was wanting in this point, that he made the way for barbarous people, into Britaine, Germanie, and Gaule. For when he had subdued the northerne Nations, so, as that now he stood in no feare of them, and for to equall the power of the Persians, who in the East parts threatened the Roman Empire, had built Constantinople a new Citie: those Legions that lay in defence of the Marches, he partly translated into the East, and in their stead built forts and holds, and partly withdrew into Cities more remote from the said marches: so that soone after his death, the Barbarians forcing the townes and fortresses, brake into the Provinces. And in this respect there goeth a very bad report of him in Zosimus, as being the main, and first subverter of a most flourishing Empire.

Seeing moreover, that Constantine altered the forme of the Roman government, it shall not be impertinent in this very place to note summarily, in what sort Britaine was ruled under him, and afterward in the next succeeding ages. He ordained foure Praefects of the Pratorium, to wit, of the East, of Illyricum, of Italie, and of Gaule: two * Leaders or Commanders of the Forces, the one of footmen, the other of horsemen in the West, whom they termed Prasentales.

For civill government there ruled Britaine, the Praefect of the Pratorium, or Grand Seneschall in Gaule, and under him the Vicar Generall of Britaine, who was his Vicegerent, and honoured with the title Spestabilis, that is, notable or remarkable. Him obeyed respectively to the number of the Provinces, two Consular Deputies, and three Presidents, who had the hearing of civill, and criminall causes.

For militarie affaires, there ruled the Leader, or Commander of the footmen in the West: at whose disposition, were the * Count or Lieutenant of Britaine; the Count or Lieutenant of the Saxon-coast along Britaine, and the Duke of Britaine, styled every one, Spestabilis, that is, Remarkable.

The Count Lieutenant of Britaine, seemeth to have ruled the in-land parts of the Island: who had with him seven companies of footmen, and nine cornets or troupes of horsemen.

The Count or Lieutenant of the Saxon coast, namely, who defended the maritime parts, against the Saxons, and is named by Ammianus, Comes maritimi tractus, that is, Lieutenant of the Maritime tract, for defence of the Sea coast, had seven companies of footmen, two guidons of horsemen, the second Legion, and one cohort.

The Generall of Britan, who defended the Marches or Frontiers against the Barbarians, had the command of eight and thirty garrison forts, wherein kept their Stations 14000. foot, and 900. horsemen. So that in those daies, (if Pancirolus have kept just computation) Britaine maintained 19200. footmen, and 1700 horsemen, or much there about, in ordinarie.

* Augustus Augustum. Vicar of Britaine.

* Comes.

* Spestabilis. Comes of Britaine.

A Besides all these, Comes sacrarum Largitionum, that is, The Receiver of the Emperours Finances or publike revenues, had under him in Britaine, the Rationall or Auditor of the summes and revenues of Britaine: the * Provost of the Augustian, that is, Emperours Treasures in Britaine, and the Procurator of the Gynegium or Draperie in Britaine, in which the clothes of the Prince, and souldiers were woven. The * Count also of private Revenues had his Rationall, or Auditor of private State in Britaine: to say nothing of the sword, Fence Schoole, Procurator in Britaine, (whereof an old Inscription maketh mention,) and of other officers of an inferior degree.

When Constantine was dead, Britaine fell unto his Sonne Constantine: who upon an ambitious humour, and desire of rule, breaking into the possessions of other men, was slaine by his brother Constans. With which victory hee was so puffed up, that he seized Britaine, and the rest of the Provinces into his owne hands, and with his brother Constantius came into this Island. And thereupon Julius Firmicus, not that Pagane the Astrologer, but the Christian, speaketh in this wise unto them: See have in Winter time (a thing that never was done before, nor shall be againe) subdued under your oares the swelling and raging billowes of the British Ocean. The waves now of the sea, unto this time well neere unknowne unto us, have trembled, and the Britaines were sore afraid to see the unexpected face of the Emperour. What would ye more? the very Elements as vanquished, have given place unto your vertues.

C This Constans it was that called a Councell to Sardica, against the Arians: unto which there assembled three hundred Bishops, and among them the Bishops of Britaine, who having condemned the Heretikes, and established the Nicene Creed, by their voices and judgements, approved the innocencie of Athanasius. But this Prince being youthfull, cast behind him all care of the Empire, and became drowned in pleasures: and thereby growing grievous to the Provincials, and nothing acceptable to his souldiers, was by Magnentius, * capitaine of the Iovij and Herculij, as he hunted, beset in a towne called Saint Helens, and there killed; fulfilling thereby a prophesie, which was, That he should end his life in his grandmothers lap, of whom that towne indeed tooke the name.

This Magnentius having a Britan to his Father, but borne among the Lati, a people in France, when he had now slaine Constans, invested himselfe in France into the Imperiall dignitie, and wonne Britaine unto him to take his part: but having been for three yeares together coursed by his brother Constantius, who sharply made war upon him, laid violent hands on himselfe: a fortunate Prince as ever any was, for seasonable temperature of the weather, for plentie of fruits, and securitie from dangers of Barbarians, points which are by the vulgar people reputed to make especially for the glorie of Princes. But why this Magnentius should be called Taporus in an old antiquitie of stone, digged up long since at Rome, let other men enquire: For thus it is read, speaking of the obeliske, erected in the birque or shew-place.

E Meane while that Tyrant Taporus of Rome did havocke make, * Augustus gift unplaced lay, none would it undertake.

At this time, the Generall of all the warre-forces throughout Britaine, was Gratianus surnamed Funarius, the father of Valentinian the Emperour. And called hee was Funarius, for that being yet but a stripling, or young springall, as he went about with a rope to sell, he gaue not ground to five souldiers that did set upon him, and assailed with all their force to snatch the same from him. This Gratianus being returned to his owne home, and discharged of his military oath, was fined by Constantius in the confiscation, and losse of his goods, because he was reported to have lodged Magnentius, and given him entertainment.

When Magnentius was dead and gone, Britaine submitted it selfe to the government of Constantius: and forthwith was hisher sent Paulus the Notarie a Spaniard Constantius borne, one verily under a smooth countenance lying secret and close, but exceeding subtil Paulus Catena, to devise and find out all the casts and wylie meanes to endanger men: That hee might bring certaine martiall and military men within danger who had conspired with Magnentius, when as they could not chuse nor make resistance, after he had outrageously come over them in manner of a flood hee suddenly seised upon the fortunes and estates of many. Thus went he on still making spoile, yea, and undoing a great number, imprisoning such as were free borne, and grieving their bodies with bonds, yea, & bruising some of them with manacles, and all by patching and piecing many crimes together laid to their charge, which were as false as might be. Whereupon was committed so wicked an act as branded the daies of Constantius with a perpetuall note of infamie. There was one Martin that ruled those provinces as Vicar or Vicegerent; who grievously lamenting the miseries and calamities of the innocent, and beseeching the said Paulus oftentimes, that the guiltlesse might be spared, when hee saw that hee could not prevaile, threatened to depart, to the end, that this malicious inquisitor, and persecutor, as leastwise for feare thereof, might give over at length, to envaile and induce into open dangers, men bred and nuzzled in quiet peace.

Paulus, supposing heereby, that his trade decayed, (as hee was a vengible fellow in linking matters together, whereupon he came to be surnamed Catena, that is, a Chaine) drew in the said Vicar himselfe, (who still maintained the defence of those whom he had sendred and spared,) to have his part in common perils: And hee went very neere to bring him also prisoner bound, with tribunes, and many others, before the Emperours privie Counsell. At which extremitie of mischief so imminent, he being throughly provoked, caught up a dagger, and assaulteth the same Paulus: but because his right hand failed him, so that he was not able to give him a deadly wound, hee stabbed himselfe into the side with the said weapon drawne as it was. And so by this foule kind of death departed hee this life; (a right just man) after he had assaid to stay, and delay the woefull and pitious cases of many. Which wicked parts thus committed, Paulus, all embred with blood, returned into the Princes Court: bringing many with him over-laden with chaines, as being men dejected, and plunged into miserable calamitie, and heavie plight. At whose comming the racks were made ready: the executioner prepared drags and tortures: and of them many were proscribed, and enslaved, some banished, and other suffred punishment by sword. At length himselfe also under Julian being burnt quicke, by the judgement of God the Revenger of such outrageous crueltie, paid most justly for his deserts.

After this when as in Britaine, Ammianus Marcellinus is mine Author,) upon the breach of peace, by the rodes of Scots and Piets, (savage nations) the places neere bordering upon them, appointed for the Frontiers, were forraied, and the provinces wearied with calamities past, that came so thicke one in the necke of another, and put in frightfull perplexitie, Julian whom Constantius had declared to be Cæsar, and colleague in the Empire, wintering about Paris, and distracted with sundry cares, feared to goe and aid the provincially people beyond-sea, as we reported that Constantius beforetime had done, lest he should leave Gaule without a governour: considering withall, that the Alamans were even then also incited, and set upon crueltie and hostilitie; thought good therefore it was to send over into these parts, for to compose and settle all matters, one Lupicinus, * Master at that time of the Armour: a warlike Knight, I assure you, and skilfull in military affaires; but a man of a haughtie spirit, and setting up his cie-browes aloft like hornes, and withall speaking bigge, and (as folke say) in a tragick Key upon the stage: concerning whom, the question was a long time, whether he were more covetous than cruell. Having raised therefore an aid of light appointed men, to wit, the Heruleans, Batavians, and many companies of the * Mærians, the foresaid Generall in the heart of Winter, came to Bologne: and there having gotten shipping, and embarqued all his fouldiers, observing a good gale of a forewind, arrived at Rhotupie, a place over against Bologne, and so set forward to London: that, from thence after counsell taken, according to the qualitie of his businesse, he might hasten the sooner to give battell.

Under this Constantius, who mightily favoured the Arians, their heresie crept into Britaine, wherein from the first yeares of the great Constantine, a sweete concord and harmonie of Christ the head, and his members had continued, untill such time, as that deadly and perfidious Ariamisme, like to a pestiferous Serpent from the other side of the sea,

The heresie of Arius,
Gildas.

A casting up her vendome upon us, caused brethren dwelling together, to be dis-jointed pitiously one from another: and thus, the way as it were, being made over the Ocean, all asher crocod and fell beasts wheresoever, shaking out of their horrible moushs the mortiferous poison of every heresie, inflicted the deadly stings and wounds of their sects upon this our civillitry, desirous evermore to heare some noveltie, but holding nought at all steadfastly. In favour of these Arians, Constantius summoned foure hundred Bishops of the West Church, to Ariminum: for whom the Emperour, by his commandement, allowed come and vicuals. But that was thought of the Aquitanes, French, and Britaines, an unseemly thing: refusing therefore that allowance out of the Emperours coffers, they chose rather to live at their owne proper charges. Three onely out of Britaine for want of their owne, had maintenance from the State, refusing the contribution offered unto them from the rest: reputing it more safe, and void of corruption, to charge the common treasure, than the private stase of any person.

After this, when Constantius was departed this world, Julianus that Apostata, who had taken upon him the title of Augustus against Constantius, first drave out Palladius, who had been master of Offices, into Britaine, and sent away Alphius, who had governed Britan as Deputy Lieutenant, to reedifie Jerusalem: but fearefull round balles of flaming fire breaking forth neere unto the foundations, skarred him from that enterprize, and many a thousand of Jewes who wrestled in vaine against the decree of God, were overwhelmed with the ruines. This dissolute * Augustus, and in his beards onely a Philosopher, feared (as hath crewhile been said) to come and aid the poore distressed Britans: and yet from hence he carried out every yeaere great store of corne to maintaine the Roman garrisons in Germany.

When Valentinian the Emperour steered the helme of the Roman Empire, what time as through the whole world the trumpets resounded nothing but the warlike Al, Arme, the Piets, Saxons, Scots and Attacots vexed the Britans with continual troubles and annoyances. Fraomarius then King of the Alinanes was translated hither, and by commission made Tribune or Marshall over a band of the Alinanes, for number and power in those daies highly renowned, to repress the incursions of those barbarous nations. Nevertheless Britaine was through the generall conspiracie of those barbarians afflicted and brought to extreme distresse, Nectaridius Comes or Lieutenant of the maritime tract slaine, and Bucholbaudes the Generall by an ambush of the enemies circumvented. The intelligence of which occurrences when it was brought unto Rome with great horror, the Emperour sent Severus, being even then Lord High Steward of his household, to redresse what was done amisse, in case his hap had beene to have seene the wished end: wha being within a while after called away, Iovinius went to the same parts, * sent hacket Provinsides in post, minding to crave the puissant helpe of an armie. For, they avouched that the urgent necessary occasions required so much. At the last, so many and so fearefull calamities were by daily rumors reported as touching the same Iland, that Theodosius was elected, and appointed to make speed thither, a man of approved skill in warlike affaires most fortunate he achieved, who having levied and gotten unto him a courageous company of young gallants, to furnish as well Legions as cohorts, put himselfe in his journey, with a brave show of confidence leading the way. At the same time the Piets divided into two nations the Discalvanes and Fecturiones, the Attacots likewise a warlike people, and the Scots, ranging in divers parts did much mischief where they went. As for the cohorts of Gaule, the Frankers and Saxons confining upon them, brake out and made rodes where ever they could either by land or sea, and what with driving booties, with firing towns, and killing poore captives, made foule worke there. To stay these woefull miseries, if prosperous fortune would have given leave, this most vigorous and valiant Capitaine intending a voyage to the most bounds of the earth: when he was come to the sea side at Bologne, which hath divided from the opposite tract of land, by a narrow * streit ebbing and flowing, where the water is wont to swell on high with terrible tides, and againe to fall downe flat and his like owne plains without any harme of sailer or passenger, from thence having sailed and safely crossed the said sea, he arrived at Rhotupie a quiet rode and harbour over against it: From whence after that the Batavians, Heruli, Iovij and Victores, (companies confident of their strength and and power who followed) were come, hee departed: and marching toward London, an old towne, which the posteritie called Augusta, having divided his troopes into sundry parts hee set upon those companies of roving and robbing enemies, even when they were heavily laden with bootie and pillage. And having quickly discomfited those that drave before them their prisoners bound, and cattell, he forced them to forgoe the prey, which the most miserable tributaries had lost. In the end, after full restitution made of all, save onely some small parcels bestowed upon his wearied souldiers, he entred most joyfully into the citie, over set before with distresses and calamities, but now suddenly refreshed; so far forth as hope of recovery, and safetie might effect: and there being raised up with this luckie hand, to adventure greater exploits, and yet casting with him selfe projects promising securitie, he staied doubtfull of the future event; as having learned by the information of revolting fugitives and confession of captives, that so great a multitude of sundry nations, and a stiffe-necked people of so fell and fierce a disposition, could not possibly be vanquished but by secret wiles, and sudden excursions. Finally, after proclamations published, and promises made of impunity, he summoned as well the traiterous runagates as many others that went with free passport dispersed sundry waies, to present themselves ready for service. Upon which summons given, so soone as most of them were returned, he as one pricked forward with so good a motive, and yet held backe by heavie cares, called for Civilis by name, (who was to rule Britaine as Deputie,) to bee sent unto him; a man of a very quicke hasty nature, but a precise keeper of Iustice and righteousnesse: likewise for Dulcitius, a redoubted Captaine, and right skilfull in feates of armes. Afterwards, having gotten heart, and courage to him, he went from Augusta, which in old time they called Londinium, well appointed with industrious, and considerate souldiers, and so brought exceeding great succour to the ruinate, and troubled estate of the Britaines, gaining before hand all places every where for his advantage to forelay the Barbarians in ambush, and giving commandment of no service to the very common souldiers, but hee would him selfe cheerefully take the first assay thereof. In this sort performing as well the offices of an active and hardie souldier, as the carefull charge of a right noble Generall, having discomfited and put to flight divers nations, whom insolent pride fed with securitie incited, and set on fire to assaile and invade the Roman Empire, he having laid the foundation of quiet peace for a long time, restored both Cities and Castles, which verily had received manifold damages, to as good a passe as ever they were at. Now there had hapned while hee achieved these exploits, an horrible act like to have bred some great danger, but that in the very first enterprize it was quenched and suppressed. There was one Valentinus of Valeria Pannonia, a man of a proud spirit, brother to the wife of that pestilent Maximinus, first Deputie Lieutenant, & after President, for some notable offence banished into Britaine; who being impatient of rest like a noisome beast rose up in comotion against Theodosius, practising mischievous plots and an insurrection, upon a certaine swelling pride and envie, for that hee perceived him alone able to withstand his horrible designs. Howbeit, casting all about for many meanes both secret and apert, whiles the puffing humour of his infinite, and unsatiable desire still encreased, he solicited as well the banished persons as souldiers, when he espied his opportunity, promising reward, for to allure and draw them on to some actuall attempt. And now as the time drew neere when these enterprizes should bee put in execution, and take effect, the Generall being advertised of all these projects, and forwarder of the twaine to adventure, resolved also upon an high mind to take revenge of such as were attaint and convicted, committed verily Valentinus with some few of his inward complices unto Captaine Dulcitius, for to bee put to death: but forecasting withall, the future events, (as hee was a man in militarie skill surpassing all others of his time) he would not suffer any farther inquisition and examination to be had of the conspirators, for feare lest by striking a terror among so many, the tempestuous troubles of the provinces which were well appeased, might revive againe. Turning him selfe therefore from this businesse to the reforming of many enormities, which of necessitie were to be regarded, and having cleared all dangers (for evidently scene it was that fortune was so propitious and good unto him, as that he never forooke but sped his enterprizes) he recedified the Cities, and those garrison forts whereof we speake; he fortified also the frontiers with standing watches and strong fore-fences. Thus having recovered the province which had yielded subjection to the enemies, hee so brought it to the former ancient state, that upon his owne motion to have it so, it both had a lawfull governour to rule it, and afterward also was called V A L E N T I A, for the Princes will and pleasure. The Areens a kind of men instituted by those of ancient times (concerning whom I have related in the Acts of Constans the Emperor) fallen by little and little unto vices, he removed from their stations, as being openly convicted that they were allured by great receipts, or promise at least waies of much reward, to have divers times discovered unto the Barbarians what soever was done or debated among us. For, this indeed was their charge, to run to and fro by long journeyes, to intimate and make knowne unto our Capitaines all sturs that the people neere adjoining were about to make. Thus, after he had with very great approofe exploited these acts above rehearsed, and others the like; he was sent for to the Princes court, and leaving the Provinces in much jollitie, no lesse honoured was he for his many and important victories, than either Furius Camillus or Papirius Cursor. And so being honorably accompanied and attended upon with the love and favour of all men as far as to the narrow seas, with a gentle gale of wind he passed over and came to the Princes camp, where with joy and praise hee was received. For these deeds of his so bravely atchieved, in honor of him, there was an image set up, resembling a man of armes on horsebacke, as Symmachus giveth us to understand, speaking to his son Theodosius the Emperor in this wise. The author, quoth he, of your kindred and stock, Captaine Generall sometime in Afrik and Britaine both, was among other ancient titles consecrated by the most honorable order with Images of Knighthood: And Claudian in his commendation with full pen wrote poetically thus;

*Ille Caledoniis posuit qui castra pruinis,

And concerning him Pacatus Drepanus What should I speak, quoth he, of the Scot, driven back againe by him unto his fennes and bogs? The Saxon consumed with battels at sea,

After him, Gratian took upon him the Empire, who also proclaimed Theodosius, the son of that Theodosius (of whom we have spoken already) Emperor: Whereat Maximus a Spaniard borne, his concurrent, and withall descended in right line from Constantinus the Great, who also had before time been General over the armie in Britan, was so highly discontented, that he took upon him the purple robe: or as Orosius reporteth, was against his will by the souldiers saluted Emperor; a valiant man, vertuous, & worthy of the title of * Augustus, but that against his allegiance, he had by way of his tyrannie & usurpation attained to the place. Who at the first courageously vanquished the Picts & Scots, that used to make many inrodes into the Province: afterwards with all the flower and strength well neere of British forces, arrived in the mouth of Rhene, and procured unto himselfe the whole puissance of the German armies: ordained the Royall seat of the Empire to be at * Triers (whereupon stiled he was by the name of Trevericus Imperator) & spreading, as Gildas saith, his wings the one as far as to Spaine, the other into Italy, with the terror only of his name, levied tributes and pensions for souldiers pay, of the most fell and savage nations in Germanie. Against whom Gratianus having led an armie, after five daies skirmishing, being forsaken of his owne souldiers, and put to flight, sent Saint Ambrose Embassadour to treat for peace: which he obtained indeed; but the same full of treacherous guile. For, Maximus suborned, and sent under-hand one Andragathius, riding in a close litter or carcho, with a rumour spread abroad, that therein rode the wife of Gratian. Unto which when Gratian was come for love of his wife, and had opened the said litter, forth leapes Andragathius, with his companie, and slew him outright in the place. Whole body for to demand, was Ambrose sent a second time: howbeit, not admitted, because he refused to communicate with those Bishops, that sided with Maximus. Who being lifted up, and proud of those things hapning to his mind, appointed his sonne Victor to be Caesar, dealt cruelly with Gratians Captaines, and settled the State in France. Theodosius Augustus, who governed in the East, at the requests or mandates rather of his Embassadours, acknowledged him Emperour, and exhibited his Image unto the Alexandrines for to be seene in publike place. And now having by violence, and extortion entred upon the estates of all men, with the utter undoing of the common-wealth, hee fulfilled his owne greedie avarice. Hee made the defence of Catholike Religion his pretences to colour his tyrannie; Priscillian, and certaine of his Sectaries convict of hereticall, and false doctrine in the Synode, or Councell of Burdeaux, and appealing unto him, hee condemned to death; although Martin that most holy Bishop of * Tourain or Tours, most humbly besought to forbear shedding the blood of those poore wretches: avouching that it was sufficient to deprive such as were judged heretikes, and put them out of their Churches, by the definitive sentence of Bishops: and that it was a strange and unexampled hainous deed, that a secular Judge should determine causes of the Church. And these were the first, that being executed by the civill sword, left a foule and dangerous precedent to posteritie. After this he entred Italie with so great terrour, that Valentinian, together with his mother, were glad to flee unto Theodosius, the cities of Italie received him, and did him all the honour that might be: but the Bononians above the rest, among whom this Inscription is yet to be seene, DD. NN. MAG. C. MAXIMO, ET FL.

VICTORI, PIIS, FELICIBVS, SEMPER
AVGVSTIS. * B. R. NATIS.

To our Great Lords, C. Maximus & Fl. Victor, Pious, Happy, Always Augusti, borne for the good of the Common-wealth.

Meane while Nannius and Quinctus, Masters in militarie skill, unto whom Maximus had committed the infancie of his sonne, and the custodie of Gaule, gave the Frankers, who annoyed Gaule with their incursions, a mightie great overthrow, and forced them to give hostages, and deliver into their hands the Authors of the warre. As for Valentinian, he earnestly besought Theodosius, to succour him dispoiled of his Empire

A Empire by a Tyrant, from whom for a good while, he could have none other answer, but this, That no marvel it is, if a seditious servant became superiour to that Lord, who casteth off the true Lord indeed. For Valentinian was corrupted with Arianisme. Howbeit, wearied at length with his importunate prayers, he sent forward in warlike manner against Maximus, who in the same time abode in Aquileia, very secure & careless. For he had before-hand fortified the streits between the mountains with garriisons, and the havens with shipping, so that with great alacritie, and much confidence at the first hee welcomed Theodosius with one battel before Syfca in Pannonia: & afterwards most valiantly received him with another, under the leading of his brother Marcellus; but in both of them he sped so badly, that he withdrew himselfe secretly into Aquileia, where by his owne souldiers, as he dealt money among them, taken he was, and de vested of his Imperiall ornaments, brought before Theodosius, who immediately delivered him into the hangmans hand to be executed, after that he had now worn the purple robe five yeares. Whereupon Ausonius writeth thus in praise of Aquileia:

*Non erat iste locus: meritò tamen unda recenti,
Non ainter clavas Aquileia cieberis urbes Itala ad Illyricos objecta colonia montes, Mœnibus & portu celeberrima: sed magis illud
Eminet, extremo quiddam sub tempore legit,
Solverat exacto cui iusta piacula lustro
Maximus, armigeri quondam sub nomine lixe:
Felix qui tanti spectatrix leta Triumpho, Punxit Ausonio Rutupinum Marte Latronem.*

This was no place of name: but since that fresh desert gave grace,
Thou Aquileia of cities faire, shalt be the ninth in place,
A Colonie Italian, gainst hills Illyrian set,
For strong wals, and commodious haven right well renown'd: but yet
This passeth all the rest, that he his choice of thee, did make Against his latter daies, who did revengement justly take
Of Maximus: a base campe-Squire that sometimes knowne to be,
Had now usurped five yeares past; and ruled with tyrannie.
Right happy thou, of Triumph such that hadst the joyfull fight, Killing this Robber * Rhurupine by maine Italian might.

Andragathius, whose state was now most desperate; cast himselfe from shipboard headlong into the Sea. Victor the sonne of Maximus, was in France defeated, taken prisoner, and slaine. But those Britans, who tooke part with Maximus, as some writers doe record, forcibly invaded Armorica in France, and there planted themselves. Now Theodosius presently after his victorie, entred Rome with his Sonne Honorius in triumph, and published an Edict to this effect: No man so hardy, as to challenge or claime that honour, which the bold Tyrant had granted: but that such presumption should be condemned, and reduced to the former estate. And Valentinian, in these words, All judgements and awards whatsoever, that Maximus the most wicked and detestable Tyrant that ever was, hath given forth to be promulged and enacted, we reverse and condemne. But Saint Ambrose in his funerall Sermon of Theodosius, crieth out in these termes: That Eugenius and Maximus, by their wofull example, doe testifie in hell, what a heaveie thing it is to beare armes against their naturall Princes. To speake in a word, this victory was held to be so worthy and memorable, that the Romans from thence forward, solemnized that day every yeare, as festivall.

There succeeded Theodosius in the West Empire his sonne Honorius, a child ten yeares old; over whom was ordained as Tutor and Protector Flavius Stilicho, a man passing famous for a long time, as who being an inward companion of Theodosius in all his warres and victories, and by degrees of militarie service, advanced unto high authoritie, and the Princes affinitie, in the end cloied and glutted with prosperitie, and carried away through ambition, miserably lost his life. This man surely for certaine yeares, had a provident regard of the Empires good estate, and defended Britaine taine against the invasion of Picts, Scots, and Vandals: And hereof it is, that Britaine speaketh thus of her selfe in Claudian:

*Me quod, vicinis pereuntem gentibus, inquit, Munivit Stilicho, totam quum Scotus Hibernem
Movit, & infesto sumavit remige Thetis.
Illius effectum curis, ne bella timorem
Scotica, nec Pictum tremorem, ne litore toto Prospicerem dubiis venientem Saxona ventis.*

And me likewise at hand, quoth she, to perish, in despite
Of neighbour Nations Stilicho protected 'gainst their might,
What time the Scots all Ireland mov'd, offensive armes to take,
And with the stroke of enemies ores, the Sea much some did make.
He brought to passe, (his care was such) that I the Scottish warre
Should feare no more, nor dread the Picts, ne yet ken from a farre, (Along the shore whiles I looke still when wavering winds will turne)
The Saxons comming under saile, my coasts to spoile and burne.

And thus for that time Britaine seemed safe enough from any danger of enemies.
For in another place, that Poet writeth thus:

Domito quod Saxona, Thetis Mitior, aut fracto Secura Britannia Picto.

What either seas more quiet now, that Saxons conquer'd are,
Or Britaine become secure, since Picts subdued were.

And when Alaricus King of the Gothes, hovered about Rome, seeking meanes to assault and spoile it: that Legion which in the marches kept Station against the Barbarians was called from hence, as Claudian signifieth, when he reckoneth up the aids sent for from all parts.

*Venit & extremis legio prætenta Britannis, Qua Scoto dat fræna truci, ferroq; notata.
Perlegit * exanimis Picto moriente figuræ.*

* Or, exanguet.

The Legion also came which did for British frontiers lie
In garrison, that cubs fell Scots, and doth pursue with eie
Those yron-brent markes in Picts now scene, all bloudlesse as they die.

In these daies flourished Fastidius a Bishop of Britaine, and wrote bookes of divine learning, I assure you. Chrysanthus likewise the sonne of Bishop Martian, who having beene a Consular deputy in Italy under Theodosius, and made * Uicar of Britan, deserved that praise and admiration for his good manning of the common-weale that he was against his will entalled at Constantinople Bishop of the Novatians, who having made a schisme in that Church, and calling themselves * Cathari, had Bishops apart of their owne and sectaries, who stoutly but impiouly denied, that such as after baptisme received, fell by relapse into sinne, could not returne againe and bee saved. This is that Bishop, who as wee read in histories, of all Ecclesiasticall revenues and profits, was wont to reserve nothing for himselfe but two loaves of bread onely on the Lords day.

When as now the Roman Empire began to decline and decay, and barbarous Nations every way made foule havocke of the provinces all over the Continent; the British armes fearing least the flame of their neighbours fire might flash out and catch hold likewise of them; supposing also that they stood in need of some Generall & Sovereign commander, to expell the Barbarians, addrest themselves to the election of Emperours. First therefore, they enthronized in the royall seat Marcus, and him they obeyed, as one that in these parts bare the chief sovereignty. But afterward having made him away, because his carriage was not answerable unto theirs, they bring forth and set up Gratian, countryman of their owne: him they crowned and arraid in the regall purple, and him they dutifully attended upon, as their Prince. Howbeit upon a mislike that they tooke to him also, at foure moneths end, they deprive him of his Empire, take away his life, and made over the Sovereignty of State to one Constantine, a

A souldier of the meanest place, onely because his name imported, as they thought, the offe of good luck. For they conceived assured hope, that he by the fortunate name of Constantine, would likewise constantly and fortunately governe the Empire and dispatch all enemies, like as that Constantine he Great had done, who in Britaine was advanced to the Imperiall dignitie. This Constantine putting to sea from Brian, landed at Bologne in France, and easily induced withal the Roman forces as far as to the Alpes to joyne with him in his war. * Valentia in France he manfully defended against the puissance of Honorius Augustus the Roman Emperor: the Rhene which long before had been neglected, he fortified with a garison: Upon the Alpes, as well * Cortize

Whereupon he became prouder than before, and after he had passed over the Alpes intended to march directly to Rome: but hearing that Alaricus the King of the Goths (who had sided with him) was dead, hee retired himselfe to Arles, where he planted his Imperiall seat, commanded the Citie to be called Constantina, and ordained therein, that the assemblies for Assizes of 7 provinces should be held. His sonne Constans hee sendeth for out of Spaine, to the end that meeting together they might consult as touching the State. C of all matters within Spaine to Gerontius, came speedily without intermission of journey to his father. When they had met together, after many daies, Constantinus seeing no feare of any danger from Italy, gave himselfe wholly to gluttony and bellicheere, and so advieth his sonne to returne into Spaine. But when he had sent his forces to march before, whiles he abode still with his father, newes came out of Spaine, that Maximus one of his vassals and followers was by Gerontius set up and advanced to the Empire; and having about him a strong power and retinue of barbarous nations prepared to come against them. Whereat they being affrighted, Constans and Decimus Rusticus, who of the Master of Offices was now become the Prefect, having dispatched Edoebuccus before unto the German Nations, together with the Frankners, Almans & all the militarie forces, went into France, intending out of hand to returne unto Constantinus. But as for Constans, Gerontius intercepted him by the way at Vienna in France, and killed him: Constantine himselfe he besieged within Arles: to raise this siege and to assaile him in hostile manner, when one Constantinus sent from Honorius made hast with an armie, Gerontius fearefully fled: whereupon his souldiers for anger and indignation beset his house round about, and drave him to those hard streits, that first he cut off Alanus his most trusty friends head, then he laid violent hands upon Nuanichia the said Alanus wife, who earnestly desired to die with her husband; and last of all perished himselfe. Constantinus being very straitly shut up, and withall utterly dejected and cast down with the unfortunate sight of Edoebuccus, after he had beene beleaguere four moneths, and reigned likewise foure years, laid away his purple habite, entred into a Church, and tooke the orders of priesthood, and soone after, having surrendered Arles, was led captive into Italie, and there beheaded, together with a sonne of his, whom he had named * Nobilissimus, and a brother called Sebastian. From that time returned Britaine, under the Empire of Honorius, and was refreshed a while, through the wisdome and prowess of Victorinus, who then ruled the Province, and repressed the outroides of Picts and Scots. In commendation of whom, in Rutilius Claudius, are these verses extant, answerable in worth to the Author.

When Rome was forced by Alaricus, Honorius calleth Victorinus home with his army: and forthwith the Britans took armes, and engaging themselves into danger for the safety of themselves, freed their own cities and States from the barbarous people, that waited all opportunities to annoy them. Semblably, that whole maritime tract of * Armorica, and the rest of the Gaulois Provinces, accompanied the Britans, and in like manner delivered themselves, casting out the Roman Prefidents, and setting up a certain proper common-wealth at their owne pleasure. This revolt and rebellion of Britaine, together with the French Provinces hapned in the time that Constantine usurped the Kingdome, considering that the Barbarians, taking advantage of his negligence in government, boldly, and without restraint overcame those Provinces. Howbeit within a while after, the States of Britan importuned Honorius for succor: whom he without sending any aid at all, advised by his Letters to stand upon their owne guard, & look to themselves. The Britans upon the receipt of Honorius Letters, were stirred up, and put themselves in armes to defend their owne cities: but being not able to match the Barbarians that came upon them so on every side, they besought Honorius what they could, and obtained at his hands, that a Legion should be sent to their rescue and succour. Which being come over hither, defeated and overthrowed a great number of the enemies, chased the rest out of the marches of the Province, and took order for a wall or rampier of turfe to be made, from the Firth of Edenburgh, unto Cluid, which stood them in small or no stead. For by occasion that the said Legion was called backe to the defence of France, the barbarous enemies returned, breake downe with ease the frontier bounds, and in all kind of outrage and crueltie in every place carry, harrie, and make havocke of all. Then were dispatched a second time in lamentable sort Embassadors, with their garments rent, and heads covered with sand (marke the manner of it) for to crave aid of the Romans: unto whom, by the commandement of Valentinian the Third, were appointed certaine regiments of souldiers, conducted by Gallio of Ravenna, which most valiantly vanquished the Barbarians, and in some sort gave comfort to the poore distressed and afflicted Province. They made a wall directly by a straight line, and that of stone (not as the other) at the publike charges of the State, and with private mens purses together, joyning with them the miserable Inhabitants, after the wonted manner of building, to wit, traversing along the land * from one Sea to another, betweene those cities which haply were placed there for feare of enemies; to the fearefull people they gave good instructions, and exhortations to play the men, and left unto them paternes, shewing them how to make armour and weapons. Upon the coast also of the Ocean, in the tract of the South country, what way they had ships (because even from that side also they stood in feare of those barbarous and savage beasts) they planted turrets, and bulwarkes with convenient spaces distant one from another, yielding farre and faire prospect into the sea: and so the Romans gave them a small farewell, never to returne againe.

Now was the State every where in a most wofull and pious plight to see unto: to see the Empire drooping with extreme age, lay along maimed, dismembred, and as it were, benumbed in all the limmes and parts thereof: the Church likewise most grievously assailed by Heretikes (who amid the burning broiles of warre, cast

Now also was the Roman Empire in Britaine, come to her full and snall period, to wit, the foure hundredth, seventh, and sixth year after Cæsars first entrie: what time, in the raigne of Valentinian the Third, the Romans having transported their forces with the foresaid Gallion, for the defence of France, and buried their treasure within the ground, left Britaine hereof her youth, waisted with so many musters and

B levies, dispoiled of all succour and defence of garrison, unto the cruell rage of Picts and Scots. Hence it is, that Prosper Aquitanus wrote thus, and that right truly: *At this time, by reason of the Romans weakenesse, the strength of Britaine was utterly spent, and brought to nought. And our Historiographer of Malmesburie: When the Tyrants had left none in the country, but halfe Barbarians; none in the cities and townes, but such as wholly gave themselves to belly-cheere: Britaine destitute of all protection by her vigorous young men, bereaved of all exercise, and practise of good arts, became exposed, for a long time, to the greedy, and gaping jaws of Nations confining upon her. For, straightwaies, by the incursions of Scots and Picts, many a man was slaine, villages burnt, cities undermined and subverted, and throughout all laid wast with fire and sword. The Islanders in great trouble and perplexitie, thinking all other meanes safer, than triall by battell; partly be-tooke them to their heeles, and for their safetie fled unto the mountaine-Country: partly, after they had buried their treasure within the ground, whereof much is digged up in these daies, purposed to goe to Rome for to crave aide. But as Nicephorus truly wrote, Valentinian the Third, was not onely unable to recover Britaine, Spaine, and France, provinces plucked away from his Empire already, but also lost Africke beside. Not without just cause therefore Gildas in this age cried out thus: Britaine was dispoiled of all her armed men, her militarie forces, her Rulers (cruell though they were,) and of a mightie number of her stout and courageous youths. For, besides those whom that Usurper Maximus, and the last Constantine led away with them, it appeareth evidently by antike Inscriptions, D and the booke named Notitia Provinciarum, that these companies underwritten served the Romans in war, here and there dispersed over their Provinces, which also were from time to time evermore supplied out of Britaine.*

Hereupon, no marvaile it is, if Britaine exhausted daily with so many, and so great levies of souldiers, lay exposed unto the Barbarians, and heereby proveth that sentence of Tacitus true; There is no strength in the Roman armies, but it is of forraigne strangers.

In writing of these matters, concerning the Romans government in Britaine, which continued (as I said) cccclxxvi. yeares, or much there about, whiles I consider and think otherwhiles with my selfe, how many Colonies of Romans were in so long a time brought hither, how many souldiers continually transported over hither from Rome to lie in garrison, how many sent hither to negotiate either their own busines, or the affaires of the Empire, who joyning in marriage with Britans, both planted themselves, and also begat children here (For, Wheresoever the Roman winneth, saith Seneca,

neca,

neca, there be wometh, and inhabiteth :) I enter oft times into this cogitation, That Britans may more truly ingraffe themselves into the Trojans stocke, by these Romans, who are defended from Trojans, than either the * Arverni, who drawing their descent, from * Ilian blood, have named themselves, the Romans brethren; or the Mamertines, * Hedui, and the rest, who grounding upon a fabulous originall, have fathered themselves upon the Trojans. For Rome, that common Mother (as he saith) called those her Citizens,

Quos domuit, nexuq; pio longinqua revinxit :

Whom she subdued, and by a gracious knot,
United people farre diffite and remote.

And meet it we should believe, that the Britans and Romans in so many ages, by a blessed and joyfull mutuall ingrafting, as it were, have growne into one stocke and nation: seeing, that the * Ubij in Germanie within 28. yeares after that a Colonie was planted, where now Colein is, made answer as touching the Roman Inhabitants there, in this wise: This is the naturall Countrey, as well to those that being conveyed hither in times past, are conjoynd with us by marriages, as to their off-spring. Neither can we thinke you so unreasonable, as to wish us for to kill our parents, brethren, and children. If the Ubij and Romans in so small a time became parents, brethren, and children one to another, what should we judge of Britans and Romans linked and conjoynd so many yeares together? What also may we say of the Burgundians, who for that they mingled their blood with the Romans, whiles they held for a small time the Romans Provinces, called themselves a Roman off-spring: not to rehearse againe what I have said before, That this Island hath beene named Romania, and Insula Romana, that is, The Roman Isle.

Thus much have I fet downe summarily, and in compendious manner gathered out of the ancient monuments of Antiquitie, rejecting all fabulous fictions, as touching the Romans Regiment in Britaine, their Lieutenants, Propretours, Prefidents, * Vicars, and * Rectors. But more exactly and fully, [might I have done it] if Aufonius had performed his promise, and that come unto our hands : who said, he would reckon up such, as

Præfecturarum titulo tenuere secundo.*

That ruled Nations Italike, and North-bred Britans all, Entituled with happy stile, Lieutenants Generall.

But seeing it is agreed upon among all learned men, that there ariseth very much light to the illustration of ancient Histories, out of ancient Coines, I have thought good in this place to exhibit unto the Reader certaine pieces of money, as well of those Britaines, who first came under subjection of the Romans, as of Roman Emperours; such especially as appurtaine to Britaine, and those out of the Cabinet of the right Worshipfull Sir Robert Cotton of Conington Knight, who hath from all places with curious and chargeable search, gotten them together, and of his courtesie with heart and good will, imparted the same unto me.

CONIECTVRES AS TOV. ching the British Coins.

The Britans Coines, the portraicts whereof I have here shewed, you looke haply, that I should adjoyne some briefe notes also. But what to adjoyne of such things as the revolution of so many ages past, hath altogether overcast with darkenesse, to professe plainly, I see not: and your selfe, when you shall read these slender guessees of mine, will avouch with me, that I walke in a mirke and mistie night of ignorance.

That the old Britans used brasse money, or rings, or else plates of yron tried to a certaine just weight, I have declared already before, out of Cæsar: and there be, who averre, that they have seen some of these found in little pitchers. Besides these, found there are other-whiles in this Island, pieces of gold, silver, and brasse of sundry fashions, and as different in poize: all for the most part of the one side hollow: some without letters, others with expresse Inscriptions of letters; of which sort, I could never here that any have been digged up elsewhere, untill such time as Nicolaus Fabricius Pierscius, a right noble young Gentleman of Provance in France, one for such antiquities, & old Medals or pieces of money, passing skilfull, and of judicious insight, very lately had shewed me the like found in France. But to come unto these of ours, which I have here proposed.

The first, is a coine of Cunobelinus, who flourished in the daies of Augustus and Tiberius: wherein, if I deceive not my selfe, are engraven the heads of two-faced Ianus: peradventure, because even at that time Britaine began to cast off, and leave their barbarous rudenesse. For we reade, how Ianus was the first, that changed barbarous manners into civill behaviour, and therefore was depainted with two fore-heads, to signifie, that he had of one shape made another.

The second also is Cunobelinus Coine, shewing his face, and Inscription [of the one side] and the Coiner or Mint-master on the other, with this word TASCIA set to it, which word among the Britans, betokeneth a Tribute Penye, as Master David Powell, a man most skilfull in the British language hath informed me: and is derived perhaps of the Latine, Taxatio. For, the Britans acknowledge not X. for their letter. And by the same reason the Inscription of MONETA, is seene oft times in pieces of Roman money.

In like manner, the third is a Coine of the same Cunobelinus, with an horse and CVNO. with a corne ear also, and CAMV, (as it should seeme) for Camalodunum, which was the Royall citie and seat of Cunobelinus.

The fourth with VER, may be thought a coine of the Verlamians.
The

The fifth againe, is one of Cunobelinus his pieces.

The sixth, because it giveth no light by letters, I wot not what to make of it.

The seventh, a Coine of Cunobelinus, having this Inscription, TASC. NOVANEL, with a womans head; whether it should imply a tribute piece of the Trinovants, over whom he was ruler, I cannot avow on the other side, Apollo with his Harpe, and Cunobelin putteth me in remembrance of that, which elsewhere I have observed as concerning the God Belinus: namely, that the * Gauls in old time worshipped Apollo under the name of Belinus: which Dioscorides also doth confirme, writing in plain & expresse termes, that the herbe * Apollinariu, with the juce whereof the Gauls were wont to annoint their arrowes, is in the Gauls tongue, called Belinuntia. So that, upon this I may be bold in some sort to conjecture, that the name of Cunobelinus, as also of Casibelinus, is drawn from the worship of Apollo, like as the names of Phœbitius and Delphidius. If not rather, like as Apollo for his bush of yellow haire, is named in Greeke, ἡλίου, in Latin, Flavus, that is, yellow: so likewise among the Britans, and Gauls, Belin. For that which is yellow, in * British speech they call, Melin, Belin, and Felin: and for the same cause, that ancient Belinus, Cunobelinus, and Casibelinus, who also goeth under the name of Casivelaunus, may seeme to be so named, as one would say, Yellow Princes. For that Cuno is a name of dignitie, the * Britans confesse, and a thing which is especiall and principall, they terme at this day, Cynoc. Certes, it hath been a name of honour, Cungetorix, Cunobelinus, Cuneglasus, * Cunedas, and Cunedagius, Princes names among the Britans; like as Cyngetorix, Conviêtolitanus, and Conetodunnus, among the ancient Gauls, doe after a sort make good and declare. Neither am I ignorant that Gildas hath translated Cuneglasus, in Latine, Lani-nemfulvum vel furvum, that is, A Lion tawney, or darke hued Butcher: whom others have interpreted, Principem Caruleum, five vitrei coloris, that is, A Prince blew, or of a blewish, or woad-colour: like as Cunedas, Principem bonum, that is, A good Prince. That the German Koning, and our King, came from Cuno, I dare not yet suppose. Let it suffice, by these my sundry guessees, to have thus dallied, lest I lay open my selfe to the scorn of others.

The eighth, with a chariot horse, and a wheele or shield underneath, having in the reverse BODVO; may seeme to be a Coine of the Nation called * Boduni: or else of the Queene Bodicia, who is diversly named Voadicia, and Bunduica.

The ninth, wherein is represented an horseman, with speare and shield, and these letters in scattering wise, CAERATIC. I would deeme to be a Coine of that warlike Prince Caratacus, whose praises Tacitus highly extolleth.

The tenth, upon the one side whereof, under an horseman, is the Inscription REX, and on the other COM, both I and some others are pleased with this conceit, that it was a coin of *Connius * Attre-batenis* whom Cæsar mentioneth.

The eleventh, which doth represent a little halfe moon with this Inscription, REX CALLE, is not much unlike the name of that most famous and frequented Citie, Callena.

The twelfth hath a winged head with this word ATEVLA; and in the reverse a Lion, and this Inscription, VLATOS. What the meaning might be of these words, I seeke and seek, but in vaine. Indeed by this very same portrature and image, I have seene upon pieces of Roman mony the Goddesse Victorie expressed. But, that Victorie should bee in the British tongue called Ateula, I never yet could find. Mary, that they named Victorie, Andasa, I have out of Dio reported already: and whether the same were Andrata, worshipped of the * Vocontij in Gaule, let some other say, for I dare not.

Here also may you behold the thirteenth, with this word DIAS, in an eight-angled figure, & an horse on the contrary side: the fourteenth with a swine, and these letters VANO C, the head also of a goddesse, haply Venus; or else Venutius whom Tacitus speaketh of. The fifteenth, with an head and helmet upon it; and this Inscription, DVRNA CO: and whether that were Dumnacus a Prince of the Andes whom Cæsar doth mention, I wot not. The sixteenth with an horse, & this word ORCEGI. The seventeenth with the image of Augustus and TASCIA, & on the reverse a bull boaking with his hornes: The eighteenth, with CVNO within a laurell garland; and upon the back part an horse, with the Inscription TASC E.

We have seen besides one other coine with the flying horse Pegasus, and CAMV: on the backe part whereof, the forme of a man with an helmet and shield, within standing corne, and CVNO: another, with an horse ill favouredly portraied, and EISV, peradventure for ISVRII, and on the back side, an eare of corne: also another with a souldier carying a speare, and on the other side, within a wreath or chein, SOLIDV. That it should be the piece of mony called Solidus, I doe not believe, because the said piece was in that age alwaies of gold; whereas this was of silver. More probable it is, that it should have a reference to Solidurij. For so the ancient French named men devoted to die in behalfe of others: Whose condition was this, that look unto whose friendship they had betaken themselves, they should together with them enjoy all the comforts and commodities of this life. If any violent accident hapned unto them, they were either to sustaine the same chance together with them, or else to kill themselves: neither hath ever any one of them bin found, who after the party was slain, unto whose friendship he had devoted himselfe, himselfe, would refuse to die. Now whether from these, those soldiers tooke their name, who being sworne pensioners to any one Prince or State, take a certaine pension, and with most nations of Europe carry almost the very same name, to wit Soldiers, Soldates, Soldados, &c. I had rather others should thinke than my selfe determine: although for mine owne part, I would more willingly subscribe to this opinion, that in these later and more moderne times, they were termed Solidarij, for distinction sake, for those, who served in the wars in regard of their tenours, without pay of money.

Whether all these kinds of coine went commonly currant as money, from one to another and in ordinary trafficke and exchange, or were stamped at the first apart, for some speciall use and purpose, is a question debated among the learned. But in few words, take here my conjecture, if I may be so bold to interpose the same. Considering that Cæsar had appointed what Custome or Imposst the Britans should pay yearly, and whereas under Augustus they endured those payments for portages, or toll, as well in carrying forth as bringing in commodities: by little and little other tributes also were imposed upon them: to wit, for * Corne-grounds, Plant-plots, Groves or Parks, Pasturage of greater and smaller beasts: as being subdued now to obey as subjects, and not to serve as slaves: I have been of opinion, that those pieces of money were stamped at first for that use, namely, for greater beasts, with an horse; for smaller with a swine; for woods with a tree; for * corne-fields with an eare of corne: as in that piece of the Verlamians, which carrieth the Inscription V E R V.

Census.

As for those with the head of a man or woman, they may seeme stamped for the Tribute * Capitatio, which was personall and imposed upon the poll or person of every one: of women from the twelfth, of men, from the fourteenth yeare of their age. Which imposition Bunduica or Bodicia a Queene of the Britans complained of unto her people in these words; Tee doe both graze and also plough for the Romans, yea, ye pay an yearly tribute in respect of your very bodden. For this purpose I have thought there was in old time one certaine kind of money stamped, seeing that in the scripture it is plainly called Numisma Census, and Hesichius expoundeth Numisma Census, is a kind of personall money paid for every poll. And the more readily believe I this, for that in some there is expressed the Mint-master marking money with T A S C I A, which among the Britans betokeneth a Tribute-Denier. Howbeit I denie not, but that afterwards these passed promiscuously as money from one to another. Neither am I yet of the same mind with those, that would have the Swine, the Horse, the Corne eare, Ianus, &c. to have beene the peculiar badges of nations, families, or Princes: considering, we may see in these, that one and the same Prince and nation used sundry badges.

A badges, as Cunobelinus, who stamped in his money a swine, an horse, a corne eare, and other things.

Now, whether these tribute pieces were coined by the Romans, or the Provinciaall people, or their Kings, seeing that the whole world was taxed by Augustus, I may not easily affirme. Conjecture I may that they were stamped by the British Kings, considering that Britaine from the time of Iulius Cæsar unto Claudius daies, used their owne lawes, and was committed to the government of their owne Kings, as Dio writeth: and withall, seeing that they represent the images and titles of British Princes. For, the Romans by a received custome had Kings in their Provinces as instruments to bring the people into servitude: who being now become, as it were, the Romans fellowes and associates, by little & little were framed, (a thing usuall with persons conquered) to their fashions, & so, as it seemeth, began after the Roman manner both to stamp money at a certaine poize, and also to imprint a name upon the pieces. But contrariwise in Iurie, as may be collected by the answer of Christ, marked they were with Cæsars face and superscription, and that in all likelihood by the Romans themselves. Which Cardinall Baronius a painefull Ecclesiasticall Historian, sheweth in these words: The manner, saith he, among the Romans was, that money should be coined by the Emperours, in regard of Tribute or Taxe, and not to remaine alwaies the same, and after one sort, but according to the rise and fall of the said tributes, differ from other pieces of usuall money in this point, for that the value of these ordinarie pieces is alwaies one and the same, but those of Tax or tribute, ever as the qualitie of Tribute changed, were made proportionable to the said tribute. But divers learned men accord not in this point with Baronius.

NOTES VPON THE ROMAN COINES.

E THE first Roman Emperour after [Iulius] Cæsar, that earnestly set his mind upon the conquest of Britaine, was Claudius: and he having put over sea hither with an armie, brought the South-part thereof into the forme of a Province: At which very time, this first piece of money may seeme to bee stamped, which carrieth this abbreviated Inscription, TI CLAVD CAES AVG P M TR P VIII IMP XVI. that is to say, Tiberius Claudius Caesar, Augustus Pontifex Maximus, that is, High Priest, Triumvir in potestate IX. that is, In Tribunes authoritie the ninth time, Imperator XVI. that is, sixteene times Imperator. But to explaine these titles once for all, ye shall understand, That after Iulius Cæsar, who

F berius Claudius Caesar, Augustus Pontifex Maximus, that is, High Priest, Triumvir in potestate IX. that is, In Tribunes authoritie the ninth time, Imperator XVI. that is, sixteene times Imperator. But to explaine these titles once for all, ye shall understand, That after Iulius Cæsar, who who laid the foundation of the Roman Monarchie, and Octavius who was honoured with the name of Augustus, all their successors in honour of them would be called Cæsares, and Augusti, as though they far surpassed the nature of men. For such things as be of sacred Majestie, are named Augustæ: also, termed they were Pontifices Maximi, or High Priests, for that they were consecrated in all kinds of Priesthood, and overseers of all Sacrifices and religious ceremonies. They usurped likewise the Tribunitian power and authoritie (for Tribunes in no wise would they be termed) to the end, that they might have protection thereby and be inviolable. For, being once invested in this authoritie, if any man either gave cursed language or offered violence unto them, hee might without proceffe of condemnation be killed as a sacrilegious person: and this Tribunitian power they renewed every yeare, and thereby were reckoned the yeares of their Empire. Last of all they were stiled, Imperatores, because their command and rule was most large, & under that name the power of Kings and Dictators was contained. Now, they were entituled, Imperatores, so oft as they had achieved any worthy exploit in battell, either in their owne persons, or by their Captaines. But whereas in the reverse of this piece of money, there is to be seene a triumphall Arch, with the portrait of an horseman betweene two trophees, and this title, D E B R I T A N. I would judge, that thereby is meant a twofold victorie obtained, in the ninth yeare of Claudius his Empire, according to the number, that sheweth his Tribunitian authoritie renewed.

II. In the second piece, which also is a coine of Claudius * Augustus, out of this Inscription, T I C L A V D. C A E S. A V G. G E R. T R. P. XII. I M P. XIII. we are taught, that in the twelfth yeare of his raigne, he, for a victorie won in Britan was with joyfull acclamations saluted, Imperator, the eighteenth time: and at the same instant that the Colonie Camalodūnum was thither brought, which is signified expressly by an * husbandman imprinted upon it, with a Cow and a Bull: The Romans (saith Servius) when they were about to found and build cities, being girt and clad after the Gabines fashion, that is to say, with one part of their gowne covering the head, and the other tucked up, yoked on the right hand, a Bull, and within forth a Cow, and held the crooked plough taile bending inward, so as all the clouds of the earth might fall inward. And thus having made a furrow, they did set out the places for wals holding up the plough from the ground, where the gates should be.

III. The Son of Claudius, whose piece of coine the third is with Greek Characters, was by vertue of an act of Senate adorned with the surname of B R I T A N N I C V S, in regard of his fathers fortunate wars, that he might use the same as his owne proper addition. He it was, for whom Seneca praied in this wise, That he might appease Germanie,

A manie, make way into Britaine, and solemnize both his Fathers triumphs, and also new [of his owne.] But what should bee the meaning of an halfe ship in this coine, with this Inscription, Metropoli Eriminij Regi? Certes, I cannot for certaine affirme who that Eriminius was, unlesse a man list to imagine him to have beene the very same Adiminus, King Cunobelinus son, of whom Suetonius reporteth, That he ran away unto C. Caligula.

B That which you see in the fourth place, is a piece of Hadrians money, with this writing upon it, H A D R I A N V S A V G. C O N S V L I I I. P A T E R P A T R I A E. And in the other side, E X E R C I T V S B R I T A N N I C V S, that is, The Armie in Britaine represented by three souldiers. I would deeme, that it betokened the three Legions, to wit, Secunda Augusta, Sexta victrix, and Vicesima Victrix, which served in Britaine, Anno Christi 120. For then was he Consul the third time.

The fifth and sixth, which are the coines of Antoninus Pius, carrying this Inscription, Antoninus Pius, Pater Patriæ, Tribunitia potestate, Consul tertium: and in their reverse, the one having Britaine sitting upon rocks with a militarie Ensigne, a speare and a shield; the other, the selfe same Britaine, sitting upon a globe; seeme to have beene stamped by the Province Britaine, in honour of Antoninus Pius, when he began his Empire in the yeare of Christ 140. As for that militarie habit of the Province Britan, it signifieth, That Britan in those daies flourished in glory of martiall prowesse: like as that piece of money, which at the same time Italie stamped for the honor of him, hath such another figure sitting upon a globe, with Cornucopia, betokening plentie of all things: that also which Sicilie coined, hath the like figure with an ear of corne, in token of fruitfulness: semblably that which Mauritania stamped, hath a portraict or personage, holding two speares with an horse, to shew the glory of that Province in good horsemanship and chivalrie. Hitherto also is to be referred the ninth, which is a piece of the same Antoninus, but not set in his due place.

The seventh piece of money, stamped by Commodus, sheweth no more, but that he for a victorie against the Britans, assumed into his stile the name of B R I T A N N I C V S: for in the other side thereof is to be seene, Victory, with a branch of the Date-tree, holding a shield, and sitting upon the shield of the Britans vanquished, with this inscription, V I C T O R I A B R I T A N N I C A.

The eighth, which is a coine of Caracalla, and set here not in the right place, more expressly sheweth by the numerall figures, that hee vanquished his enemies in Britaine, in the yeare of our Salvation, 214: as also by the Trophee, which Virgil better than any engraver, portraied in these verses,

*Ingentem quercum decisis undiq; ramis
Constituit tumulo, fulgentiaque induit arma
Mexenti ducis exuvias, tibi magne trophaeum
Bellipotens: aptat roranteis sanguine cristas, Telaeque trunca viri.*

A mightie Oke, the boughs whereof were shred from every side, Vpon an hill he pight, whereon he goodly armour tide
Duke Mezence spoiles, a trophée brave, ô mightie Mars, to thee,
And fits therto his crests which yet with gore blood dropping be,
The truncheons of that Knight also —

XII. The same is to be thought of the twelfth, which also is one of the same Caracallaes.

X. XI. But in those of Severus and Geta, there is none obscuritie at all.

XIII. Who this Aebianus was, I am not yet fully resolved. Some reckon

* Or Vsurper. him to be A. Pomponius Aelianus, one of the 30. * Tyrants. Others will him to be Cl. Aelianus, one of the sixe Tyrants under Dioclesian.

* Or Vsurper. There are also that thinke he was the very same * Tyrant in Britain, under the Emperour Probus, of whom Zosimus made mention, but suppressed his name, and of whom I have written before. Surely, in what time soever he lived, we suppose that in Britaine hee was named Augustus, considering his pieces of money bee found in this Island onely, carrying this Inscription, IMPERATOR CL. AELIANVS PIVS FOELIX AVGVSTVS. In the reverse, there is to be read, VICTORIA AVGVSTI, which betokeneth, that he subdued some Barbarians.

XIII. The coine of Carausius, with this Inscription, Imperator Caius Carausius Pius Felix Augustus, and in the backside thereof, PAX AVGVSTI, seemeth to have beene stamped at the very time when hee had quieted the British Sea, which by reason of rovers was so dangerous.

XV. When Allectus, who made away Carausius, had put on the Imperiall purple, and fought manfully against the Barbarians, he stamped this piece with VIRTVS AVGVSTI. As for the Letters Q. L. some would have them to signifie a * Quartarius, stamped at London; others, The Questor, that is, Treasurer of London.

XVI. When as Constantius Chlorus, being departed this life at Yorke, was now solemnly consecrated, and after the Pagan manner deified, in honour and memoriall of him was this piece of money stamped, which appeareth evidently by the Inscription, and a Temple betweene two Eagles. these letters underneath P. LON. doe plainly imply Pecuniam Londini, that is, that the said money was stamped at London.

XVII. His wife Flavia Helena, a British Ladie borne, as our histories report, and as that most excellent Historiographer Baronius doth confirme,

A confirme, what time as her Sonne Constantius Maximus had discomfited the Tyrant Maxentius, and received these Titles, Fundator quietis, that is, The founder of quietnesse: and Liberator Orbis, that is, The Deliverer of the world, having procured securitie to the State and common-weale, had this piece stamped in honour of him at Triers, as appeareth by the Letters S. T. R. that is, Signata Triens, that is, to say, coined at Triers.

B Flavius Constantinus Maximus Augustus, the great ornament of XVIII. Britaine, stamped this coine at Constantinople, as we are taught by these characters underneath, CONS. with this, G. L. O. R. I. A. EXERCITVS, that is, The glory of the Armie, to currie favour with the souldiers, in whose choice in those daies, and not at the dispose of the Emperour, was the soveraigne rule and government.

Constantinus the younger, Son of that Constantinus Maximus, XIX. unto whom with other countries the Province Britaine befall, stamped this piece while his Father lived. For he is called only Nobilis Caesar, a title that was wont to be given to the Heires apparant, or elect Successours of the Empire. By the edifice thereon, and these words, PROVIDENTIAE CAESS. we understand, that he together with his brother, built some publike worke, like as by these letters P. L. O. N. that this piece of money was coined at London.

This coine carrying the Inscription, Dominus noster Magnentius Pius Felix Augustus, may seeme to have beene stamped by Magnentius, who had a Britan to his father: as also to win the favour of Constantius, after hee had put to flight some publike enemy. For, these Characters D. D. N. N. AVGG. that is, Our L. O. R. D. S. AVGVSTI, doe argue there were then two Augusti, or Emperours. And as for that Inscription, VOTIS V. MVLTI. X. it betokeneth, that the people at that time did nuncupate their vovves in these termes, That the Emperour might flourish 5. yeares, and by doubling the said number of 5. with lucky acclamations prayed for many 10. yeares. And hereto accordeth that speech in the Panegyricke oration of Nazarius, as followeth: *The * Quinquenniall feasts and solemnities of the most blessed and happy Caesars hold us wholly possessed with joyes; but in the appointed revolutions of ten yeares, our basting bowes and swift hopes have now rested.* The letters P. A. R. doe shew that this denier was stamped at * Arelate.

Constantius having defeated Magnentius, and recovered Britaine, XXI. in honour of his armie, caused this to be stamped. The letter R. in the basis thereof importeth haply, that it came out of the mint which was at Rome.

In honour of Valentinian, when hee had set upright againe the state of Britaine which was falling to ruine, and called that part of it by him thus recovered after his own name Valentia, this piece was coined at Antiochia, as may be gathered out of the small letters underneath.

XXIII. Vnto the Denier of Gratianus, I can think of nothing to say more, save only that which erewhile I noted upon that of Magnentius.

XXIII. What time as Magnus Maximus was by the British armie created Augustus, and his son likewise Flavius Victor named Cesar, to grace

XXV. and glorifie the souldiers were these pieces coined: and Theodosius having subdued and made them away, for the very same cause, B

XXVI. stamped that with this, VIRTVTE EXERCITVS.

XXVII. Vpon that golden piece of Honorius, I have nothing to observe, but that by this Inscription, AVGGG. there were at the same time three * Augusti: namely after the yeare of Grace 420. when as Honorius ruled as Emperour in the west, Theodosius the younger in the East, and with them Constantius, by Honorius nominated Augustus, who had vanquished our Constantine, elected in hope of that fortunate name. As for that Inscription CONOB, it signifieth, that it was fine and pure gold, stamped at Constantinople. For that same CONOB, is no where read, so farre as ever I could hitherto observe, but in pieces of Gold, for CONSTANTINOPOLIOBRIZVM.

I could annex hereunto many more pieces of Roman mony, for infinite store of them is every where found among us in the ruines of cities and townes subverted, in treasure coffers, or vaults hidden in that age, as also in funerall-pots and pitchers. And how it came D to passe, that there should remaine still so great plenty of them, I much marvelled, untill I had read in the Constitutions of Princes, that it was forbidden to melt such ancient coines.

Having now already represented these antike pieces, as well of British as Roman mony in their owne formes, I thinke it also profitable for the Reader to insert in this very place a chorographically table or mappe of Britaine, (seeing it hath sometime bene a Province of the Romans) with the ancient names of places: and although the same be not exact and absolute, (for who is able to performe that?) yet thereby a man may learne thus much, if nothing else, that in this round Globe of the earth, there is daily some change: new foundations of townes and cities are laid; new names of people and nations arise, and the former utterly be abolished: and, as that Poet said,

Non indignemur mortalia corpora solvi,

Cernimus exemplis oppida posse mori.

Why fret should we that mortall men to death doe subject lie?

Examples daily shew that townes and cities great may die.

THE DOWN-FALL OR DESTRUCTION OF BRITAIN.

When as Britaine now was abandoned of the Roman garrisons, there ensued an universall and utter confusion, full of woefull miseries and calamities, what with barbarous nations of the one side making incursions and invasions, what with the native Inhabitants raising tumultuous uprores on the other, whiles every man catcheth at the government of State. Thus, as Ninnius writeth, They lived in feare 40. yeares or thereabout. For, Vortigern then King, stood in great dread of the Picts and Scots: Troubled sore also he was with the violence of Romans, that remained heere, and no lesse stood he in feare of Ambrosius Aurelius or Aurcleanus, who during the conflict of these tempestuous troubles, wherein his parents that had borne the Imperial purple robe, were slaine, survived them. Hereupon, the Saxons, whom Vortigern had called forth of Germany to aid him, made bloody and deadly warre against those friends that invited and entertained them: insomuch as after many variable and doubtfull events of warre they wholly disceised the poore wretched Brittaines of the more fruitfull part of the Island, and their ancient native seat and habitation.

But this most lamentable ruine and downfall of Britaine, Gildas the Britaine, who lived within a little while after, all full of teares shall with his piteous pen depaint or deplore rather unto you. As the Romans were returning, quoth he, to their owne home, there, shew themselves avie, out of their carriages, wherein they passed over the * Sciticke wale, and as it were, at high noone. Sunne, and in fervent heat, issuing from out of most narrow holes and caves, whole swarmes of dusky vermin, to wit, a number of hideous high-land Scots and Picts in flocks, for manners and conditions in some respect different; but sorting well enough in one and the same greedy desire of blood-shed: Who having intelligence that the Roman associates and Maintainers of the Britans were returned home, with utter disclaiming and renouncing of all return, more confidently than their usuall manner had beene, seize into their hands all the Northern and utmost part of the land, and hold the same, (as naturall inborne Inhabitants) even as far as to the wall. Against these attempts opposed there was and placed upon an high fort and castle along the wall a garrison, nothing war-like, unfit for fight, with quaking hearts and altogether unmeet for service: which warding there day and night became lazie with doing nothing. Meane while, no stay there was, but those bare naked enemies approached the forts and wall with hooked weapons and engines, where-with the most miserable people were plucked from the walles and dashed against the hard ground. This good yet did this manner of hastling untimely death, unto those that by such E means were speedily rid out of the world, in that by so quick a dispatch they escaped and avoided the woefull imminent calamities of their brethren and deare children. To bee short, having abandoned their Cities and quit that high-wall, once againe they took them to flight, and were dispersed anew, in more desperate manner than before time. Semblably, the enemies follow hard in chase, and hasten to make fouler havocke and more cruell butchery of them. Like therefore as Lambs by bloody butchers, so are these woefull Inhabitants quarried and mangled by their enemies: insomuch as their abode among them might well be compared to the ravening of wild and savage beasts. For not only the poore and wretched people themselves forbore not to rob one another, for their short sustenance of small food, but also those hostile outward miseries and calamities were augmented with inward tumults and troubles: in that by these and such like pillages and spoiles practised so thicke, the whole country was ex- F haust of victuals the staffe and strength of life, save onely the small comfort that came by hunting. Whereupon the distressed remaines of them send their misgiving letters againe unto Actius a power-able man in the Roman state, in this tune;

The

The Barbarians drive us backe to the sea : The sea againe putteth us backe upon Barbarians. Thus betwene twene two kinds of death, either our throats be cut, or we are drowned :

Yet obtaine they no succour at all for those their distresses. Meane while in this wandering and declining condition of theirs, most notorious and horrible famine, preffeth them, which forced many of them without delay, to yield themselves into the hands of those cruell spoilers and robbers, that they might have some food (were never so little) to comfort and refresh their poore hungry soules: but with others they ver wrought so much, but they chose rather to withstand and rise against them continually, from out of the very mountaines, caves and thick woods, full of bushes, briars and brambles. And then verily, at the first they gave sundry overthrowes with much slaughter to their enemies for many yeares together (as they made spoile and drave away booties in the land), reposing their trust not in man, but in God: according to that saying of Philo, The helpe of God is at hand when mans helpe faileth. Thus for a while rested our enemies from their boldnesse, but yet our countrymen gave not over their wickednesse: The enemies, I say, retired from the people, but the people did not retire themselves from their wickednesse. For, an usuall manner it ever was of this nation (like as it is at this day also) to shew themselves feeble in repressing the enemies forces, but strong enough to civill warres, and to undergoe the burdens of sinne, &c. Well then, these shamelesse Irish ravenours returne home, minding shortly after to make repaire hither againe: and the Picts rested without molestation then first, and so from thenceforth, in the utmost part of the Province, yet not without wasting & harrying the country at sundry times. By means therefore of such surcease of hostility, the desolate peoples fore of famin was healed up clean and skinned, but another more virulent than it, secretly bred and brake forth. For, in the time that the Island was free from hostile wasting, there happened it in so fruitfull plenty and abundance of all things, as the like no age before had ever remembered: and therewith groweth ever more all manner of riot and excesse. For, so mightily it increased and came to so great an head, that very fity at the sametime it might be said, Certainely it is hard, that there is such fornication, as the like is not among the Gentiles. And not this sinne onely was rife, but all others also that are incident to mans nature: and especially (which likewise at this very day overturneth the state of all goodnesse in it) the hatred of Truth, and the maintenance thereof, the love also of lies with the forgers thereof, the admitting of evill for good, the respective regard of leawdnesse in stead of goodnesse, desire of darkenesse in lieu of the Sunne light, and accepting of Satan for an Angell of light. Kings were anointed not by God, but by such as were knowen more cruell than the rest: and soone after, the same were murdered by their owne aoinsters, without due examination of the truth, and others more fiercely and cruell elected. Now if any one of these Kings seemed more mild than other, and somewhat better inclined to the Truth, upon him as the subverter of Britaine the hatred and spitefull darts of all men without respect were levelled and shot. No difference made they of any thing that they tooke displeasure at, but things weighed all in equall ballance, saving that the better things indeed wrought ever discontent: in so much as, right justly the saying of the Prophet was denounced unto that people in old time might bee applied unto our country, See lawlesse and corrupt children have forsaken the Lord, and provoked unto wrath the holy one of Israel: Why should ye be smitten any more, still multiplying iniquity? Every head is sicke, and every heart is heavy. From the sole of the foot unto the crowne of the head there is nothing sound therein. Thus did they all things that were contrary to their salvation, as if no phisicke or medicine had been bestowed upon the world by the true phisician of all. And not onely the secular or lay men did this, but also the selected flocke of the Lord and the shepheards thereof, who ought to have given example to the whole people. To speake of drunkennesse, numbers of them drenched, as it were, with wine, lay benumbed and senselesse: possessed they were with swelling pride, and therewith stomackfull, given to contentious brawles, armed with the catching claws of envie, and undiscree in their judgement, as putting no difference betwene good and evill. Inasmuch as, apparantly (even as now a daies) is seemed that contempt was poured forth upon the Princes, and the people were seduced by their vanities and error in by paths and not led the right way. In the meane time, when God was minded to purge his family and to recure it thus infected with so great corruption of sinnes, by heare say onely of tribulation, the winged flight (as one would say) of an headlesse rumour, pierceth the attentive eares of all men, giving notice of ancient enemies ready to arrive, and upon their coming fully minded to destroy them utterly, and after their wonted manner to possesse and inhabite the countrey from one end to another. Yet for all this were they never the better, but like unto foolish and senselesse horses, resisting the bridle of reason, and refusing to admit the bit (as they say) into their close-shut mouth, leaving the way to salvation, narrow though it were, ran up and downe at random all in the broad way of all wickednesse which leadeth directly and readily to death. Whiles therefore, as Salomon saith, the obstinate and stubborne servant is not amended with words, scourged hee is for a foole, and feelth not the whip. For loe, a pestilent contagion bringing much mortalitie falleth heavily upon the foolish people, which in a short space, when the enemies sword was gone destroyed so great a multitude of them, as that the living were not able to bury the dead. Neither verily were they the better for it, that the saying of Esay the Prophet might in them also bee fulfilled: And God calleth them, quoth he, to sorrow and mourning, to baldnesse and sackcloth; but behold, they fell to killing of calves, to slaying of rams: Lo, they went to eating and drinking, and said withall, Let us eate and drinke, for to morrow wee shall die. And why? the time drew neere wherein their iniquities, like as those in times past of the Amorites, should come to the fulnesse. For, they fall to consult what was the best and most convenient course to be taken, for to repress so cruell, and so many invasions of the forenamed nations, with the booties which they raised. Then, all the Counsellors together with the proud tyrant become blinded and bewitched, devising such a protection, nay a destruction rather of their country as this; namely, that those most fierce Saxons, a people fouly infamous, odious both to God and man, should be let into this Island, as one would say, wolves into the sheep-folds, to repulse, forsooth, and beat backe the Northern nations. Than which, I assure you, nothing was ever devised and practised more pernicious, nothing more unhappy unto this land. O mist of sense and grossest understanding that ever was! O desperate dulnesse and blind blackishnesse of mind! Those whom in their absence they were inclined and given to dread more than very death, now of their owne record these foolish Princes of Egypt entertained, as I may say, under the rooffe of one house, giving (as hath bene said) fowd-foolish counsell unto Pharao.

Pestilence

Saxons received into Britaine.

Then rushed forth out of the barbarous *Lionesses den a Kennell of whelps in three Vessels, * Germanie: called in her language Cyula, that is, Keeles, and in our Latine tongue, Longe naves, * Ciulæ. under full saile, carried with the wind of lucky sure presaging auguries, whereby fore-prophefied it was unto them, that for 300. yeares they should possesse and hold that land as their country, unto which they directed their course: and for an hundred and twentie, that is, the one moiety of the said space, oftentimes waste and depopulate the same. These being put on shore, first in the East-part of the Island, and that by commandement of this unfortunate tyrant, set fast their terrible paws and claws there, pretending unto the Islanders defence of their country, but more truly intending the offence thereof: unto which whelpes, the foresaid dam, * the Lionesse, finding that their first setting foote and marching forward sped * Germany. well, sends likewise a greater rabble of worrying freebooters, which being arrived here in Flotes conjoynded themselves with the former misbegotten crew. From hence it is, that the shoot-grifts of iniquitie, the root of bitterness, and virulent plants due to our deserts sprout and put forth in our soile, proudly bud, branch & lease. Well, these barbarous Saxons thus admitted into the Island, obtaine allowance of vittuals and wages, as for doury souldiers, and such as would endure hard service and much hazard (for so they falsly beare men in hand) in defence of their good hosts and friends for their kind entertainment. Which being given unto them a long time stopped (as wee say) the dogs mouth. Howbeit afterward they complaine that their * monthly wages was not well paid them, devising of purpose colourable occasions of quarrell, protesting and threatening, that unlesse they might feele more munificence poured and heaped upon them, they would with the breach of covenant spoile and waste the whole Island throughout. And without further delay they second these threats with very deeds:

deeds, (for the cause of deserved revenge for precedent wickednesse, was still nourished) the fire kindled, and set a flaming by these prophane men from sea to sea, ceased not to consume all the cities, and countreys bordering there about, untill such time as burning well neere all the inland soile of the Island it licked up with a red flaming, and terrible tongue all unto the westerne Ocean. In this violent furious invasion, comparable to that of the Assyrians in old time against Iuda, is fulfilled also in us (according to the historie) that which the Prophet by way of sorrowfull lamentation uttereth: They have burnt with fire thy Sanctuary, they have polluted in the Land the Tabernacle of thy name. And againe, O God, the Gentiles are come into thine heritage; they have defiled thy holy Temple, &c. In such wise, as all the Colonies by the force of many engines, and all the Inhabitants together with the Prelates of the Church, both Priests and People, by drawne sword glittering on every side, and crackling flame of fire, were at once laid along on the ground: yea, and that which was a piteous spectacle to behold, in the midst of the streets the stone workes of turrets, and high walles, rent and torne in sunder from aloft the sacred altars, and quarters of carcases (covered with imbrued work of imagerie) of a bloody hue, were scene all blended and mixed together (as it were) in a certaine horrible wine-presse, neither was there any Sepulcher at all abroad, save onely the ruin of buildings, and the bowels of wild beasts and fowles.

When we shall read these reports, let vs not be offended and displeased with good Gildas, for his bitter invectives against either the vices of his owne country-men the Britans, or the inhumane outrages of the barbarous enemies, or the insatiable cruelty of our Fore-fathers the Saxons. But since that for so many ages successively ensuing, we are all now by a certaine engrafting or commixtion become one nation, mollified and civilized with Religion, and good Arts, let us meditate and consider, both what they were, and also what wee ought to be: lest that for our finnes likewise, the supreme Ruler of the world, either translate other nations hither, when wee are first rooted out, or incorporate them into us, after we are by them subdued.

BRITANS OF ARMORICA.

Gildas.

DVring this most wofull, desperate, and lamentable tempestuous season, some poore remaines of Britaines, being found in the mountaines, were killed up by whole heapes; others, pined with famine, came and yielded themselves unto the enemies, upon composition to serve them as Bondslaves for ever, so they might not bee killed out of hand, which was repused a most high favour, and especiall grace. There were also that went over sea into strange lands, singing under their spread sailes with a howling and wailing note, in stead of the Mariners * Celestina, after this manner: Thou hast given us [O Lord] as sheepe to be devoured, and scattering us among the heathen. Others againe remained still in their owne country, albeit in fearefull estate, betaking themselves (but yet continually suspecting the worst) to high steepe hills and mountaines intrenched, to woods, and thicke growne forrests, yea, to the rockes of the sea. Of those who passed beyond-sea, no doubt were they who for to save their lives, went over in great number to * Armorica in France, and were kindly received of the Armoricans. That this is true, besides the communie of language, (the same in manner with that of our * Britans) and to say nothing of other authors, who all accord in this point; hee who lived neere unto that age, and was borne even in Armorica, and wrote the life of S. Wingular of the Confessor, sufficiently doth prove. An off-spring, saith he, of the Britans embarked in Flotes, arrived in this land, on this side the British sea, what time as the barbarous nation of the Saxons fierce in armes, and uncivill in manners, possessed their native and mother-soile. Then, I say, this deare off-spring seated themselves close within this nooke and secret corner. In which place they being wearied with travaile and soile, sate quiet for awhile without any warres. Howbeit, our writers report, that our Britans long before this time, ferled themselves in this coast. For, he of Malmesburie writeth thus: Constantinus Maximus being saluted by the Armie, Emperour, having proclaimed an Expedition into the higher lands, brought away a great power of British souldiers, through whose industrie and forward service, having obtained triumphant victories to his hearts desire, and attained to the Empire: such of them as were past service, and had performed the painfull parts of souldierie their full time, he planted in a certaine part of Gaule westward upon the very shore of the Ocean: where at this day their posteritie remaining, are wonderfully grown even to a mighty people, in manners and language somewhat degenerate from our Britans. And true it is that Constantine gave commandment in this wise: Let the old souldiers according to our Precept enter upon the vacant lands, and hold them for ever freely. Ninnius likewise: Maximus the Emperour who slew Gratian, would not send home againe those souldiers which he had levied out of Britaine, but gave unto them many countries, even from the poole or Mere, which lieth above Mount. Iovis unto the Citie that is called Cantuac, & unto Cruc-occhidiner: And he that hath annexed briefe notes upon Ninnius, saileth besides in this manner: The Armorican Britans which are beyond-sea, going forth from hence with Maximus the tyrant in his expedition, when as they could not returne, wasted the west-parts of Gaule, even to the very bare soile: and when they had married their wives and daughters, did cut out all their tongues, for feare lest the succeeding progenie should learne their mother-language: whereupon we also call them in our tongue, Lher vydyon, that is, halfe silent or tongue-tied, because they speake confusedly. The authoritie of these writers here in I cannot in any wise contradict; yet I am of opinion rather, that the children of those old souldiers gladly afterward received these Britans that fled out of their country. Nevertheless, the name of Britans in this tract, I find not in all the writers of that age, before such time that the Saxons came into our Britain, unlesse it bee of those whom Plinie seemeth to place in Picardie, and who in some copies are named Britanni. For if any man out of the fourth booke of Strabo his Geographie, doe with Volaterane thinke, that Britaine was a citie of Gaule, let him but looke into the Greeke Booke, and he will soone informe himselfe, that he spake of the Island Britaine, and not of a citie. As for that verse out of Dionysius, which before I have alleaged, some would rather understand it with Stephanus of our Britans, than with Eustathius of the Armoricans, especially seeing that Festus Avienus, a writer verily of good antiquitie, hath translated it thus:

*Caurus nimium vicina * Britannia, Flavag, casariam Germania porrigit ora.*

Britaine the North-west winds too neare,
And yellow haired Germanie her front doth forward beare.

Neither let any man thinke that the Britannicians mentioned in the booke Notitia came from hence, who in truth were certaine cohorts onely of souldiers enrolled out of this our Britaine.

Before the arrivall of our Britans, this country was at first called, Aremorica, that is, situate by the sea side: and afterwards in the same sense, Llydaw, in the British tongue, that is, coasting upon the sea, and thence in Latine by our writers living in the middle age, Leitavia. From when I suppose, were those Leti whom Zosimus nameth in Gaule, when he noteth, that Magnentius the Tyrant, was borne among the Leti in France, and had a Britan to his father. These Aremoricians when as that Constantine elected for the names sake became Emperour, and the barbarous nations over-ran Gaul, having cast out the Roman garrisons, instituted a common-wealth among themselves. But Valentian the younger by the meanes of Aetius, and at the intercession of Saint German, reclaimed them to allegiance. At which very time, it seemeth that Exuperantius governed them. Of whom Claudius Rutillius writeth thus:

Cujus Aremoricas Pater Exuperantius oras

Nunc post limum pacis amore docet.

Leges restituit, libertatemq; reducit.

Et servos famulis non sinit esse suis.

Whose Sire Exuperantius the coasts to sea that reach

Now after discontinuance long in love of peace doth teach:

Out of which verses, I wot not whether Aegidius Maserius hath made some collection, when he wrote, That the Britans were servants under the Armoricans and against them erected a freedome. The first mention to my knowledge of Britans in Armorica, was in the year of our saluation 461. about the thirtieth year after that the Anglo-Saxons were called out of Germany into our Britan. For then, Manuetus a Bishop of the Britans, among other Bishops of France and Armorica, subscribed to the first Councell of Tours. In the ninth year after, these new Inhabitants of France, seeing the West-Goths to seize into their hands the most fertile territories of France, Anjou and Poitou, encountered them, and were a barre that the Gothes possessed not themselves of all France. For they sided with Anthemius the Roman Emperour against the Gothes, so far forth that Aruandus was condemned for treason, because in his letters sent unto the King of the Gothes, he had given counsell to set upon the Britans dwelling over the river * Loire, and to divide France betweene the Gothes and Burgundians. These Britans were a kind of people witty and subtle, warlike, tumultuous, and in regard of their valour, number, and association, stubborn: in which terms Sidonius Apollinarius complaineth of them unto Rithimus his friend, for so himselfe calleth him (but Jornandes nameth him King of the Britans) who afterward being sent for by Anthemius, came with a power of 12. thousand men to aid the Romans, but before that they joynd with them, being with his owne forces vanquished in open field by the Gothes, he fled unto the Burgundians confederate with the Romans. From that time the native Armoricans being by little and little subdued, the name of the Britans in these parts, where they were newly seated, grew so great, that generally all the Inhabitants there, passed by little and little into the name of Britans: like as this whole tract was called Britannia Armorica, and of the * Frankners Britannia Cismarina, that is, Britan on this side the sea: and thereupon, I. Scaliger verified thus:

Vicit Aremoricis animosa Britannia gentes, Et dedit imposito nomina prisca iugo.

The nations Aremorican stout Britan overcame,
And with the yoke of servitude gave them her ancient name.

For, they turned the edge of their weapons upon those their friends that gave them entertainment, as appeareth evidently both by other testimonies, and also by these words of Regalis Bishop of Vennes as touching himself and his: We living, faith he, in captivite under the Britans are subject to a grievous and heaveie yoke. Moreover, in the times succeeding, they courageously maintained themselves and their estates: First under petty Kings, afterwards under Counts and Dukes against the French; albeit as Glaber Rodolphus writeth; Their only wealth was immunitie from payments to the publique Treasurie, and plentie of milke: Also 500. yeares since, William of Malmesbury wrote thus of them: A kind of people they are needy and poore in their owne country; otherwise also with foraine money waged, and purchasing a laborious and painfull life. If they be well paid, they refuse not so much as to serve in civill war one against another without all regard of right or kindred, but according to the quantitie of money readie with their services for this part sooner you would have them.

BRITANS OF WALES AND CORNWALES.

He rest of the Britans, who pitifully distressed in their own native country were put to seeke for their country, were overlaid with so great calamities, as no man is able sufficiently to expresse according to the nature of such horrible particulars as being not only molested grievously by the Saxons, Picts, & Scots, who made cruel war upon them far & neere, but also oppressed under the proud and intollerable rule of wicked tyrants, in all places. Now

A who those tyrants were and of what quality about the year of our Lord 500. have here in few words out of Gildas, who then lived and was an eye witness. Constantine a Tyrant among the * Danmonij, albeit he had sworn in expresse words before God and the companie of holy Saints, that he would performe the office of a good Prince, yet in two Churches under the sacred vesture of an Abbat, slew two children of the blood royall, together with their Follers, two right valiant men: and many yeares before having put away his lawfull wife, was foules defiled with a number of foule filthie adulteries.

B Aurelius Conanus, wallowing in the mire of Parricides and adulteries, hating the peace of his country, is left alone as a tree withering in the open field: whose father and brethren were with a wild, youthfull, and overweeming phantastie carried away, and by untimely death, surprized.

Vortigornus tyrant of the * Dimetia, the ungratious sonne of a good father, like to a Panther in manners, so variably spotted with vices of divers sorts: when his head was now waxen hoary and gray, sitting in his throne full of craft and guile, and the same defiled with Parricides, or murders of his owne kindred, and with adulteries beside, cast off his owne wife, (and filthily abused her daughter unawares, and unwitting) yea, and heooke also her life away.

Cuneglasus, in the Roman tongue, Lania fulvus, that is, the Lyon tawney Butcher, a Beare sitting and riding upon many, the driver of that chariot which holdeth the Beare, a contemner of God, an oppressor of the Clergie, fighting against God with grievous sinnes, and warring upon man with materiall armour, and weapons, turned away his wife, provoked the Saints and holy men with manifold injuries, proudly conceited of his owne wisdom, and setting his hope in the uncertaintie of riches.

Maglocunus, Dragon of the Isles, the deposor of many Tyrants out of Kingdoms and life, both the most forward in all mischief: for power and malicious wickednesse together, greater then many more: a large giver, but a more prodigall, and profuse spender: stronger in armes, higher also than all the Potentates of Britaine, as well in royall dominion, as in the stature and lineaments of his person. In his youthfull daies with sword and fire, he brought to destruction his Uncle by the mothers side, (being then King) together with many right hardy and redoubted servitors. After that phantastie of a viall course of rule according to his desire was gone, upon a remorse of conscience for his sinnes, vowed to bee a professed Monk: but some after returning to his vomit, breaking the said vow of Monach profession, he despised his first marriage, and became enamoured upon the wife of his brothers sonne, whiles he was living: the said brothers sonne, and his owne wife, (after hee had kept her for a certaine time) hee murdered, and then married that brothers sinners wife, whom hee before had loved. But I must leave the report of these things to History writers, who hitherto have fallily set downe, that these Tyrants succeeded one after another: whereas in truth as we may perceive by Gildas, who speaketh unto them severally, and personally one by one, they all at once, and the very same time usurped tyranny in divers quarters of the Island.

E And now to returne: The residue of Britans remaining alive, withdrew themselves into the western parts of the Island, naturally fenced with mountains, and inlets of the sea, to those parts (I meane) which now we call Wales, and Cornwall. The Inhabitants of the one the Saxons named Britpeales, of the other Cornpeales, like as those in Gaulle, Galpeales; For Walsh with them signifieth strange and foraine: whence also the Wallons in the low Countries, and the Vallachians upon the river * Dunow had their names.

The Britwales, or Welshmen, a very warlike nation, for many yeares defended their libertie under petty-kings: and albeit they were secluded from the English-Saxons by a Ditch or Trench which King Offa cast, (a wonderfull piece of worke) yet otherwhiles by fire and sword they spoiled their cities, and in like sort suffered at their hands all extremities of hostilitie whatsoever. At the length in the reigne of Edward the First, as he writeth of himselfe, The Divine providence which in the owne dispose is never deceived, among other good gifts dispensed by it, and with which it hath wondrously fed our Kingdome of England to bee adorned, hath converted now full, wholly, and entirely (of her good grace) the Land of Wales with the Inhabitants thereof (subject before time was to us by fealtie and service) into our proper dominion, and without any let or barre whatsoever, hath annexed and unised it unto the Crowne of the foresaid Realme, as a part of one and the same bodie politicke. Howbeit in the age next ensuing, they could no way bee induced to undergoe the yoke of subjection, neither could the quarrels by any means possibly be taken up, nor the most deadly hatred betwene the two nations extinguished, untill that King Henry the seventh, who descended of them, assisted the oppressed Britans with his gracious hand, and King Henry the Eighth, admitted them unto the same condition of Lawes and Liberties, that the English enjoy. Since which time, yea and very often also before, the Kings of England have had triall of their constant fidelitie, and loyall allegiance. As for those Cornwallians, although they stoutly bent all their force together in defence of their Country, yet soone became they subject to the Saxons, as who neither marched them in number, neither was their Countrey sufficiently fenced by nature to defend them.

* Welchmen.

Let this suffice that hath bene said, touching the Britans and Romans: but since we treat of the Inhabitants, we may not in this place omit, (although wee have heretofore spoken thereof already) that which *Zosimus reporteth; How that Probus the Emperour, sent over into Britaine the Vandals and Burgundians, whom he had overcome, who having seated themselves here, stood the Romans in good stead, as oft as any one raised tumult and sedition. But where they were planted, I know not, unless it were in Cambridge-shire. For, Gervase of Tilbury maketh mention of an ancient rampier or hold in that shire, which he calleth Vandelsbury, and saith, it was the worke of the Vandals.

* Lib. 1.

Neither let any man surmise, that in the daies of Constantius the Pæni had their abode here, grounding upon these words of Eumenius the Rhetorician: [Except perhaps no greater ruine had fallen upon Britaine, and borne it downe, than if it had bene drenched throughout; and overwhelmed with the over-flowing of the Ocean: which being delivered from the most deepe gulfe [Pænorum] began to appeare and shew it selfe as the view and sight of the Romans.] For, in the old Copie belonging sometime to Humfrey Duke of Gloucester, and afterwards to the right honourable Baron Burghly, Lord high Treasurer of England, we reade [Pænarum gurgitibus] that is, The gulfes of punishment, and not Pænorum gurgitib. For he seemeth to speake of the calamities and miseries wherewith Britaine was afflicted under Carausius.

Whereas Agathias in the second booke of his Histories, hath these words, Hunnica natio Britones sunt, that is, The Britons are a nation of the Hunnes: I would have no man hereby raise a slander upon the Britans, or thinke them to bee issued from the savage cruell Hunnes. For, long since Francis Pithæus a very learned man, hath averred unto mee, and now of late I. Lemenclaus, a right worthy Historian, published in writing, that in a Greeke Copie it is read, Britones, and not Britones.

PICTS.

PICTS.

NOW let us come to the other Inhabitants of Britaine, and first unto the Picts, whom for Antiquitie next unto Britains, the Historiographers have accounted the second. Hector Boetius deriveth these from the Agathyrsti: Pomponius Lætus, Aventinus and others from the Germans: some from the Pictones in France, and Beda from the Scythians. It hapned, saith hee, that the nations of the Picts came in long *ships, and those not many, out of Scythia, (as the report goeth) into Ireland: and of the Scots whom they found there, requested (but in vaine) a place of habitation: by whose perswasion they went into Britaine, and inhabited the Northerne parts thereof, and that was about the yere of our Redemption, (as many would have it) 78. I for my part, in so great a variety of opinions, know not which I should follow: yet, (that I may speake what I suppose to be true, and deliver mine owne judgement) were it not that in this point the authoritie of venerable Beda, did over-weigh all the conjectures of all others,

* Gallies or Keeles.

others, I would thinke that the Picts came from no other place at all, but were very naturall Britaines themselves, even the right progenie of the most ancient Brittaines: those Britans, I meane, and none other, who before the coming in of the Romans, were seated in the North part of the Island, and of those who afterwards, casting off the yoke of bondage (as they are a nation most impatient of servillie) repaired unto these in the North. Like as when the Saxons over-ran the Isle, those Britaines which would not forgoe their libertie, conveyed themselves into the Westerne parts of the Island, full of craggie hills, as Wales and Cornwall: even so, doubtlesse, when the Roman warre grew hot, the Britaines left they should undergoe servitude, (which is of all the miseries the extreamest) gat them into these Northerne parts, frozen with the bitter cold of the aire full of rough and rugged passages, and full of washes and standing meeres. Where being armed not so much with weapons, as with a sharpe aire and climate of their owne, they grew up together with the native Inhabitants whom there they found, unto a mightie and populous nation. For, Tacitus reporteth, that the enemies of the Romans were by his wives father Agricola, driven into this part, as it were, into another Island: and no man doubteth, but Britans they where which inhabited these remotest parts of the Island. For, shall we dreame that all those Britans, enemies to the Romans, which brought out thirtie thousand armed men into the field against Agricola, who gave unto Severus so great overthrowes, that of Romans and Associates he lost in one expedition and journey 70000. were killed up every mothers sonne, and none left for seed, and procreation, that they might give roome unto forrainers out of Scythia and Thracia? So farre am I from beleeving this, although Beda hath written so much by relation from others, that I would rather affirme, they were so multiplied, that the very soile was not able either to relieve or receive them, and were enforced therefore to over-flow, and over-whelme, as it were, the Roman Province, which came to passe wee know afterwards, when the Scots came in unto them. But because Beda hath so written, as others in that time reported, may easily bee brought to believe, that some also out of Scandia, called in times past Scythia, (as all the Northerne tract beside) came by the Isles, that by a continued ranke lie betwene, unto those Northerne Britaines. Yet lest any man should imagine, that I seeke to countenance a lie, carrying likelihood and probability of a truth, me thinks I am able to prove, that the Picts were very Britans indeed, by the demeanor, name, and language of the Picts, wherein wee shall see they agreed passing well with Britaines.

Their manners and demeanour.

And to let passe among other reasons, that neither the Picts, according to Beda, nor the Britans, as Tacitus writeth, made by any distinction of sex for government in chiefe, or excluded women from bearing scepter, that custome of painting, and staining themselves with colours, was common to both nations. As touching the Britans, wee have proved it before: and for the Picts, Claudian proveth it for us, who writeth thus:

Nec falso nomine Pictos

Edomuit.

The Picts hee tam'd
So truly nam'd.

Those iron-brent marks in Picts well seene all bloudlesse, as they die.

Which Isidore doth shew more plainly: The Nation of the Picts (saith he) have a name drawne even from their bodies, for that by the artificiall pricking therein of small holes with a needle, the workman wringing out the juce of greene grasse, encloseth the same within, that their Nobilitie and Gentry thus spotted, may carry these skarres about them, in their painted pounced limbes, as badges to be knowne by. Shall we thinke now, that these Picts were Germans, who never used this manner of painting: or the Agathyrsti of Thracia, so farre distant from hence, or rather the very Britans themselves: seeing they were

were in the selfe same lile, and retained the same guise, and fashion of painting.

Neither are those barbarous people, who so long time made such incursions out of the Forrest Caledonia, and from that farthest Northerne coast found the Romans worke, otherwise called than Britans, of the ancient writers, Dio, Herodian, Vopiscus, and others. Semblably, Tacitus who describeth at large the warres of Agricola, his wives Father, in this utmost coast of Britaine, calleth the Inhabitants by no other name than Britans, and Britans of * Caledonia: whereas notwithstanding, our later Writers have recorded, that the Picts, new comers hither, were arrived there ten or twelve years before; a thing that I would have you to note, considering that Tacitus in that age knew not of them at all. Neither would those Roman Emperors, who warred fortunately against them, to wit, Commodus, Severus, with Bassianus and Geta his sonnes, have assumed into their Stile that addition of BRITANNICVS, after they had vanquished them, unless they had bene Britans. Certes, if the Romans, for whose magnificence every thing made that was strange, had subdued any other nation there beside the Britans, and the same before time unknowne, (were they called Picts or Scots) they would (no doubt) have been knowne by the titles of Pictorum and Scoticus in their coines and inscriptions. Tacitus guesseth by their deep yellow bush of haire, and their large limbes, that they had their beginning out of Germanie: but straightwaies after, and more truly he attributeth all to the climate, and posture of the heaven, which yieldeth unto bodies their complexion and feature. Whereupon, Vitruvius also writeth thus: Vnder the North Pole are nations bred and fostered, bigge and tall of bodie, of colour browne, with haire of head even, and straight, and the same ruddie. In like manner, that the Caledones, (without all question Britans) were the selfe same nation of the Picts, the Panegyricke Author after a sort doth intimate, writing thus: The woods of the Caledones, and of other Picts, &c. as if the Caledones also, had bene none other but the Picts. And that those Caledonians were Britans borne. Martiall in this verse of his, implieth:

Quinte Caledonios Ovidi visure Britannos:

Quint Ovide, Britans Caledon, thou that dost mind to see.

Ausonius likewise, who sheweth withall that they were painted, while hee compareth their colour unto green mosse, distinguished with gravell between, in this wise:

Viridem distinguit glarea muscum;

Tota Caledonijs talis pictura Britannis:

Like to greene mosse with gravell rewe between,

The Britans Caledonian are all be painted seen.

But, as these for a long time were no otherwise known than by the name of Britans, and that, by reason of their depainted bodies: so afterwards, about the time of Maximian and Dioclesian, (neither before that, find wee the name of Picts in any writers) when Britaine had so long bene a Province, that the Inhabitants had learned the provinciall Latine tongue, then (it seemeth) began they to bee called Picts, for distinction sake, that they might be known from them that were confederate with the Romans, and called Britans. And whence should they bee called Picts, if it were not because they depainted themselves? Now if any one there be, who beleeveth not, that our Britans used the provinciall Latin tongue, little knoweth he certainly how earnestly the Romans laboured, that the Provinces might speake Latin, neither seeth he what a number of Latine words is crept into the British language: that I may not urge the authoritie of Tacitus, who saith, that in the Domitians time the Britans affected very much the eloquence of the Latine tongue. And as touching the name of Picts, the authoritie of Flavius Vegetius may soone cleare this doubt, who sheweth (after a sort) that the Britans used the word [Pict] in the very same sense, for a thing that is coloured, as the Latines doe. For, he writeth, that the Britans called these light Pinaces of espiall, Pictas; the sailes, gables, and other tacklings whereof were dyed with a blew or watchet colour, like as the mariners, and souldiers to them belonging, who were clad in blew apparell. Surely if the Britans called Ships, for their sailes and tacklings stained with the said blew colour, Pictas, what letteth but that they

* Now Albanic.

Lib. 4. cap. 37.

they should call the people Picti, who were painted with sundry colours, and with blew especially, for that is the colour that woad giveth.

This also maketh for us, that the Northerne Picts, whom Saint Columbane by preaching the word, and by his good example brought unto Christianitie, as in the ancient English Annals, named, Brittae Pechtae, as one would say, Britan Picts.

The cause whereof we draw not many proofes from the language, is this, for that of the Picts tongue, there can scarce one word be gathered out of Authors: yet it seemeth to be the same that the British. Beda wrote, that the Roman wall made against the incursions of the Picts, beganne in a place, which is the Picts Language is called, Pennabel: and Pengwall, among the Britans expressly signifieth, The beginning or head of the wall. Moreover, throughout all that tract of the Island, which the Picts held longest (and that was the East part of Scotland) the names of most places doe favour of a British originall: as for example, Morria, Marnia, for that they be countries adjoining to the sea, comming of the British word Mor, that is, Sea. Aberden, Aberlothner, Aberdore, Aberneith, that is, the mouth of Den, of Lochnet, of Dore and Neith, from the British word, Aber, which signifieth the mouth of a river. Strathbolgi, Strath-dee, Strathearn, that is, The Dale or Vale of Bolgi, Dee, and Earne, comming of Strath, which in the British tongue betokeneth, a Valley. Yea, and the chiefe seat of the Picts, doth acknowledge no other original than a British, I meane Edenburgh, which Ptolemy calleth Castrum alatum, that is, the winged Castle. For Aden, in British is, a Wing. Neither will I (by way of prooffe) take hold of this argument, that some of the British pettie Kings, were called Baidij, which is as much in the Britan language (as I have often said) as Depainted. Out of these premises verily, we may without any absurditie conclude, That the Picts Language, and the British differed not, and therefore the nations were not divers; howsoever Beda speaketh of the Picts and Britans tongues, as if they were distinct one from the other; in which place, hee may bee thought to have meant their sundrie Dialects.

Neither is there cause why any man should marvell, that the Picts wrought so much mischief, and gave so many overthrowes unto their country-men the Britans, considering that wee see at this day in Ireland, those which are within the English pale, have none so deadly foes unto them, as their owne countrey-men, the wilde Irish. For like; as we read in Paulus Diaconus, the Gothes, Hypogothes, Gepidians, and Vandals, varying their names onely, and speaking one and the selfe same language, encountered often times one another in open field with Banner displayed; even so did the Picts and Britans, especially when these Britans were become the Roman allies. These were the reasons, such as they be, that tooke hold of mee, and induced mee in a manner, to thinke the Picts a remnant of the Britans: but perhaps the authoritie of Beda weigheth downe all this; and therefore, if ye thinke so good, let the tradition of so reverend a man, grounded upon the relation of others, prevaile and take place before these conjectures.

These Picts Ammianus Marcellinus divideth into Dicalidonianis, and Vecturiones. I would rather read Dencalidonianis, and doe thinke they were planted about the Westerne coasts of Scotland, where the Dencalidonian Sea breaketh in. And albeit I have bene of opinion, that these were so called, as if a man would say, Blacke Caledonians, for Dee in the British tongue, signifieth Blacke (like as the Irish now adaeies terme the Scots of that tract, Duf Allibawn, that is, Blacke Scots, and so the Britans called the rovers and pirats, which out of these parts did much scath at sea, Ula du, that is, the blacke armie: yet now, mee thinkes we may guesse, (for guessees are free) that they tooke that name from their situation. For Dencalidony, betokeneth the Caledonians dwelling on the right hand, that is, Westward; like as the other Picts, who kept on the left hand, that is, Eastward, which Ninnius calleth, the left side, were named Vecturiones, by a word haply drawne from Chwinic, which in the British tongue, signifieth, Left; and these some thinke are corruptly called in Ptolomee, Pennicones. And an old Saxon fragment seemeth to give them the name of Pogporth, for so they terme an enemy-nation to the Britans: whereas the ancient Angles, or English called

The manners of these ancient and barbarous Britans, who afterwards came to be named Picts, I have heretofore described out of Dio, and Herodian. It remaineth now, that I goe on with my webbe, and weave thus much to it: namely, that in the declining state of the Empire, when the Romans somewhat unadvisedly, and without good forecast enrolled cohorts of the Barbarians, certaine of these Picts, (when all was in quietnesse and peace) were taken into the militarie service of the Romans by Honorius, and therefore termed Honoriaci, who under that Tyrant Constantine (elected in hope of so fortunate a name) having set open the fortified entries of the Pyrenean hills, let Barbarians into Spaine. In the end, when first by themselves, and afterwards combining with the Scots their confederats, they had afflicted the Roman Province, they began, though late it were, to waxe civill. Those of the South, were by Ninias, or Ninianus the Britan, a most holy man, converted to Christ, in the year of Grace foure hundred and thirtie. But they of the North, who were secluded from the Southerne by a continuall ridge of high craggie mountaines, by Columbanus a Scot of Ireland, a Monke likewise of passing great holinesse, in the year 565. who taught them, whence soever hee learned it, to celebrate the feast of Easter, betwixt the fourteenth day of the Moone in March, unto the twentieth, but alwaies upon the Lords day, as also to use another manner of tonsure, or shaving their heads, than the Romans did, to wit, representing the imperfect forme of a Coronet. About these ceremonies hard hold there was, and eager disputation for a long time in this Island, untill that Naitanus a King of the Picts brought his owne subjects with much adoe unto the Roman observance. In which age very many Picts with great devotion, as the daies were then, frequented the Chappels and Shrines of Saints at Rome, and among others he that is mentioned in the Antiquities of Saint Peters Church there, in these words [ASTERIVS COMES PICTORVM ET SYRACVM SVIS VOTVM SOLVERE] that is, Asterius a Count or Earle of the Picts, and Syria with their family performed their vowes. At length, by the Scots that infested them out of Ireland, they were made to stoop, and after so daunted, as that about the year of our Lord 740. being vanquished in a most bloody battell, they were either utterly extinct, or else by little and little, quite passed into their Scottish name, and nation. Which very same thing chanced to the most puissant Nation of the Gaules, who being subdued of the Frankes by little and little, were turned into their name, and called with them, Franci, that is, French.

Whereas the Panegyrick author, giveth some inkling, that Britaine before Cæsars time used to skirmish with their enemies the Picts and Irish, halfe naked men, hee seemeth to speake after the manner of the time wherein hee lived: but surely in those daies, there were none knowne in Britaine by the name of Picts.

Also, whereas Sidonius Apollinaris in his Panegyrick to his wives Father poetically powred out these verses:

*Victoria Caesar
Signa Caledonios transvexit ad usq; Britannos, Fuderit & quanquam Scutum & cum Saxone Pictum:*

In traine of Conquest Cæsar still his ensignes even as farre
As Britaine Caledonian advanc'd: and though no barre Staid him, but that the Scots and Picts, with Saxons he subdued, &c.

I cannot chuse but with another Poet, crye out in this wise:

*Sit nulla fides augentibus omnia Idæis:
These Poets love to over-reach,
Believe them not, when so they teach.*

For, Cæsar who is prodigall in his owne praise, would never have concealed these exploits, if he had ever performed them. But these men seeme not unlike to those good, honest, and learned writers in our age, who whiles they patch together an historie of Cæsar, write forsooth, how he subdued the Franks in Gaule, and the English men in Britaine, whereas in those daies the names of English, and French were not so much as heard of, either in the one or the other country, as who, many ages after, came into these Regions.

That the Pictones of Gaule, and our Picts were both one Nation, I dare not with Ioannes Picardus avouch, seeing the names of the Pictones in Gaule was even in Cæsars time very ripe and much spoken of, and for that our Picts were never called Pictones: yet am I not ignorant, how in one onely place of the Panegyrist among all the rest, through the negligence of the copier, there was foisted in Pictorum, in stead of Pictorum.

SCOTI.

Among the people of Britaine, after Picts, the SCOTISH Nation by good right challenge the next place: concerning whom, before I speake ought, for feare lest evill willers, & frowardly peevish, should calumniously misconstrue those allegations, which I, simply, ingenuously, and in all honest meaning, shall heere cite out of ancient writers as touching Scots, I must certifie the Reader before hand, that every particular hath reference to the old, true, and naturall Scots onely: Whose of-spring are those Scots speaking Irish, which inhabit all the West part of the Kingdome of Scotland, now so called and the Islands adjoining thereto, and who now adaies be termed High-land men. For, the rest which are of civill behaviour, and bee seated in the East part thereof, albeit they beare now the name of Scottish-men, yet are they nothing lesse than Scots, but descended from the same Germane originall, that wee English men are. And this, neither can they chuse but confesse, nor we but acknowledge; being as they are, teamed by those above said, High-land men, Sassones, as well as we; and using as they doe the same language with us, to wit, the English-Saxon, different onely in Dialect, a most assured argument of one and the same originall. In which regard, so farre am I from working any discredit unto them, that I have rather respectively loved them alwaies, as of the same blood and stocke, yea, and honoured them too, even when the Kingdomes were divided: but now much more, since it hath pleased our Almighty, and most mercifull God, that we grow united in one bodie, under one most Sacred head of the Empire, to the joy, happinesse, welfare, and safetie, of both Nations, which I heartily wish and pray for.

The beginning and Erymologie of the Scottish Nation, like as of other neighbour nations round about, is so full of obscuritie, and lies over-spread under the mist of darkenesse, in such sort, that even Buchanan himselfe, though otherwise a man of a very deepe insight, either hath seene little therein, or seene to himselfe alone: for in this point he hath come short of all mens expectation. Whereupon I have forborne a long time to take this enterprize in hand, lest with others in admiring fables, I should full sweetly please my selfe, and fall into folly. For, a man may with as great probability derive the Scots pedigree from the Gods, as from Scota that supposed and counterfeit daughter of the Egyptian King Pharaoh, wedded (forsooth) unto Gaishe-lus, the sonne of Cecrops founder of Athens. But, as this conceite arising from the unskilfulnesse of Antiquitie, is of the better sort of ingenuous Scots rejected: so, that other opinion of later daies, drawne without all sense from a Greeke fountain, that Scots should bee so called, as it were, obscuri, that is, Obscure, I utterly disallow and condemne, as a device of envious persons, to the slanderous reproach of a famous and valiant Nation. Neither doe all men like the derivation of our * Florilegius, namely, that Scots were so called, because they came of a confused mingle-mangle of divers nations: And yet I cannot but marvell, whence Isidorus had this: The Scots (saith he) take their name in their own proper tongue of their painted bodies, for that they were marked with sharpe yron pricks, and inke, and so receive the print of sundry shapes. Which also Rabanus Maurus, in the very same words (doubtlesse out of him) doth testifie in his Geographic to Ludovicus Pius the Emperour, which is to be seene in the Librarie of Trinitie Colledge in Oxford.

But seeing that Scotland it selfe hath of her owne people such as might very well fetch their beginning from the inmost record of Antiquitie, and thereby best of all advance the glory of their Country, in case they would wholly set their minds, and bestow their carefull diligence for a time in this argument; I will point only with my finger to the fountaines, from whence haply they may draw the truth; and lay before them certaine observations, which I would wish them to marke, and consider more diligently: for, my selfe will in this matter play the Scepticke, and affirme nothing. And first, touching their originall; and then, of the place from whence they removed, and came over into Ireland. For, certainly knowne it is, that out of Ireland, an Isle inhabited in old time by Britans, as shall in due place be proved, they passed into Britan, and what time as they were first known unto writers by this name, seated they were in Ireland. For, Claudian the Poet hath written of their irruptions into Britaine, in these verses:

Totum cum Scotus Hibernem Movit, et infecto spumavit remige Thesis:

What time the Scots all Ireland stir'd offensive armes to take,
And with maine stroke of enemies ores, the sea much fume did make.

And also in another place;

Scotorum cumulus flevit glacialis Hiberne:

And frozen Ireland, heapes of Scots bewail'd with many a teare.

Orosius likewise writeth thus; Ireland is peopled with Scottish Nations. Gildas calleth Scots, Irish Spoilers. And Beda; The Scots that inhabit Ireland, an Isle next unto Britaine: as also elsewhere. Yea, and in the daies of Charles the Great, Eginhardus in expresse words, calleth Ireland, The Isle of Scots. Moreover, Giraldus Cambrensis; That the Scottish nation (saith he) is descended out of Ireland, the affirmatie as well of their Language, as of their apparell, of their weapons also, and of their manners even to this day doe sufficiently prove. But now to come unto the points which I would have the Scots thoroughly to weigh.

For as much as they which are right and naturall Scots, acknowledge not this name of Scots, but otherwise call themselves Gaoithel, Gael, and Albin; seeing also, that very many people have other names given unto them by their neighbours, than they use themselves, whereby often times there is a secret light given unto nations of their descent: as for example; the Inhabitants of the lower Pannonia, who terme themselves Magier, are in Dutch named Hungari, for that they came first of the Huns: they that border upon the Forrest Hercynia, among themselves are called Czechi, but by others Bohemi, because they descended from the * Boj in Gaule: the Inhabitants of Africke, who having also a peculiar name among themselves, are by the Spaniards termed Alarbes, for that they be Arabians: the Irish, who call themselves Erinach, are by our * Britans named Goidhil: considering also, that as well those Irish, and these our * Britans, gave no other name to us English men, than Saxons, because wee are descended from the Saxons; I would have the learned Scottish men first to consider, whether they might not be called of their neighbours, as one would say, Scythia. For, even as the Flemings and other Netherlanders, expresse by this one word, Scutens, both the Scythians and Scots; so it hath bene observed out of our British writers, that they named both Scythians and Scots, Y-Scot. Ninnius also expresse calleth the Britans that inhabit Ireland, Scythians: and the narrow sea, through which they passed over out of Ireland into Britaine, Gildas nameth, Vallem Scythicam, that is, The Scythian Vale. For so hath the copie printed at Paris, where others without all sense read, Stybiacum Vallem. Moreover, King Alfred, who seven hundred yeares past translated the Historie of Orosius into the English-Saxon tongue, turned [Scotas] into [Scyttan] and our Country-men, who dwell next to Scotland, use to call them, not by the name of Scots, but Scyttee, and Scytters. For, like as (Walsingham is mine author) the same people be called Getae, Getici, Gothi, Gothici; so, from one and the same originall, originall, Scythia, Scitici, Scoti, Scoeci, take their names.

But whether this name were imposed upon this nation by their neighbours, in regard of Scythian manners, or because they came out of Scythia, let them here advise well upon it. Surely, both * Diodorus Siculus, and also * Strabo, compare the first Britans inhabiting Ireland, (which is the native country indeed of the wild Irish, and those that be right Scots) with the Scythians for their savage nature. Besides, they drinke blood out of the wounds of men slaine: they establish leagues among themselves, by drinking one anothers blood; and suppose, that the greater number of slaughters they commit, the more honour they win: and so did the Scythians in old time. To this wee may adde, that these [wild] Scots, like as the Scythians, had for their principall weapons, bowes and arrowes. For, Orpheus termeth Scythians even as Aelianus, and Julius Pollux, Sagittarios, that is, Archers. And learned men there be, that thinke hereupon both nations had this name given unto them, for their skill in shooting. Neither may this seeme strange, that divers nations carried the same names, by occasion of the same manners: as they who have travailed all over the West-Indies, doe write, that all strange, and hardie men that doe so much mischief with bow and arrowes throughout all India, and the Isles thereof; are by one name called Caribes, although they be of divers nations.

Now, that these Scots came out of Scythia, the Irish Historiographers themselves doe report: For Nemethus the Scythian, and long after him, Delas, one of Nemethus his progenie, that is, of the Scythian stocke, they reckoned among the first Inhabitants of Ireland. Ninnius likewise a Disciple of Eluodugus, hath plainly written thus: In the fourth age of the world (that space I meane which was betwene the building of Salomons Temple, and the captivitie of Babylon) the Scythians possessed themselves of Ireland. And hereto accordeth the authoritie of later writers, to wit, of Cisnerus in his preface to Crantzium; and of Reinerus Reineccius, who writeth thus: There remaineth yet the nation of the Scots in Britaine, sprung from the Scythians, &c. And yet I verily doubt, although the Getae were a Scythicke nation, whether the Poet Propertius meaneth those Irish of ours, in writing thus:

Hiberniq, Geta, Picfoq, Britannia curru.

Both Irish Getae and Britaine with her painted chariot.

But the Scots should lose part of their honour and dignitie, unless they be brought out of Spaine into Ireland. For, both they themselves, and their Historiographers labour to prove with all their might and maine; and good reason, (I assure you) have they so to doe. Unless therefore wee find Scythians in Spaine, all our labour is lost. And that Scythians have bene in Spaine (to say nothing of a promontorie or point among the Cantabri, called Scythicum next unto Ireland, and how that Strabo writeth, that the * Cantabri and Scythians forred well together in their deportment) Silius Italicus a Spaniard borne, doth most plainly declare: for by these verses he sheweth, that the Concani, a nation of Cantabria, were begotten of the Massagete, that is, Scythians.

Et qua Massagetem monstrans feritate parentem, Cornipedis fusa satiaris Concani venâ.

And ye your Parents Massagets in fiercenesse that doe show, Hight Concani, drinke horses blood, as it from veine doth flow.

And after some few verses betwene, hee proveth, that the * Sarmotæ, whom all men confesse to have bene Scythians, built the Citie Sufana in Spaine, whiles hee singeth in this note:

Sarmaticos attollens Sufana muros:

Sufana, with high Sarmatian wals.

Of these Sarmatians or Scythians, the Luceni, whom Orosius placeth in Ireland, seem to be descended (considering that the Spaniards themselves put Sufana among the * Lucensians of Spaine) like as of those Concani, the Gangani of Ireland. For the Lucensij and Concani in Cantabria, were neighbour nations, even as the Luceni and Gangani in that coast of Ireland opposite to Spaine. Now if any man demand of me, me, what those Scythians were which came into Spaine. Verily I know not, unless a man would thinke them to have beene Germans: And I could wish that the Scots themselves would enter into a more serious and deepe consideration of this point. But, that the Germans long agoe entered into Spaine; beside Plinie, who calleth the Oretani in Spaine, Germans, Seneca which was a Spaniard borne will enforme us. The mountaine Pyreneus (saith he) stopped not the passage of the Germans; the levities of men made shift to enter through places scant passable, and unknowne. And that the Germans were called Scythians, we gather not onely out of Ephorus and Strabo, who termed all the nations in the North, Scythians, but also out of Plinie. The name of Scythians (quoth he) extendeth it selfe farre and wide every way, even to the Samaritanus and Germans. Aventinus also witnesseth, that Germans were by the Hungarians called Scythe and Scythula. And to derive descent from a Scythian stock, cannot be thought any waies dishonourable, seeing that the Scythians, as they are most ancient, so they have been the Conquerours of most Nations, themselves alwaies invincible, and never subject to the Empire of others. Neither must we forget in this place that the Cauca and Menapij, ranged among the most famous Nations of Germanie, are by Prolemee placed in Ireland under the same names, and in the very same vicinitie one to the other: so that by all likelihood, they derived from the same Germans, both their name, and also their descent.

If the Scots have not their originall from these, I would they pondred with themselves, whether they were not of those Barbarians, who (as it is recorded in King Alphonfus his Chronicles) were by Constantine the Great, driven out of Gallycia in Spaine: for out of those parts they will needs have it, that they came into Ireland. If they demand, who those Barbarians were: I doubt not but they will bee of the same minde with me, that they were Germans. For during the raigne of Gallienus the Emperour, the Germans dwelling in the farthest parts (saith Orosius) of Germanie, spoiled and held Spaine in subjection: and who should those remote Germans bee, unless they were meere Scythians? but Aurelius Victor, whom Andrew Schot hath published, called those Germans * Frankes. But seeing those Frankes and Germans, inhabiting the farthest parts of Germanie, putting to sea from thence, sailed in their heate and furie farre into the Ocean, and as Nazarius saith unto Constantine, greatly annoied, and did much harme by these our seas, even to the Spanish coasts also, who will believe that they preferred the dry and barren soile of Biscay, before Ireland, an Isle most fruitful, and fitly scited to endamage Spaine? Nay rather, as in the time of Charles the Great, and afterwards, the Norwegians out of Scandia, did often attempt and invade Ireland, yea, and seated themselves there: so wee may with good probabilitie conjecture, that the Frankes did the same before; and that they passed from hence into Spaine; and after they were driven out thence by Constantine the Great, retired backe againe into Ireland. Credible likewise it is, that more of them afterwards flocked thither, what time as the Vandales and Gothes depopulated Spaine, and as barbarous nations, warred among themselves, and made havocke of all; as also, when any storme of Sarazens lay sore upon the Spaniards, and drave a great number of them into Gallycia and Biscay. But I leave these overtures unto others for to prie further into: let it be sufficient for me, that I have beene but willing onely to remove this cloud out of the way.

But I beseech the learned Scots in this place to consider here, how it cometh to passe, that the Irish being the ancient forefathers and Progenitors of the Scots, yea, and the Scots themselves, beare them highly of this, that they be called Gael and Gaithel, and their Language Gaithelac, as also why they named that part of Britaine, which they first possessed, Argathel? Whence can they say, that these names sprang? From the Gallaci in Spaine, from whom very many, no doubt, flitted over into Ireland, and whose beginning is fetched from the Gallatae or Galles; or from the Goths, as some later Writers are of opinion, who would have this word Gaithel to proceed from the Gothes, as likely as Catholonia did in Spaine: Here should they have drawn arguments from the affinity, between the Gothicke Language, and the Irish: which notwithstanding, nor withstanding, so farre as ever I could finde, hath no resemblance at all of any other tongues in all Europe, save onely of the * Welch and Dutch. How truly Henry Huntingdon writeth; The Scots came in the fourth age of the world out of Spaine into Ireland: and part of them who still remained there, use as yet the same Language, and are called Navarrians: how truly (I say) he hath delivered this, let others speake. And here I omit David Chabres the Scottish-man, who hath beene enformed by certainee Jesuites, that the Scottish tongue is used in East India. I am afraid lest that countrey so farre remote as it is, made the credulous man bold, not to make a lie, but to tell a lie.

But if arguments in this case may bee taken from the habite and apparell of the people, surely the array and clothing of the wild Scots at this day, is all one with that of the Gothes in times past; as wee may by and by perceive out of Sidonius Apollinaris, who in describing a Goth, portraierh & depainteth unto us a wild Scot, as right as may be. *They are (saith he) of a flaming deepe yellow; died with saffron; they buckle upon their feete a paire of Broges made of raw and untanned leather up to their ankles; their knees, thighs, and calves of their legs are all bare; their garments high in the necke, straight made, and of sundry colours, coming scarce downe to their hammes; the sleeves cover the upper points of their armes and no more; their souldiers coats of colour greene, edged with a red fringe; their belts hanging downe from the shoulder; the lappets of their eares hidden under the curled * glibbes and lockes of haire lying all over them.* (For so a man may very rightly call the manifold branched, and parted twists of haire, which * Scots & Irish weare) they use also hooked spawes, which Gildas termeth, Vincinata tela, and axes to sling from them. They wore likewise strait bodied coats (as saith Porphyrio) fitted close to their breasts, without girdles. If this bee not for all the world the very right apparell of the wild Irish-Scots, let themselves be Judges. I would withall, they did consider these words of Giraldus Cambrensis, in his first booke of The Institution of a Prince. When Maximus (saith he) was passed out of Britaine into Gaule, with the whole power of men, forces, and armour, that the Island could make, and all to seize into his hands the Empire, Gratian and Valentinian brethren, and partners in the Empire, shipped over these Gothes, (a Nation hardie and valiant in feats of armes, being also either confederate with them, or subject and obliged unto them for benefits, which they had received of the Emperours) from the borders of Scythia, into the North parts of Britaine, for to annoy the Britans, and cause the said Usurper to returne backe with his forces. But they, because they were exceeding puissant, (such was the inbred valour and warlike nature of the Gothes) and withall finding the Island destitute both of men and other meanes to defend it, becoming of pirats, and rovers neighbour dwellers, planted themselves in the said Northerne parts, and held by strong hand no small Provinces thereof, which they usurped as their owne. Now, who these Gothes were, let others shew, and peradventure out of Procopius, they may find some light; in whom we read, That Belisarius, when the Goths expostulated with him, for that he had granted Sicilie to the Romans, answereth in these words: *And wee likewise permit the Gothes to have unto themselves Britaine a farre better countrey than Sicilie, and in ancient time subject to the Roman Empire: For, meete it is, that they who first have bestowed benefits, should either reape condigne thanks againe, or receive goodturnes reciprocally. To this also may seeme to bee referred, that the Scots write, How Fergusus the Scot, accompanied Alaricke the Goth in the sacking of Rome: that Irenicus likewise reporteth, How Genfricke King of the Vandals came over unto Scotland and Britaine: as also, that which Cambrensis delivereth unto us, (but whence himselfe had it, I know not) namely, how the Gaideli, that is to say, the Scots, drew both their descent, and also their name from the Vandals, who were all one with the Gothes, as Paulus Diaconus sheweth. Neither can it be any disparagement at all to the name and nation of the Scots, to acknowledge themselves the offspring of the Gothes, seeing that the most puissant Kings of Spaine, thinke it an honour to fetch their pedigree from hence; and the noblest houses in all Italie, either draw indeed, or else falsifie their lineall descent from the Gothes. The Emperor himselfe Charles the fifth, would often times give out, and that in good earnest; that all* the Nobilitie of Europe came out of Scandia, and from the stocke of the Gothes. But these reasons are not of such credit and importance with mee, as that I dare thereupon resolve, that the Scots are sprung and issued from the Gothes.

Diodorus Si-culus.

Now, to end all in a word, I would have the learned Scots to consider seriously, whether they were of those most ancient Britans Inhabitants of Ireland (For, certaine it is that Britans in times past inhabited Ireland) and called Scythæ or Scoti, because they suted so well with Scythians in manners: or Scythians indeed, such as came out of Scandia or Scythia, unto whom the Gallæci, Françi, or Germanes driven out of Spaine, and Gothes or Vandals came afterwards, what time as Spaine with most hot and bloody warres was all in combustion: or rather a mishmash of sundry nations which conflowed into Ireland, and thereupon gat that name among other neighbors. The language, saith Giraldus, of the Irish is called Gaidelach, as one would say, gathered out of all tongues. And Florilegus (whencesoever he gathered it); From Pids and Irish, quoth he, the Scots take their beginning, as people compounded of divers nations: For that is called Scot, which from sundry things groweth into one heape. Likewise the Almans (by the testimonie of Aflinius Quadratus) carried that name, because they came of a commixture of divers men. Neither may any man thinke it strange, that so many nations in old time flowed into Ireland, considering the scite of that Island in the very midst betwene Britan and Spaine, and lying open so conveniently upon the French sea: seeing also it appeareth most certainly upon record, in the best approved Annals, that within these eight hundred yeares last passed the Norwegians, and Oustmans, that is, Easterlings out of Germany, the Englishmen, Welchmen, and Scots out of Britaine, planted themselves surely there. These are the points, I say, which I would wish the Scottish men in this matter diligently to thinke upon. But let them remember in the meane time, that I have affirmed nothing, but onely given an inkling of certaine things, which may seeme in some sort materiall and to make for the purpose. Whence, if the originall of the Scots shall receive no light, let them seek else where: For, I my selfe in this am stark blind, and have in vaine searched and hunted after the truth, that lieth still from me; howbeit with this consideration and circumspect care, that I have not, I hope, given the least offence to any whomsoever.

When the Scots came into Britaine.

Touching the time when the name of Scots became first famous, there is some question; and Buchanan a right good Poet, hath herein commenced an action against Humfrie Lhuid as good an Antiquarie: Because the said Lhuid averreth, that the name of Scots can no where be picked out of Authors before the time of Constantine the Great; he falls upon the man, is ready to take him by the throat, and with two silly arguments goeth about to give them the deadly stab; the one out of the Panegyrist, the other grounded upon a bare conjecture. Because we finde in the old Panegyrist, that Britaine in Cæsars time was wont to be troubled with Irish enemies; therefore, the Scots as then were seated in Britaine: but no man before him ever said, that so much as those Irish had then any settled place, much lesse, that they were Scots. No doubt, the Panegyrist, after the usuall and received manner of writers, spake according to his owne times, and not unto Cæsars. And as for the conjecture, it is none of his owne, but the conjecture of that most learned Joseph Scaliger. For he in his notes upon Propertius, whiles he was correcting (by the way) of that verse out of Seneca his entlude;

The Britans those that seated are beyond the knowne sea-coast
And Brigants with blew painted shields, he forced with his hoast;
To yield their necks in Roman chaines are captives to be led,
And even the Ocean this new power of Roman ax to dread.

Ille Britannos	Vlra nos	Littora Ponti
Et caruleos	Scuta Brigantes	Dare Romuleis
Colla Caseni	Iussit, &c.

readeth Scoto-Brigantes, and straightwaies exclaimeth, that the Scots are now beheld unto him for their originall. But to this his opinion I cannot yield assent, though it

A it be somewhat against my will, who in many things have alwaies for his learning honored and admired the man. For, this conjecture ariseth not from the divers readings in bookes, but out of his owne braine; and the sense may beare, either [Caruleos Scuta Brigantes] as it is in all bookes, or [Caruleos cute Brigantes] that is, the Brigantes with blue died skins, as that most learned Hadrian Iunius readeth it. But Buchanan, who had rather disport himselfe sweetly in his owne conceit and the witty invention of one other, than to judge aright with the usuall and approved reading of that place, giveth a marvellous applause to this conjecture. First, because authors do not record that the Britans painted their shields; Then, for that Seneca called them Scoto-Brigantes for difference sake, to distinguish them from the Brigantes of Spaine and Ireland: Last of all, because in these verses hee makes a distinction betwene the Britans and Brigantes, as though they were divers nations. But if one would narrowlie sift and examine these matters what letteth but that they might paint their shields as well as themselves and their chariots? Why should he for distinction sake, coine this new word, Scoto-Brigantes: when he calleth them blew, and saith they were subdued by Claudius, doth he not sufficiently distinguish them from the other Brigantes? But that observation of his touching Britans and Brigantes, as if they were divers nations, doth scarce favour of a Poets head, which could not be ignorant of that poetical figure, and manner of speaking, wherein a part is used for the whole, and contrariwise. Wherefore, seeing these things make nothing to his cause, I will second Buchanan by way, as it were, of a fresh supply, with the aid of Egesippus, (who is commonly reputed a verie ancient writer:) For, thus writeth he, where he treateth of the Romans power: They make Scotland to quake, which is beholden to no land for any thing; before them, Saxony trembleth, that for Marishes is inaccessible. But heare you me, this author shal stand behind in the rereward, for he lived after Constantines daies, as may be gathered out of his owne writings: neither can it bee proved out of him, that the Scots dwelt in Britain, no more than out of that verse of Sidonius which erewhile I alleaged. Yea mary, but there is another reason of more weight and moment indeed, which M. Iohn Crag, a right famous and learned man, found by most exquisite and curious search in Ioseph Ben-Gorion, writing of the destruction of Ierusalem, to wit, that in an Hebrew copie, the Scots are expressly named, where Munster in his Latine translation hath untruelly put downe Britans for Scots. But in what age that Ben-Gorion lived, I cannot find for certaine: sure I am, that hee was after Flavius Iosephus, because he maketh mention of the Franks, whose name long after began to be knowne.

But surely, if I may be so bold as to interpose my selfe in this question, among so great Scholars: so farre as I have beene able to observe, the first time that ever the Scottish nation became named in authors, was whiles Aurelianus was Emperour. For Pophyrie, who then wrote against the Christians, as * Saint Ierome informeth us, mentioned them in these words: Neither Britaine, a fertile Province of tyrants, nor, the Scottish nations, together with the barbarous people round about, as farre as to the Ocean, had any knowledge of Moses and the Prophets. At which time verily, or somewhat before, those that are well scene in Antiquities have noted, that the names of the most potent nations of French and Almans, were not heard of before the time of Gallienus the Emperour.

It is no assured truth therefore, which some write, That the name and Kingdome of the Scots flourished in Britaine many hundred yeeres before the birth of Christ. But hearken to Girald, who will tell you the just time: When Great O-Nel (saith he) held the Monarchie of Ireland, six sonnes of Mured King of Ulster, seized upon the North, parts of Britaine. Hereupon from them was there a nation propagated, which by a peculiar name called, Scotica, that is, Scottish, inhabiteth that part even to this day. And that this befel at the very time when the Roman Empire in every mans sight grew to decay, it is, collected thus. Whiles Lagerius the sonne of that O-Nel reigned over the Irish, Patrick (the Apostle of the Irish-men) came into Ireland, much about the yeere after Christs nativitie 430. So as it may seeme, this hapned neere the daies of Honorius

For then, whereas before time, ranging up and downe without any certaine place of abode (as Amimianus doth report) they had long annoyed Britaine and the places appointed for the Marches, they seeme to have set their footing in Britaine. But they themselves will have it thus, that they did but returne then out of Ireland, whither they had retired before, what time they were put to flight by the Britans, and driven away: and so they understood that place out of Gildas, of this very time; The Irish spoilers returne home, minding shortly to come backe againe. And much about this time, some think that Reuda, (whom Bede mentioneth) either by force and armes, or through favour planted himselfe in this Island, upon an arme of the river Cluid Northward. And of this Captaine Reuda (saith he) the Dalreudini, even to this day take their name. For, in their tongue, Dal, signifieth a part: and others think, that from this Reuda it was, that wee called the Irish-Scots, Redshanks. It is thought also, that the same Simon Brech, whom the Scots avouch to bee the founder of their nation, flourished in these daies. Sinbrech in truth was the name of the man, which is as much to say, as Sin, with the freckled face, as we read in Fordon. And peradventure the same Brech he was, who about the time of S. Patrick, together with Thuibai, Mac-lei, and Auspac, Scots, infested Britaine, as wee read in the life of Saint Carantoc.

Alban and Albin.

But why the High-land Scots living in Britaine, call that countrey which they inhabit, Alban, and the Irish name it Allabany, were a question for an ingenious and liberall wit to travell in: as namely, whether this word Allabany, may not have it in some token of the ancient Albion: or whether it came of whitenesse, which they call Ban, and therefore may import as much in Scottish, as Ellan-Ban, that is, a white Island: or whether it bee derived of Ireland, which the Irish Poets name Banne; so that Allabanny, may sound as much, as another Ireland, or a second Ireland. For, Historiographers were wont to call Ireland, Scotland the greater, and the Kingdome of the Scots in Britaine, Scotland the lesse. Moreover, seeing these Scots in their own language terme themselves Albin, whereupon Blondus called the Scots, Albioneses, or Albinenses, and Buchanan, Albini, let Criticks consider, whether that in Saint Ierome, where hee inveigheth against a certaine Pelagian, a Scot borne, it should not be read, Albinum for Alpinum, when hee taketh him up in these termes; The great and corpulent Alpine dog; and who is able to doe more harme with his heeles, than his teeth: for he hath his offspring of the Scottish nation, neere neighbours to the Britans: of whom also in another place, he said, that hee was full fattened with Scottish postage & brevesse. Of Alpine dogs, I never remember that I have read ought; but that Scottish dogs were in much request at Rome in those daies, Symmachus sheweth unto us, Seven Scottish Dogs there were (saith he) the day going before the Games, which in Rome they wondred at so, as they thought they were brought thither in iron-grated Cages.

But after that the Scots were come into Britaine, and had joyned themselves unto the Picts, albeit they never ceased to vex the Britans with skirmishes and in-roads, yet grew they not presently up to any great state, but kept a long time in that corner, where they first arrived, not daring (as Bede writeth) for the space of one hundred and seven and twentie yeares to come forth into the field, against the Princes of Northumberland; untill at one and the same time, they had made such a slaughter of the Picts, that few or none of them were left alive: and withall the Kingdome of Northumberland, what with civill dissensions and invasions of the Danes, sore shaken and weakned, fell at once to the ground. For then, all the Northerne tract of Britaine, became subject to them, and tooke their name, together with that hitherto more countrey on this side Cluid, and Edenburgh Frith. For, that it also was a parcell of the Kingdome of Northumberland, and possessed by the English-Saxons, no man gain-saith: and hereof it is, that all they which inhabit the East part of Scotland, and be called Lowland men, as one would say, of the Lower-countrey, are the very offspring of the English-Saxons, and doe speake English. But they that dwell in the West coast, named Highland men, as it were, of the upper countrey, be mere Scots, and speake Irish, as I have said before: and none are so deadly enemies, as they be un-

A unto the Lowland men, which use the English tongue as we doe.

Amimianus Marcellinus writeth; that together with the Scots, Attacotti, a warlike people, did much mischief unto Britaine; and those Humfrey Lhuid, guesseth, (how truly I know not) to have beene also of the Scottish nation. Saint Ierome telleth us plainly, that they were a British people. For he writeth, that when he was a very youth, (while Iulian as it seemeth was Emperour) he saw in Gaule the Attacots, a British nation, feed of mans flesh, who when they found in the Forrests heards of swine, flocks of neat and other castell, were wont to cut off the buttocks of their heard-men, and keepers, the dugs also and paps of the women, and account the same the onely dainties in the world. For, so according to the true Manuscript copies we are to read in this place, Attacotti and not Scoti with Erasmus] who acknowledgeth this text to be corrupted: Although I must needs confesse, that in one Manuscript wee read Attigotti, in another Catacotti, and in a third Cattiti. Neither can this passage bee any waies understood as the vulgar sort take it, of the Scots: considering that Saint Ierome treating there of the sundry orders and manners of divers nations, beginneth the next sentence following in this wise: The nation of the Scots hath no proper wives of their owne, &c. In another place also, where Saint Ierome maketh mention of the Attacotti, Erasmus putteth downe for them, Azoti. These Attacotti, as appeareth by the booke called Nottitia, served under the Romans in their warres, in the very decaying and declining state of their Empire. For, reckoned there are among the Palatine aids within Gaul, Attacotti Iuniores Gallicani, and Attacotti Honoriani Seniores: also, within Italie, Attacotti Honoriani Iuniores. By this addition Honoriani, they seeme to be of the number of those Barbarians, whom Honorius the Emperour entertained, and to no small damage of the Empire enrolled as souldiers to serve in his warres.

Among these nations also, which made rodes and invasions into Britain, Iohn Caius, a man much exercised with cares and endevours of the best kind, and one who hath passing well deserved of our Common-wealth of learning, reckoneth the * Ambrones, for that he red in Gildas, where he writeth of Picts and Scots, thus: Those former enemies, like Ambrones, Wolves, even enraged for extreame hunger, with dry javes leaping over the sheep-fold whiles the shepherd is out of the way, being carried with the wings of ores, and armes of powers, set forward also with sailes helped with gales of winde, brake thorow the bounds, killing and slaying all where they came. This good meaning old man thought of that which hee had read in Pectus, namely, that the Ambrones, together with the Cimbri, flocked by numbers into Italie: and being busied about another matter, it was quite out of his head, that [Ambro] as Isidorus noteth, doth signifie, a Devourer. Neither doth Gildas use that word in any other sence, nor Geoffrey of Monmouth, who called the Saxons also, Ambrones: nor any other Ambrones than these, could my selfe hitherto ever find in ancient Writers, to have invaded Britaine.

ENGLISH-SAXONS.

When as now the Romane Empire under Valentinian the younger did more than decline, and Britaine being exhaust through for many levies of all able men, and abandoned of the Romane garisons, could no longer withstand the force of Scots and Picts; Portigern, whom the Britans had made their Sovereigne and chiefe Governour, or who (as others thinke) had usurped the Monarchie, to the end that he might establish his imperially rule, and recover the State falling to ruine: (much awed hee was, saith Ninnius, by the Picts and Scots, he stood in feare of the Romanes forces, and was afraid of Aurelius Ambrosius) sent for the Saxons out of Germanie to aide him: who forthwith under the conduct of Hengist and Horsa, with their Cinles (for so they called their Flat-boats or Pinnaces) arrive in Britaine, and after they had in one or two battels gotten the victorie against the Picts and Scots, became Anglo-Saxons.

Who also is called Guertigern.

verie much renowned: and seeing the Britans still relying upon their manhood and courage, they send for greater forces out of Germany, which should keepe watch and ward upon the borders, and annoy the enemies by land and sea. Gwotigern (saith Nin-nius) by the advice of Hengist, sent for Oetha and Ebissa to come and aid him: who being imbarqu'd in 40. Cyules or Pinnaces, and sailing about the Picts coasts wasted the Isles called * Orcades, yea and got many Isles and Countreys beyond the * Frith, as farre as to the confines of the Picts. But at length, after they had begun to fall in love with the Lands, the civill fashions, and riches of Britaine, presuming upon the weaknes of the Inhabitants, and making the default of pay, and want of victuals their quarrell, they entred into league with the Picts, and raised a most bloodie and mortall warre against the Britans, who had given them entertainment: they kill and slay them in every place being put in affright and amazednesse, their fields they harrie, their cities they raze, and after many doubtfull events of battell, fought against those two bulwarks of warre, Aurelius Ambrosius, who here tooke upon him to weare the purple roabe, wherein his parents were killed, and that warlike Arture, they disleize the Britans of the more fruitfull part of the Isle, and drive them out of their ancient possessions. At which time, to speake all in a word, the most miserable Inhabitants suffered whatsoever either conquerour might dare, or the conquered feare. For, supplies of aide flocked together daily out of Ger-manie, which still should renew warre upon warre against the wearied Britans: to wit, Saxons, Iutes, (for so must we read, and not Vites) and Angles, who by these proper names were knowne one from another, although generally, they were called English, and Saxons. But let us treat of these in severall, and summarily, that it be possible we may have a sight of our originall, and first cradles.

Howbeit, first will I adde hereto that which Witichindus, being himselfe both a Saxon borne, and also a writer of good antiquities, hath related, as touching the comming in of the Saxons. Britaine (saith hee) being by Vespasian the Emperour long since reduced among Provinces, and under the vassalage of the Romanes, standing them in stead, and serving to good use a long time, became assailed by their neighbour-nations: for that it seemed destitute, and abandoned of the Romanes helpe. For, the people of Rome, after that the Emperour * Martial was by his souldiers killed, being sore tired out with forraigne warres, was not able to assist their friends with supply of accustomed aides. Yet nevertheless, the Romanes having built a mightie peece of worke for the defence of the Countrey, reaching betwene the confines from sea to sea, where it was thought that the enemies would assaile the Inhabitants, left the Land. But no difficultie it was for the enemye fiercely bent, and alwaies ready to wage warre (especially where they deale with a nation, feeble and unable to make warlike resistance) to destroy the said worke. Therefore hearing by report of the worthy and fortunate exploits, achieved by the Saxons, they send an humble Embassage, to require their helping hand: and so the Embassadors having audience given them, came forth and spake, as followeth. Most noble Saxons, The poore and distressed * Brets out-toiled, and over-tired by the many incursions of their enemies, hearing the fame of those victories which yee have valorously achieved, have sent us suppliants unto you, craving that yee would not denie us your helpe and succour. A large and spacious Land, plentifull and abundant in all things, they yeeld whollie to be at your devotion and command. Hitherto have we lived liberally under the patronage and protection of the Romanes: after the Romanes, we know none of more prowesse than your selves: and therefore wee seeke for refuge under the wings of your valour. So that we may by your puissant vertue and armes, be found onely superiour to our enemies, what service soever ye impose upon us, willing we are to abide the same. To this petition the Peeres and Nobles of the Saxons briefly made answer in this wise. Know yee, that the Saxons will be fast friends unto the Brets, and preest at all times, both to assist them in their necessitie, and also to procure their wealth and commoditie. With joy returne these Embassadors home, and with this wished-for tidings, make their countrey-men more joyfull, Hereupon according to promise, an armie sent into Britaine, and joyfully received, in short time freeeth the Land from the spoiling enemies, and recovered the countrey unto the behoofe of the Inhabitants. For, the performance hereof required no great labour: the enemies who had long since heard of the Saxons, were terrified

A terrified with the verie fame that was bruited of them: so that their very presence drove them farre off. For these were the nations that troubled the Brets, namely, Scots and * Pehits: against whom, the Saxons while they maintaine warres, received of the Brets all things necessary. They abode therefore in that country a good while, making use in civill sort of the Brets friendship reciprocally. But so soone as the Chieftaines of the armie saw the countrey to be large and fertile, and withall the hands of the Inhabitants flow, to practise feats of armes: and considered therewith, that themselves, and the greatest part of the Saxons, had no certaine place to seat themselves in, they send over to call unto them a greater power and more forces. Thus having concluded peace with the Scots and Pehits, they rise all together in common against the Brets, drive them out of the countrey, and divide the Land at their pleasure, as if it were their owne. Thus much Witichindus.

The originall and Etymologic of the Saxons, like as of other nations, not onely Monkes ignorant, as they were, in learned antiquitie, but also latter Writers, being men of some exact and exquisite judgment, have enwrapped with forged and fained fables. Some derive them and their name from Saxo, the sonne of Negnon, and brother of Vandalus: others from their stonie nature: some from the remaines of the Ma-cedonian armie; others of certaine knives, whereupon was made that rhyme in Engel-hufius:

Vnde tibi nomen, Saxo traxisse putatur.*

For, Sax, with them, and Short sword, is the same,
From whence it's thought, the Saxon tooke his name:

But Crantzius deriveth them from the Catti in Germanie: and that learned Cap-nio from the Phrygians. Of these, let every man follow which he liketh best: For, such conjectural opinions as these, I will not labour to disprove. Howbeit, that conceit of the best learned Germans may seeme worthy of acceptance, and to be preferred before the rest, who suppose that the Saxons descended from the Sacæ, a most noble Nation, and of much worth in Asia, and so called, as one would say, Sacæones, that is, the sonnes of the Sacæ: and that out of Scythia, or Sarmatia * Asiatica, they came in companies by little and little, together with the Getæ, Suevi, Daci, and others into Eu-rope. Neither is this opinion of theirs improbable, which fetcheth the Saxons out of Asia, wherein mankind was first created and multiplied: for, besides that Strabo writeth, how those Sacæ (as before time the Cimerij) made invasions into countreys which lay farre off, and termed a part of Armenia after their owne name Sacacena: Ptolomee also placeth the Saffones, Suevians, Maffages and Daci in that part of Scy-thia: and Cisner observeth, that these Nations retained the same vicinitie or neigh-borhood in a manner in Europe, which was among them in former times when they were in Asia.

Neither is it lesse probable, that our Saxons descended from these Sacæ or Saffones in Asia, (call them whether you will) than the Germanes from those Germanes in Perfia, of whom Herodotus maketh mention: which they themselves after a sort doe affirme, by reason of the affinitie of their Language: for, that singular Scholer Ioseph Scaliger sheweth, that these words, Fader, Moder, Tuchter, Band, and such like, are at this day found in the Persian tongue, in the same sence as we use, Father, Mother, Brother, Daughter, and Bond. But when the Saxons began first to bee of any name in the world, they had their abode in Cimbrica Chersonesus, which wee now call Denmarke, wherein Ptolomee placeth them, who was the first author (as far as I find) that mention them. For, we should not indeed read, Saxones, (as it is in some bookes) but more truly, Axones, in that verse of Lucan:

Longisq; leves Axones in armis:

And Axons in side armour light and nimble.

Out of this Cimbrica Chersonesus in the time of Dioclesian, they (with the Frankes their neighbours) troubled our coasts and the seas with Piracie, in so much as for the defence of the countrey, and to repell them, the Romanes made Carausius their Generall. Afterwards they having passed over the river * Albis, part of them by little and in their tongue, to the same sence, Engla theod.

About the time when they were admitted into Britaine by Vortigern, writers doe not agree: but to omit others, Bede and those that follow him, make this computation of those most confused times.

In the one and thirtieth yeere of Theodosius the younger, and of Christ 430. *The Britans pitiouſly crave aid, but in vaine, of * Aetius the third time Consul, for that they were sore oppressed by the Picts and Scots.*

Under Valentinian the third, Saint German once or twice came into Britaine against the Pelagians, and after he had powred out his praier unto God, led an armie [of Britans] against the Picts and Saxons, and gained the victorie.

In the first yeere of Martianus, and the yeere of our Lord 449, the nation of the English-Saxons arrive in Britaine.

But seeing it appeareth for certaine by the * Kalender of the Consuls, that the third Consulship of Aetius fell out to be in the 39. yeere of the said Theodosius, and after the birth of Christ 446. as also by the best and most approved authors, that Saint German died in the yeere of Grace 435: justly wee may suspect, that those numbers in Bede were corrupted, and that the Saxons had footing given them here, before the yeere of our Lord 449. For other wise, how could it be, that S. German, who departed this life An. Do. 435, should conduct the Britans against the Saxons, when as they were not yet come? Ninnius also writeth, that Saint German returned out of Britaine into his owne country after the death of Vortigern, who received the Saxons into Britaine: so that of necessitie their comming in was before the yeere of our Lord 435, which was the yeere wherein Saint German ended his life. In like manner, in the second yeere after that Leo Magnus was created Bishop of Rome, which was in the yeere of Christ 443, Prosper Tyro who then lived, writeth, that Britaine after sundry overthrowes, was brought in subjection to the Saxons, so that they doubtlesse must needs come in before that time, namely, the yeere of Christ 449. But to take away all scruples, and cleere all doubts in this point, this one note of computation adjoynd unto some copies of Ninnius, which is unto me in stead of all, may suffice.

*From the Consulship of the two Gemini, * Rufus and Rubellius, unto Stilico the Consul, are reckoned 373. yeeres.*

Item, from Stilico unto Valentinian the son of Placidia, and to the raigne of Vortigern, be 28. yeeres.

*From the raigne of Vortigern unto the * discord of Guitolin and Ambrose, are 12. yeeres. Which battell is Guoloppum, that is, Cathguoloph.*

Now Vortigern held the Kingdome of Britaine when Theodosius and Valentinian were Consuls: and in the fourth yeere of his raign, the Saxons came into Britaine, and were entertained by Vortigern, when Felix and Taurus were Consuls.

By casting therefore the account thus, the comming in of the English-Saxons into Britaine, was in the 21. yeere of Theodosius the younger: and this commeth nearest to the computation of Bede, in the yeere of our salvation 428. For then Felix and Taurus bare their Consulship: and so all circumstances of persons and times doe well cohere. This moreover I thinke good to tell you of, although I will not take upon me to be a Criticke, that in most copies of Gildas, whence Bede had that note of Erius, we read Agitio 111. Consuli, in others without adjection of number, Agitio: and in one, Aequitio Cos. But to this day never could I see in the Register and Kalender of Consuls, any Consul of that name: unlesse we might thinke that he was some Consul extraordinarie.

Well, what time soever it was that they came in, they made good prooffe of their singular valour and wisdom with all. For in a short space, their State, for number, for good customes and ordinances, for lands and territories grew to that height, that it became most wealthy and puissant, yea, and their conquest in some sort full and absolute. For all the conquered, except some few, whom in the Western tract the roughnesse

The Saxons conquest.

A roughnesse of the countrey defended and kept safe, became one nation, used the same lawes, tooke their name, and spake one and the selfe same language, with the conquerours. For, besides England it selfe, a great part of Scotland, being possessed by the English Saxons (and still to this day, the wilde and naturall Scots indeed, terme them Saffones) useth the same tongue that we do, varying a little in the Dialect onely. Which tongue we and they together for the space now of 1150. yeeres, have kept after a sort uncorrupt, and with the possession also of the Land. So that now it is proved vaine and false, (as other propheties of that kind) which the Saxon Prophets foretold, when as they spred their failles for this Iland, That they should inhabit here 300.

B yeeres and no more, and for one hundred and fiftie of them, often times waste and spoile the countrey. Now, the matter it selfe, and the place seeme to require, that somewhat should bee added as touching the ancient manners and demeanour of our Forefathers the Saxons: and surely, annex I will what I have observed in this behalfe.

This nation of the Saxons, was generally most warlike and martiall, For courage of minde, strength of bodie, enduring of labour and travell, reputed of all the Germans, most valiant, as faith Zosimus. Most feared of the Romanes, because their invasions were sudden, as Marcellinus reporteth: Terrible for hardinesse and agilitie, as faith Orosius. Saxony is a region (by reason of Marishes) inaccessible, and environed with comber- some countreys, and unpassable. Which things although they may make them more secure for

C war, and although it selfe also was led captive oftentimes to set out the Roman triumphs, yet have they the name to bee a most valorous kind of men; excelling all other in piracie: howbeit, trusting in their swift pinnaces and flibotes (not in fine force) provided rather for flight, than fight, as Egiptus recordeth of them. In imitation of whom, Isidorus writeth thus: The Nation of the Saxons seated upon the coasts of the Ocean sea, and among unpassable Marishes, is for valour and nimblenesse meet for service: and thereupon they tooke their name, as being a kinde of people stout, hardy, and most valiant, yea and redoubted above all other for piracie. Men they are for their tall stature, the good feature of their limbs, and framing of their lineaments, conspicuous and notable. Whereupon Witichindus the Monke, writeth thus of them; The Franks had these men in admiration for

D their excellencie as well in bodie as mind: they wondred at them for their new and strange habite, for their armour also, and shoulders overspread with the haire of their head; but above all for their constant resolution, and valiant courage. Clad they were in souldiers cassocks, and weaponed with long speares) they trusted upon their little bucklers, and wore great knives or steins at their backs. Howbeit, beforetime they used to shave their haire off, hard by the head to the very skinn, unlesse it were round about the crowne, and to wear a plate about their head, as Sidonius Apollinaris teacheth us in these verses:

*Istic Saxonacarnum videmus Adusuetum ante salo, solum timere;
Cujus verticis extimas per oras
Non contenta suos tenere morsus, Alsat lamina marginem comarum.
Et sic crinibus adentem recessis,
Decrescit caput, additurque vultus.*

The Saxons there in watcher clad, we see
On land a fraid, who east at sea were bold;
Whose bush of haire about the crowne that be Plares not content to keepe their wonted hold Rasse up in tufts, when all the rest is pold:
The Scalpe beneath thus shaven to the skin,
Their face seemes full, their heads but small and thin.

As far their apparell, you may understand what it was out of these words of Paulus Diaconus, as touching the Longobards, Their garments were large, and loose, and most of all linnen, such as the English Saxons are wont to wear, trimmed and set out with verie broad gards or welts purfled and embroydered with sundry colours. Most skilfull sea men.

men they were, as who a long time lived as Pirats, so that being accustomed to the sea they were afraid, as he saith, of the land: and wrought so much mischief upon the sea-coasts of Britaine and France, as farre as to Spaine, that there were both Captaines and souldiers appointed all along the shores of both Countries to restrain their roving and depredations, who thereupon were called Counts or Earles of the Saxon shore along Britaine and France. And heereto tend these verses of Sidonius Apollinaris:

Quin & Aremorici piratam Saxonat tractus, Sperabat cui pelle salum fulcare Britannum Ludus, & assuto glaucum mare findere lembo.*

The tract also that lies the Sea so neare,
Hight Armoricke, did Saxon pirate* feare:
Whose sport it is with leather-fitched boat,
Of British Sea to cut the waves afloat.

Yea and that which more is, within Gaule neere unto Armorica, they seized into their hands and held a long time the Country about the * Baiocasses, as is to be seen in Gregorius Turonensis, who termed them Saxones Baiocassinos, like as the common sort, Sesnes Bessins.

But with how great cruelty they committed outrages along these shores, heare if it please you, Sidonius himselfe. The Messenger, (saith he) with whom we spent some time in talke, whiles for your sake we held him with us, constantly affirmed, that you of late sounded alarm at Sea, and performing the part in your owne person sometime of a souldier & sometimes of a mariner, bestirred your selfe up and downe the winding shores of the Ocean, so as from the flat bottom barks of the Saxons: Of whom as many rowers as you see, so many Archpirats you may thinke you beheld: They all of them together, so command, obey, teach, and learne to rob and steale; that even now also you have greatest cause to be warmed, and to be most heedfull and wary of them. There is no enimie so cruell as this. He setteth upon others at unwares, himselfe slips away as warily: He setteth at nought such as encounter him, he bringeth to nought those that take no heed to him: whom he courteth, he surely overtaketh, when he flieth he is sure to escape. To this service, shipwracks inure him, they terrifie him not. Not onely skilfull they are in the dangers of sea, but also familiarly acquainted in some sort therewith. Be there a tempest up: the same of one side serveth to secure them were they in jeopardy to be taken; on the other side if they be to assaile others, it keepeth them from being despoiled and scene farre off. In the mids of waves and craggy rocks, they hazard their lives in hope of good successe. Besides this, before they take shipping into their owne Country and weigh their slowked anchors from the enemies shore, upon the point of returne, their manner is to kill every tenth captive with equall and* dolorous torment (a custome the more lamentable, because it is superstitious) and among the number of such as are gathered together to die, for to disperse the equity of lot, together with the iniquitie of death.*

*With such vowes they bind themselves, with such sacrifices they pay their vowes, and not so much purified by such sacrifices, as polluted with sacrilegies, the bloudie and abominable murderers thinke it a religious thing, rather to torment a prisoner to death, than to set him free for a ransom. Hitherto also may be referred that, which we collect of the fragment of an ancient Historie in Isidorus. The Saxons trust to their fly-boats and not to their strength, better appointed for flight than for fight. As also this testimonie of Salvianus, who then lived, writing thus of Barbarous nations. The Alani are a people vicious and uncleane, but not so perfidious. The Franks be given to lying, howbeit full of hospitalitie and kind to strangers. The Saxons in cruelty outrageous, yet for chastitie to be honoured. But so firme and resolute they were, (if I may be allowed to give it so good a terme) that they would chuse rather to kill themselves, and cast away their lives wilfully, than be mocked and laughed to skorne. And hereupon it was, that when Symmachus had provided a band of them against the publicke shewes which were to be exhibited, the very day on which they should have bene brought forth into the Theatre, for sword play to kill one another, they by strangling themselves prevented all hope of shewing bloudy sport and pastime unto the people. Of whom Symmachus himselfe writeth thus: The band or company of Saxons is lessened by death. For, when as the private guard* restrained

A restrained not the liberty of the impious hands of those desperate people; the first day of the sword-fight, shew saw nine and twenty of their necks broken without any halter.

Moreover, this nation of the Saxons was very much addicted to superstition, & for that cause when they were to consult of weighty and important matters, beside Sooth-saying by inspection of beasts entrails, they observed especially the neighing of horses, as prefaging things to come. And thence perhaps it is, that the Dukes of Saxonic in ancient time gave the horse in their Armes. But why our first Progenitors Hengist and Horsa, tooke their names of an horse, (for both their names in the Saxon tongue do signifie, an horse,) surely I know not, unless it were for a lucky offe and fore-token of their warlike prowess, according to that verse of Virgil.

Bello armantur equi, Bella hæc armenta minantur:

For warre our horses armed are,
These beasts also doe threaten warre.

They used also casting and drawing of lots very much; for, they did cut downe a branch from some tree that bare fruit, and lived or cleft the same into slips and twigs, and when they had distinguished them with certain marks, they scattered them at hazard upon a white garment. Straight waies, if the consultation were publike, the Priest; if private, the goodman of the house, after prayers first unto the Gods, looking up to heaven, tooke each of them up three times, and having lifted them up, they interpreted them according to the marke set before upon them.

To trie out the event and issue of warres, they were wont to set a prisoner of that nation against which they denounced warre, and a man chosen out of their owne countymen, to fight together a combat, each of them with the weapon used in their countrie; and so to guesse by him that was victour, which nation should goe away with victorie. Above all other Gods they worshipped Mercurie, whom they called Wooden, whose favour they procured by sacrificing unto him men alive; and to him they consecrated the fourth day of the weeke, whereupon wee call it at this day, Wednesday: like as the sixth unto Venus, whom they named Frea or Frico, whence wee name that day Friday: even as we do Tuesday of Tuisco, the stocke-father of the German or Dutch nation. They had a Goddess also named Eoster, unto whom they sacrificed in the month of April: and hence it cometh, saith* Beda, that they called April, Eoster, monath, and we still name the feast of the Resurrection, Easter; but rather as I thinke of the rising of Christ, which our progenitors called East, as we do now that part whence the Sunne riseth. In generall (as saith Tacitus) the English and other neighbour nations worshipped Hertbus, that is, Dame Earth, for a Goddess, and they had an opinion, that she intermedied in humane affaires, and relieved the people. And even with us in these daies, that word Earth is in use, but growne out of use with Germans; who in stead of Earth, say, Arden. Of these superstitions that foresaid Ethelward writeth thus; respectively unto the time wherein he lived: So grievously seduced are the unbelievers of the North, that unto this very day, the Danes, Normanes and Suevians, worship Woodan as their Lord: and in another place; The Barbarous people honoured Woodan as their God, and the Painims offered sacrifice unto him, that they might be victorious and valorous.

But more fully Adam Bremenensis setteth these things downe. In a temple, saith he, (called in their vulgar and native speech Yfolsa) which is made altogether of gold, the people worship the statues of three Gods: in such manner as that, Thor, the mightiest of them hath anely a throne, or bed: on either hand of him Woodan and Frico hold their places. And thus much they signifie. Thor, say they, beareth rule in the aire, as who governeth thunder and lightning, winds, shewres, faire weather, corne and fruits of the earth. The second, which is Woodan, that is, stronger, maketh wars and ministreth manly valour against enemies. The third is Frico, bestowing largely upon mortall men, peace and pleasure, whose image they devise and portray with a great* viril member. Woodan they engrave armed, like as with us they use to cut and expresse Mars. And they seeme to represent Thor, with the scepter of Jupiter. But these errors, the truth of Christian religion hath at length chased quite away. After that these nations above said, had now gotten sure footing in the possession of Britain, they divided it into seven kingdomes, and established an Heptarchie: In which notwithstanding, the prince that had the greatest power, was called, as we read in Beda, King of the English nation: So that in this very Heptarchie it may seeme there was alwaies a Monarchie. After this, Augustine, whom commonly they call the Apostle of the English men, being sent hither by Gregorie the great, having abolished these monstrous abominations of heathenish impietie, with most happy successe planting Christ in their hearts, converted them to the Christian faith. But for what cause and upon what occasion, this Gregorie was so diligent and carefull for the salvation of this English nation, Venerable Beda hath by tradition of his forefathers recounted unto us in these words: *The report goeth, that on a certaine day, when upon the comming of merchants lately arrived, great store of wares was brought together into the market place [at Rome] for to be sold, and many chapmen flocked together for to buy, Gregory also himselfe among others came thither, and saw with other things, boies set to sale, for bodies faire and white, of countenance sweet and amiable, having the haire also of their head as lovely and beautifull. Whom when he wisely beheld, he demanded, (as they say) from what countrey or land they were brought? Answer was made, that they came out of the Isle of Britaine, the people whereof were as well favoured to see unto. Then he asked againe, Whether those Islanders were Christians, or ensnared still with the errors of Paganisme? To which it was as it said, They were Paganims: but he fetching a long deepe sigh from his very heart root, Alas for pittie, quoth he, that the foule fiend and father of darknes should be Lord of so bright and lightsome faces, and that they who carryed such grace in their countenances should be void of the inward grace in their hearts & soules. Once againe he desired to understand by what name their nation was knowne. They made answer, That they were called * Angli: And well may they so be named, quoth he, for Angellike faces they have: and meete it is that such should bee fellow-beires with Angels in heaven. But what is the name of that Province from whence these were brought? Answer was returned, that the Inhabitants of the said province were cleped * Deiri: Deiri, quoth he, They are indeed Deira eruti, that is delivered from ire and wrath, and called in the mercie of Christ. How call you the King of that province, said he: Answer was given, that his name was Aelle: Then he alluding to the name, said, That Aelle-jah should be sung in those parts, to the praise of God the Creator. Comming therefore to the Bishop of the Romanee and Apostolicall See (for himselfe as yet was not made Bishop) he entreated, that some ministers of the word should be sent unto the English nation, by whose meanes it might be converted to Christ: and even himselfe was ready to under take the performance of this worke, with the helpe of God, in case it would please the Apostolicall Pope, that it should be so.*

Concerning this conversion, the same Gregorie the Great writeth thus: Behold, * he hath now entred already into the hearts of all nations, in manner, that are: Behold, in one faith he hath conjoined the limits of East and west: Behold, I say, the very British tongue, which could nought else but rudely bray Barbarous words, long since began in the Land of God to resound the Hebrew Allelu-jah. And in his Epistle to Augustine himselfe: Who is able heere to shew sufficiently, what great joy is risen up in the hearts of all the faithfull for that the nation of Englishmen by the operation of God almightie his grace, and the labour of your brotherhood, after the darknes of errors were chased and driven away, is illuminated with the light of holy faith: for that with most sincere devotion they now spurne and tread idles under their feet, who beforetime in superstitious feare lay prostrate before them: In an old fragment also written in that age, thus we read: Augustine upon one day of Christs Nativite, which with the universall glorie of the Englishmen is for ever celebrated, did regenerate by lively Baptisme above ten thousand men, besides an innumerable multitude of women and young children. But, what a number of Priests, and other holy orders besides, could be sufficient to wash such a sort of people? Having hallowed and blessed therefore the river called in English Swale, the Archbishop (Augustine) commanded by the voice of Criers & Masters, that the people should enter the river confidently two by two, and in the name of the Trinitie baptize one another by turnes. Thus were they all borne againe with no lesse miracle, than in times past the people of Israel passed over the (red) Sea divided, and like wise Jordan when it turned backe: for even so, they were transported to the banks on the other

A other side: and notwithstanding so deepe a current and chanell, so great and so divers differences of sex and age, not one person (who will ever thinke it?)ooke harme. A great miracle no doubt, but this miracle as great as it was a greater preeminence doth surmount: in that, all feeblenesse and infirmities was laid off in that river: whosever was sick and deformed returned out of it whole and reformed. O festivall spectacle for Angels and men to behold, when so many thousands of a nation suing for grace, came forth of one rivers channel, as out of one mothers wombe, and out of one poole so great a progenie sprung up for the celestiall and heavenly Citie? Hereupon the most gracious Pope Gregorie, with all the companies of Saints above, breaking forth into joy, could not conceale this, but wrote unto Saint Eulogius the Patriarch of Alexandria, that hee would most thankfully congratulate with him, for so great an host baptized upon one Christmas day.

No sooner was the name of Christ preached, but the English presently with such fervent zeale and devotion consecrated themselves unto Christ, that they tooke incredible paines in propagating Christianitie, in celebrating divine service, performing all functions and duties of pietie, building Churches and endowing them with rich livings, so that there was not another region in all Christendome that could make reckoning of more monasteries richly endowed: Yea, & divers Kings there were that preferred a religious and monasticall life before their Crowne and Kingdom. So many holy men also this land brought forth, which for their most firme profession of Christian religion, constant perseverance therein, and sincere pietie were canonized Saints, that it gave place to no other Christian province in this behalfe: And likewise Britaine was called of that prophane Porphyrie, a plenteous province of Tyrants; so England might truly be named, a most fruitfull Island of Saints.

Furthermore, they applied their minds to the bringing in againe of the better kind of arts and sciences, and sowed the seeds of Divinitie and good literature throughout all Germanie, by the means of Winifridus, Willebrodus, and others, which a German Poet sheweth in these verses:

Hactamen Arctois laus est aeterna Britannis,
Quod post Pannonicis vastatum incursum orbem,
Illa bonas artes & Graiae munera lingua,
Stellarumq; vias, & magni sidera caeli,
Observans, iterum turbatis insulis oris.
Quin se religio multum debere Britannis:
Servata, & late circum dispersa fatetur:
Quis nomen Winfride tuum, quis munera nescis?
Te duce, Germanis pietas se vera, fidesq;
Insinuans cepit ritus abolere profanos.
Quid non Alcuino facunda Lutetia debes?
Instaurare bonas ibi qui feliciter artes,
Barbariemq; procul, solus depellere cepit.
Quid? tibi divinumq; Bedam, doctissimus olim
Dum varias unus bene qui cognoverat artes, Debemus.

Yet this immortall praise is due to Britain, Northern Isle,
That when the world was overrun and wasted all the while
By Pannonik invasions, it did reduce in ure
Those troubled countries, with good arts: also with knowledge pure
Of Greeke tongue: and observing still the stars in spacious skie,
And planets with their wandering waies, taught them Astronomie.
For true religion eke preserv'd, and sowne in many a land,
The world much bound to Britaine is; and to her helpfull hand.
Thy name and gifts, O Winifride, who knowes not: since by thee
The way was made in Germanie; where faith and pietie
First setting foote beganne to chase all rites profane away:
What ow I not to Alcuine now? may eloquent Paris say,

of Anglo-Saxons into Germanie.

Peter Ramus saith moreover, that Britaine was twice Schoole-mistrie to France, meaning, by the Druidæ and Alcuinus, whose industrie Charles the Great used especially in erecting the Universitie of Paris.

They brought also into Germanie military knowledge of Armes, as well as learning and religion: yea, and, which you will marvell at, if wee may beleeve these words of Eginhardus, they gave unto those Saxons their first Originall, who now inhabite the Dukedome of Saxonic. The nation of the Saxons, saith he, as Antiquities do record, being departed from the English inhabiting Britaine, sailing through the Ocean, partly upon a desire they had, and partly driven of necessity to seek where they might seat themselves, arrived upon the coasts of Germanie, and landed at a place called Haduloba: what time as Theodericus King of the Franks warring upon Hirminfridus Duke of the Thuringers his Daughters husband, cruelly with fire and sword wasted their land. Now when as they had in two pight fields already, tried the doubtfull fortune of barraile, with lamentable slaughter of their people and uncertaine victorie, Theoderich disappointed of his hope to be Master of the field, dispatched Embassadors unto the Saxons, whose Duke was Hadugao: who having heard the cause of their coming, and taken their promise, that upon obtaining victorie they should cohabite together, led forth an armie with them to aide Theodericus. By means of which forces valiantly fighting now with him, as it were, for their libertie and native country, hee overcame his enemies: and when hee spoiled the naturall Inhabitants, killed them up, and in manner left not one alive, their land according to his promise hee set out and appointed for the Conquerours to possesse, who dividing the same by casting lots, seeing many of them were slaine in the wars, and that by reason of their fewnesse the whole country could not be occupied and peopled by them, part of it, that especially which lieth Eastward, they made over to coloners and new Inhabitants, to every one according as by lot it fell out, to be holden and tilled for a certaine rent and tribute: All the rest they themselves possessed. On the Southside verily, these Saxons have the Franks, and a remnant of the Thuringers, whom the precedent whirlwind of hostilitie had not touched, and are divided from them by the channell of the river Uastrote: Northward dwell the Normans, a most fierce Nation: East, from them the Obotrites inhabite: and Westward, the Frisians: from whom continually without intermission they defended their territories and marches thereof, either by Covenants of league or necessary skirmishing. But now returne wee to our English-Saxons.

For a long time the State and Empire of the Saxons flourished exceeding well under the foresaid Heptarchie, untill those Kingdomes bruised and impaired one of another with civill warres, came all in the end to bee subject unto the West-Saxons. For, Egbert King of these West-Saxons, having conquered already foure of these Kingdomes, and swallowed up (as it were) in hope the other twaine also, to the end that they which were subdued, and reduced to the rule of one Prince might bee conjoynd likewise in one name, commanded by an Edict and Proclamation, that the Heptarchie which the Saxons held, should bee called Englelond, that is, England: whereupon in Latine it was named Anglia, taking denomination of the Angles, as beeing of those three nations most in number, and of greatest prowess. For they kept in their possession the Kingdome of Northumberland, and Mercia, very great and large countries, together with East-England: whereas the off-spring of the Jutes held Kent only, and the Isle of Wight: The Saxons East-sex, South-sex, & West-sex, a small parcell verily if it be compared with those spacious territories & lands of the English, of whom, long before this they were generally throughout called English; & in their owne language Englatheod, Anglænne Engl-cynn, and Englisc-mon: albeit every Kingdome therein, had a speciall name of the owne by it selfe. And this appeareth for certaine,

England.

A certaine, as well out of other writers, as Beda, who intituled his Story, The Historie of the English-Nation. Yea, and in that Heptarchie, those Princes that over-ruled the rest, were stiled Gentis Anglorum Reges, that is, Kings of the English nation: At this time, the name of Britaine, lay forgotten and growne quite out of use among the Inhabitants of this Island: remaining only in books, and not taken up in common speech. And hereupon it is, that Boniface the bishop of Mentz, descended frō hence, called this our country, Saxony beyond the Sea. Howbeit, K. Eadred, about the yeare of our Lord, 948, used in some Charters and Patents the name and title of King of Great Britaine: like as Edgar in the yeare, 970. bare this stile also, The Monarch of all whole Albion.

Epist. to Zacharie the Pope.

B Being now called Anglia or England, the state and puissance of these Angles was come to the full height, and therefore, (such is the revolution of all mortall things) hastened apace to their period and end. For, the Danes continually infesting our coasts many yeares together, at the length began to enter, ransacking and mangling this countrie most pittifully.

NAMES OF ENGLISH-SAXONS.

C MY purpose was, even here to have set downe the orderly succession of the English-Saxon Kings, both in the Heptarchie, and also in their Monarchie: but seeing that they seeme not properly to belong unto this place, neither is the bare heaping up of names onely delightfull to the Reader, perhaps it will be more acceptable, if I briefly annexe hereto what I have observed by much reading, and especially in Alfricus our ancient Grammarian, as touching the force, reason, and signification of the ancient English names. Not that my meaning is to interpret every name severally, (for, that were a piece of worke very laborious) neither can such barbarous names, in which there lieth couched great significance, succinct brevity, and some ambiguity, be easily delivered in another tongue. But considering that most of them bee compounded, and that of few simples: I will explaine the said simples, that the significations of the compound, implying all the esse and preface of good lucke, wished-for, and happie fortune, may evidently appeare, and that we may thoroughly perceive, there is among all nations that Orthotes of names, which Plato speaketh of.

Porphyrus de Theolog. Phil.

D AEL, EAL, and AL, in names compounded, like as αλ in Greeke compositions, signifieth, Al, or Wholly. Hereupon Aelwin, is as much, as Wholly, or Fully Victorious. Albert, All, bright and dread, wholly dread or reverend. Alfred, Altogether Pacificall, or peacefull. Whereunto in some sort are correspondent, in Greeke, Pammachius, Pancratius, Pamphilus, &c.

E AELF, which with varietie of Dialect, is pronounced, Vlf, Wolpe, Hulpe, Hilp, vlf, Helfe, and in these daies Helpe, carrieth in it a signification of Helpe or Aide: as for example, Aelfwin, that is, a victorious aide: Aelfwold, a helpfull Governour. Aelfgiva, she that giveth helpe: according to which are these Greeke names, Boetius, Symmachus, Epicurus.

ARD, betokeneth naturall disposition or towardnesse: as Godard, is as much, as Divine towardlinesse or inclination, Reinard, Sincere disposition, Giffard, a franke and liberal nature: Bernard, a filliall and sonne-like affection.

ATHEL, Adel, and Ethel import Noble. Thus Aethelred, that is, Noble in counsell, Aethelard, a noble nature or disposition: Aethelbert, famously Noble: Ethelward, a noble Tutor or Protector.

Aethel, and Ethel.

F BERT, the same that with us at this day, Bright, and in Latin, Illustris, and clarus, Berti, that is, Splendent, and clear: so, Ecbert, that is, Bright and shining for ever: Sigbert, a splendent conquerour: as also, thee whom the Germans named, Bertha, the Greeke called Eudoxia, as Luitprandus witnesseth. And of this sort were Phædrus, Epiphanius, Photius, Lampridius, among the Greekes; Fulgentius and Illustris, &c. among the Latins.

- Bald. BALD, with the people of the North parts, is the same that Audax in Latine, that is, Bold, as Jornandes sheweth: a word, that yet is not growne out of use. So Baldwin, and by inversion Winbald, is the same, that, Bold Victour: Ethelbald, Nobly bold: Eadbald, Happily bold. Unto which are consonant, Thrafcas, Thraffimachus, and Thraffibulus, in Greeke, &c.
- Kin, and Kin. KIN, and KIN, import, Kinsfolke, as Kinulph, an helpe to Kinsfolke: Kinbelm, a Defender of his kin: Kinburg, a defence to kinred: Kinric, powerfull in or to kinfolke.
- Cuth. CUTH, beareth with it a signification of skill and cunning: so, Cuthwin, that is, a skilfull or politicke Conquerour: Cuthred, a learned counsellor: Cuthbert, Notable for his skill: neere unto these found the Greeke names, Sophocles, Sophianus, &c.
- Ead. EAD in the compounds, and Eadig, in simple words, sheweth as much as Happinesse, and Blessednesse. Thus Eadward, is all one with, Happie Saviour, or preserver: Eadulph, Blessed helpe: Eadgar, happie power: Eadwin, Fortunate Conquerour: Of which there is some resemblance, in the Greeke names, Macarius and Eupolemus: in the Latine also, Faustus, Fortunatus, Felicianus, &c.
- Fred. FRED, foundeth all one with peace, for, so our ancestors called Sanctuaries, Fredstole, that is, the seats of peace. Thus Frederic, is as much as Powerable, or wealthy in peace: Winfred, Victorious peace: Reinfred, Sincere peace.
- Gif. GISLE, among the English Saxons betokeneth a pledge or hostage, as Eredgifle, a hostage of peace. Gislebert, a notable or famous pledge: like as in Greeke, Homerus.
- Hild. HOLD, in the old Glossaries, like as Wold also, is interpreted, Governour, or chiefe Lieutenant: although in other places, it signifieth, Love: as Holdlic, Lovely, or Amiable.
- Helm. HELM, is as much as Defence. Thus, Eadhelm, Happie defence: Sighelm, Victorious defence: Berthelm, Notable, or famous defence: even as these Greeke names, Amymtas, Boetius, &c.
- Hare, and Here. HARE, and Heré, as they are diversly pronounced, betokened both an Armie, and also a Lord: so, Harhold, that is, the Ruler of an Armie: Hareman, A Principall or Chiefe man in an Armie: Herebert, Excellent in an armie: Herwin, a Victorious armie, or Conquerour of an Host: not unlike to those Greeke names, Stratocles, Polemarchus, Hegestratus, &c.
- Hild. HILD, in Alfricks Grammar is expounded, Lord, and Lady: thus Hildebert, betokeneth a famous or brave Lord: Mahild, a Virgin Ladie: and in the same sense is Wiga found.
- Leod. LEOD, that is to say, People: thus, Leodgar, is one mightie with the people.
- Leof. LEOF, signifieth, Love: thus, Leofwin, He that winneth love: Leoffan, Most deare or best beloved: like as in Greeke, Agapetus, Erasmus, Erastus, Philo; and in Latine, Amatus, and Amandus.
- Mund. MYND, betokeneth, Peace: whereof our Lawyers terme Mundbreach commeth, that is to say, Breach of peace: so, Eadmund, is Happie peace: Aethelmund, Noble peace: Aelmund, Wholly peaceable, or Make-peace: whereunto are well neere equivalent these names, Irenaus, and Hesychius in Greeke: Lenis, Pacatus, Sedatus, Tranquillus, in Latine.
- Rad, Red, and Rod. RAN, RAR, and ROD, differing in Dialect, imply, Counsell: as Conrad, Powerfull, or skilfull in counsell. Etheldred, a noble Counsellor. Rodbert, notable for counsell: and in sense not unlike to Eubulus, Thraffibulus, in Greeke.
- Ric. RIC, signifieth, Potent, Rich, and Valiant, as Fortunatus in these verses hath taught us:

Hilperice potens, si interpres barbarus adsit,

Adjutor, fortis, hoc quoq; nomen habet:

O Hilpericke so mightie thou, (stood here th' expounder by

Of bar'brous words) an helper strong, eke doth this name imply.

Like as Alfric, Al or wholly powerfull: Aethelric, Nobly valiant, or mighty. Unto which names

- A names these in Greeke allude, Polycrates, Crato, and Plutarchus, Opimius also in Latine. Sig, usually among them, was put for Victorie, whereupon, Sigbert, Renowned Sig, or glorious for victorie; Sigward, a victorious Protectour: Sigard, Victorious to-wardnesse. And to the same sense in manner, Nicocles, Nicomachus, and Nicander with the Greekes: Victor, Victorinus, Vincetius, &c. among the Latines.
- B Stan, was among those old Forefathers of ours, a termination of the Superlative degree, as, Aethelstan, that is, Most noble: Betstan, best: Leofftan, most lief or deare: Wistan, most wise: Dunstan, most high.
- C Wi, the same that Holy, as Wimund, holy or sacred peace: Wibert, Famous, or renowned for holinesse: Alwi, All holy: like as in Greeke, Hierocles, Hieronymus, Hosius, &c.
- D Willi, and Vili, among English Saxons, as Billi at this day, among the Germans carried a signification of Many: as Willhelm, a defender to many: Wildred, Honoured, or reverend of many: Wilfred, Peace to very many. To which in sense and signification accord, Polymachus, Polycrates, Polyphilus, &c.
- E Wold, and Wald, betokened with them a Ruler or Governour: Hence commeth Wold, Bellewold, an excellent Governour: Ethelwold, a noble Ruler: Herwald, and by inversion, Waldher, the Governour or Ruler of an Armie.
- F But lay a straw here, for in a trifling matter, others as well as my selfe, may thinke these notes sufficient, if not superfluous.
- But, of greater moment peradventure it will be, if I here commit to writing (if so be these papers be marked to long life) what we have seene: namely, that as Egbert commanded this hither part of Britaine, and which was his owne possession, to be named England: so now after 800. yeares, or there about, come and gone, even whiles we are perusing this worke, King JAMES invested in the Monarchie of the whole Isle, by the propitious favour and grace of God, in the right of his owne inheritance, and with the generall applause of all good men; to the end that this said Isle, which is one entire thing in it selfe, encircled within one compasse of the Ocean; in his owne person, under one Imperiall Crowne, and Diademe, in one communie of Language, Religion, Lawes, and Judicall processes; to the increase of perpetuall felicitie, and oblivion of old enmitie, should beare also one name: hath in the second yeare of his raigne by an Edict published and proclaimed through his Realmes, assumed the name, title, and stile of KING OF GREAT BRITAINE, in all matters generally, save only in Writs, and formalities of Law Instruments.

The name of Britaine brought into use againe.

THE DANES.

- E What was the beginning of the Danes, the Danes themselves verily know not for certaine. For, the veritie it selfe hath hissed out of the Schoole of Antiquitie, not onely that Giant Danus the sonne of Humblus, but also Goropius (who deriveth it from a Henne.) Andrew Velleius a Dane and a very great scholler, fetcheth their originall from the Dahs, a people of Scythia, and from Marc, a word which should signifie not a limit but a Region: Our country man Ethelward was fully perswaded, that the name arose from the Cite of Donia. For mine owne part, I alwaies thought, that they sprung from the Danciones, (whom Ptolomee placeth in Scandia, and who by change of one letter, in some copies be named Danciones) and from thence voided themselves into the desert and forsaken fear of the English, to wit, into Cimbrica Chersonesus: untill that Jonas Jacobus Venusinus, a most learned man, right judicious, and passing well scene in the studie of Antiquitie, found out by diligent search and inquirie, the very expresse tracts, as it were, and marks of the Danes name, within Sinus Codanus or Codanonia, that is, the Baltish sea, or Oost sea; where Pomponius Mela made mention in this very tract. Which names pronounced somewhat grossly by the Northerne people, Cadan and Cdanonum, Mela forged and fashioned upon the Latine anvill, into Coda-

num and Codanonia: like as the posteritie after him, Gdanum have coined out with a more gentle sound Dansk; of Clodonam, Lodovic, of Cnutus, Cannus. And yet before the daies of Justinian the Emperour, about the yeare of our redemption 570. the world tooke no knowledge of their name. For then, begun they to rove upon the coasts of France and England, and were by the writers, that penned in Latine the histories of England, named Wincingi, for that they practised Piracie: for Wicinga, in the Saxon tongue, as Alfricus witnesseth, doth signifie a Pirat that runneth from creek to creeke: also Pagani, that is, Painims, because as yet they were not become Christians: but the Angles themselves in their language, termed them Deniscan, and of ten times Heathon-man, as one would say, Ethnicks. Of these Danes listen to * Dudo of Saint Quintins, an author of good antiquitie, out of the Librarie of John Stow (that most studious Antiquarie of the Citie of London) which was never shur from me. The Danes swarmed from out of Scanzia, that is, Scandia, like bees out of an hive, in manifold diversitie and barbarous manner, after they had in heat, lascivious lust, and wantonnesse engendred an innumerable of spring. Who after they were growne to ripenesse of yeares falling to hot contention for goods and lands with their fathers, and grand-fathers, yea and often times among themselves; when they once overflowed and grew so populous that they could have no roome sufficient for to inhabite in the place, wherein they presently dwelt: having gathered together by lot a multitude of youth and springals, after a most ancient custome, were thrust out into forraigne Realmes, to conquer unto themselves lands by dint of sword, wherein they might live.

But in the full performance of discharging those that should be thus sent out, and in mustering up their armies, they sacrificed unto Tarx, whom they worshipped in old time as their Lord; for whom they killed not any sheepe, oxen or other cattell, but offered mens blood: Thinking that to be the most precious * holocaust and sacrifice of all others, because when the Priest by casting lots had predestinated who should die, they were all at once deadly smitten upon the head with oxen yokes: and when every one that was chosen by lot had his braines dashed out, at one severall stroke, laid along hee was on the ground, and fought out there was with narrow prying the fibre, that is to say, the veine of the heart on the left side, and having after their manner drawne out the blood thereof and stricken it upon the heads of their friends, speedily they hoise up sailes, and thinking that they please their God with such an act, they immediatly put to Sea, and fall to their ores. Moreover, there is another manner, or rather a most foule and detestable superstition, which the Danes used in pacifying their Gods, and this doth Ditmarus the Bishop, who was of greater antiquitie somewhat than Dudo, in these words describe. But because I have heard strange, and wonderfull things of the ancient Sacrifices that the Danes and Normans used, I will not over passe the same. There is in these parts a place, and the chiefe it is of this kindome, called Lederum, in a province named Selon: where every ninth yeare in the moneth of Januarie, after the time in which we celebrate the * Nativitie of our Lord, they all assemble together, and there they kill and sacrifice unto their Gods ninetie and nine men, and as many horses, with dogs and cocks for the hawks, which the Gods sent them, certainly perswading themselves, as I said before, that by the same they should please them.

About the time of Egbert, in the yeare of Christ, 800. they first landed on our sea-coasts: afterwards with such tumults and hurliburlics as never the like was heard of, having for many yeares made foule havock over all England, razing cities, firing Churches, and wasting countries, they let out the raines loofe to all barbarous cruelty, driving, harrying, spoyling, and turning all upside downe where ever they went. Thus after they had killed the Kings of the Mercians & East-Angles, leazed up their Kingdomes, with a great part of the Kingdome of Northumberland. Then was there a tribute called, Dangels, imposed upon the poore people, for the repressing of their robberies and outrages: and that you may know what manner of imposition this was, I would have you to reade these few lines copied out of our ancient Lawes: The payment of Dangels was at the first ordained for Pirats. For by sore annoying the country, they went on, and did what they could to waste it utterly. And verily to keepe downe their insolencie, it was enacted, that Dangels should yearly be paid, that is, twelve pence out of every every hide of land throughout the whole country: for to hire and wage those that might resist and withstand their invasion. Also, of this Dangelt was every Church freed and quit: as also, all lands that were in the proper * Demises of those Churches, wheresoever they lay, paying nothing at all in such a contribution as this, because they trusted more in the prayers of the Church, than in their defence by force of armes.

But when as now they assaile and set upon * Aelfred King of the West-Saxons, he one while by retiring and giving them ground, otherwhiles by preassing hard upon them with his victorious forces, not only did put them back from his owne country; but also having slaine a Danish-petty-king of the Mercians, expelled them in manner, quite out of all Mercia: and his sonne Edward the elder following in traine of his fathers victories, when he had put the Danes to flight, brought East-England to his subjection: like as Adelstane his base sonne, speedily marching to achieve victories, with great slaughter of the Danes subdued Northumberland, and so terribly pursued the Danes, that they were forced either to depart the realme, or to submit themselves unto him. By the valorous prowess of these Princes, England recovered out of the whirlepit of calamities, and rested from that bloody warre by the space of 50. yeares. But while Etheldred a man of a dull and soft spirit reigned, the Danes taking advantage of his cowardise, strooke up alarme and founded the battaile againe: and having wasted the country, constrained the Englishmen to redeeme their peace yearly with a great sum of monie: and so insolently they bare themselves, that the Englishmen conspired generally together, and in one night murdered all the Danes every mothers sonne of them throughout all England, thinking by the effusion of blood to quench the fire of Danish warre, which brake out neverthelesse into a more pernicious flame. For, Sueno King of the Danes, provoked with this slaughter of his people, invaded England with a puissant armie, and having in a furious and enraged mood made much spoile, he put Etheldred to flight, subdued the whole Kingdome, and left the same unto his sonne Canutus: who having encountered in many cruell and sharpe battailes, and those with variable fortune fought, with Etheldred now returned, and his sonne Edmund surnamed Iron-side, had two of his sonnes succeeded after him, to wit, Harald a bastard, and * Canutus the Hardie: After they were dead, and the Danish yoke shaken off, the Kingdome fell againe unto the English. For, Edward, who in regard of his holinesse was surnamed, The Confessor, the sonne of Etheldred by his second wife, recovered the Crowne and royall Dignitie. Now began England to take breath againe: but soone after, as faith the Poet, Prosperitie perverted manners.

The Priests were idle, drowfie, and unlearned, the people given to riot and loose life: they grew also through rest to be lither, discipline lay, as it were, dead, the commonwealth sick, as one would say, of an infinite sort of vices, lay in consumption and pined away: but pride above all, whose waiting maid is destruction, was come to a mightie head. And as Gervasius * Dorobornensis, of that time speaketh They fell so fast to commit wickednesse, that to be ignorant of any sinfull crimes, was held to be a crime. All which most evidently foreshewed destruction. The Englishmen of those times, as William of Malmesburie writeth, went lightly appoynted with their garments, reaching but to the mid knee, their heads shorne, their beards shaven, but the upper lip uncut, where the mustaches grew continually, wearing massie bracelets of gold about their armes, carrying marks upon their skin: pounced in, of sundry colours: The Clergie contenting themselves, with triviall literature, could scarcely back and bew out the words of the Sacrament.

THE NORMANS.

Like as in ancient times out of that East coast of Germanie (in respect of us) which tendeth Northward, the Franks first, and then the Saxons, grievously annoied both France, Gaule, and Britaine, with their depredations, so that in the end, the one became Lords of Britaine, the other of France: even so in these later daies ensuing, the Danes first, and afterward the Normans succeeding in their place, from out of the same coast did the like. As if it were fatally given unto that tract, by the dispose and providence of Almighty God, to conceive still, and often times to send out of her wombe, nations to afflict France, and Britaine, yea, and to establish new Kingdomes therein.

These Normans were so called of the Northerne quarter or climate from whence they came: for, Normans be nothing else but Men of the North: in which sense also they are named Nordleudi, that is, a Northerne people (for, a mixt nation they were of the most valiant Norwegians, Suedens, and Danes.) In the time of Charles the Great, they practised roving and piracie, in such cruell manner about Frisia, Belgia, England, Ireland, and France, that when the said Charles the Great saw their roving ships in the Mediterranean sea, he shed teares abundantly, and with a grievous deepe sigh said: Heavie I am at the heart that in my life time they durst once come upon this coast: and I foresee what mischief they will worke hereafter to my posteritie: Yea, and in the publique Processions, and Litanies of Churches, this afterwards was added to the rest: From the race of Normans, Good Lord deliver us. They drave the French to that extremitie, that King Charles the * Bald, was forced to give unto Hasting a Norman Arch-pirate, the Earldome of Charters for to assuage the mans furie: King Charles the * Grosle, granted unto Godfrey the Norman a part of * Neustria, with his daughter also in marriage. But afterwards, by force, and armes they seated themselves neere unto the mouth of the river Scin, in a country which before time was corruptly called Neustria, because it had bene a parcell of Westrasia: For, so the writers of the middle time named that which the Germans used to call Westen-riich, that is, the West-kingdome: and doth comprise all that lieth betweene the rivers of Loyre, and Seine: Which tooke the name of Normandie afterwards of them, as it were the region of Northerne men, when King Charles the simple had confirmed it unto their Prince * Rollo, whose Godfather he was at his Baptisme, to bee held in Fee by homage, and withall bestowed upon him his daughter in marriage.

At which time, as we read in an old Manuscript belonging to the Monasterie of Angiers, Charles, surnamed * Stultus, gave Normandie to Rollo, and his daughter Gisla with it: This Rollo daigned not to kisse the foote of Charles, and when his friends about him admonished him to kisse the Kings foote as his homager, for the receipt of so great a benefit, he answered in the English tongue, He te by God, which they interpret thus, NO BY GOD: The King then and his Courtiers deriding him, and corruptly repeating his speech, called him Bigod, whereupon the Normans be at this day called Bigodi. Hence also peradventure it is, that the Frenchmen even still use to call hypocrites, and superstitious folke, Bigod.

This Rollo, who being baptised received therewith the name of Robert, some writers report to have become a Christian but in shew and colour onely; others upon good deliberation and in earnest: and they adde moreover, that hee was warned so to doe by God in a dreame: which I pray you give me leave, (being a man for all this, that doateth not upon dreames) to relate without suspicion of vanitie, from the credit of writers in those daies. The report goeth, that as he failed, he dreamed he saw himselfe foully infected with the leprosie, but when hee was washed once in a most cleare spring at the foot of an high hill, hee recovered, and was cleansed thereof, and anon climbed up to the top of the said hill. This Dreame when he reported, a Christian that was a captive in the same ship with him, interpreted it in this wise: The Leprosie

A Leprosie was the impious worship of Idol gods, wherewith he was tainted; that the spring, betokned the holy * Laver of Regeneration, wherewith being once cleansed, he should ascend * Baptisme up the hill, that is, attaine unto high honor, and heaven is selfe.

This Rollo begat William surnamed * Long-espee, of the long sword which he used to weare: and William begat Richard, the first of that name. Whose sonne, and nephew by his son carrying both his name, succeeded after him in the Duchie of Normandie: but when Richard the third was dead without issue, his brother Robert was Duke in his stead, who of his concubine begat that William, whom wee commonly name The Conquerour, and the Bastard. All these were every one for their noble acts, achieved both at home and abroad, most renowned Princes. Now whiles this William being of ripe yeares, ruled Normandie, Edward the holy, surnamed CONFESSOR, King of England, and the last of the Saxons line, departed out of this world unto his heavenly country, to the great misse and losse of his people, who being the sonne of Ladie Emma cosen to William, and daughter to Richard, the first of that name, Duke of Normandie, whiles hee remained in Normandie banished, had promised unto him, that he should succeed after him in the Crowne of England. But Harold the sonne of Godwin, and Great Master or Steward of King Edwards house, usurped the Kingdome: whom to dispossesse, his brother * Tost of one side, and the Normans of the other, did what they could, and left no stone unturned: But when he in a pitched field had, neere unto Stamford-bridg in Yorkshire, slaine his brother Tost and Harold King of Norway, whom Tost had drawn to take part with him in this war, and so obtained a bloody victorie, behold, within nine daies after the said William surnamed the Bastard, Duke of Normandie, taking hold of the promises of King Edward late deceased, and presuming of his adoption and neere alliance, having levied a great armie, arrived in England among the South-Saxons. Against whom Harold forthwith advanced, albeit his souldiers were sore wearied, and his power by the former battaile much empaired. And not farre from Hastings they encounter and joyned battaile: where Harold engaging himselfe into the midst of the medley, and fighting manfully lost his life with a great number of Englishmen left slaine in the place: but how many they were just, hard it is exactly to conceive and faithfully to put downe. William thus a Conquerour presently with banner displayed marched about in order of battaile by Wallingford to London: where being received, he was solemnly inaugurated King, as unto whom, by his owne saying, The Kingdome was by Gods providence appointed, and by vertue of a gift from his Lord and Cosen King Edward the Glorious, granted: and after some few lines the story runneth on and saith, that the most beauteous King Edward had by adoption ordained him his heire in the Kingdome of England. And if we list to believe the Historie of Saint Stephens in Caen of Normandie, at his last breath he uttered these words: The Regall Diadem which none of all my predecessours ever wore, I got and gained by the grace of God only, and no right of inheritance. And a little after: I ordaine no man heire of the Kingdome of England, but I commend the same to the eternall Creator, whose I am, and in whose hands are all things. For I became not possessed of so great honour by any hereditary right, but by a terrible conflict, and with much effusion of blood I tooke it from that perjured King Harold, and after I had either slaine or put to flight his favourers, and adherents, I subdued it under my Dominion.

D But why doe I so briefly run over this so great alteration of the English state? Have therefore, if you thinke not much to read it, what my selfe with no curious pen, (haply with as little studie and premeditation, howbeit according to the truth of the Historie) wrote, when being but young, not well advised nor of sufficiency to undergoe so great a burthen, I purposed to set forth our Historie in the Latine tongue.

by a sonne onely of all the issue male of the Saxons line remained alive, unto whom by right of inheritance the kingdome was due. But considering he was thought by reason of his tender yeares, not meete to mannage the State, and had beside intermingled his naturall disposition with forraign manners, as being borne in * Pannonia, and the sonne of Agathra daughter to the Emperour Henrie the third, who was in so remote a countrie farther off, than that he could conveniently assist the young Gentleman either with aid or counsell: in these regards hee was lesse affected of the Englishmen, who desired nothing more than to have a King, (as it were) out of their owne bodie: And therefore, all of them for the most part had their eyes fixed with much respect upon Harold Goodwins sonne, a man for his good parts as well in warre as peace very glorious. For albeit he was of noble parentage but by one side: and his father for his treacherie and treason, as also for pilling and polling had incurred everlasting infamie and shame, yet with his courteous affabilitie, gentill deportment, liberalitie, and warlike promesse he wound himselfe into exceeding great speciall favour with the people. For, there could not another bee set by him, in whom there was more resolute hardinesse to adventure upon danger, or more advised policie in the midst of dangers. His valour also and fortitude shined out so apparantly in the Welsh warres, which heretofore most happily hee had brought to an end, that he was reputed verily a man passing well furnished with all vertues required in a soveraigne Commander, and even borne to repaire the decayed state of England. Moreover, good hope there was that the Danes (who onely terrified this country) would bee the better contented and pleased with him, because he was the son of Githa, daughter to Sueno King of Denmarke. And in case there should arise any other power against him, either forraigne or domesticall, he was thought sufficiently enabled to make his part good, with the affectionate hearts of the common people, with the alliance also and affinity that hee had among the Nobility. For hee had to wife, the sister of Morcar and Edwin two brethren, men of exceeding great puissance: and Edric surnamed the Wild, a man of high spirit, and in chiefe authority was linked to him in the neereft bond of Affinitie: besides it fell out very well for him, that at one and the selfe same time, Sueno King of the Danes had his hands full of warre with Sweden; and betwene William Duke of Normandy, and Philip the French King, there fell some dislikes and emulation, for that Edward the Confessor during his exile in Normandie, had in expresse termes promised unto William of Normandie the Kingdome, if hee died without issue: For the performance of which promise, Harold became as it were, surety, and bound himselfe with an oath, (what time hee was detained prisoner in Normandie) but with this condition annexed, that he might espouse the daughter of the said William of Normandie. Whereupon most men thought it the wisest policy to set the Crowne upon William his head; to the end that by performing oath, and promise, the warre that they foresaw now threatened, and destruction (which alwaies waiteth as a due punishment upon perjurie) might be averted, and withall by laying Normandie to England, the Kingdome under so mightie a Prince might be surely established, and the common-wealth very much advanced. But Harold quickly preventing all consultations whatsoever; thinking it not good for him to linger and delay any whit: that very day on which King Edward was entered, contrary to the expectation of most men, entred upon the soveraigne government, and with the applause onely of such as were then present about him, who with acclamations saluted him King, without the due complements and solemnities of Coronation, set the Imperial Diadem upon his owne head. By which act of his, as being a breach of ancient ordinance, he exceedingly provoked and stirred up against him, the whole Clergie and Ecclesiasticall state. But he knowing well enough, how hard it was for a new Prince, and an usurper, to maintaine his royall place and dignitie without an opinion of pietie and vertue, for to blot out that his offence given, and to establish his Scepter, did all he possibly could for the promoting of religion, and preferment of Churchmen, and to beautifie and adorne Monasteries and religious houses: Edgar Aetheling Earle of Oxford, and all the nobles he entertained with all love and favour: the people he eased of their tributes: he gave bountifully a great largesse of money to poore people: and in one word, with faire speech and affable language, with mild bearing of causes, and equitie in deciding the same, he wonn to himselfe singular love, and no lesse authority and reputation. So soone as William Duke of Normandie was truly advertised of these newes, he seemed to take the death of King Edward very heavily, whiles in the meane time, time, he was vexed at the heart that England which hee had in conceit and hope already swallowed and devoured, was thus caught away out of his very chawes. Forthwith therefore, by advice of his counsell and friends, he dispatcheth Embassadors to Harold, with instructions to put him in mind of the promises and stipulation past; but withall, in his name to make claime to the Crowne. Harold, after some pause and deliberation upon the point, returneth this answer: As touching the promises of King Edward, William was to understand, that the Realme of England could not be given by promise, neither ought he to bee tied unto the said promise, seeing the kingdome was fallen unto him by election and not by right of Inheritance. And as for his owne stipulation, extorted and wrang it was from him, then a prisoner, by force and by guile, in feare of perpetuall imprisonment, to the hinderance of the English common-wealth and prejudice of the State, and therefore void: which neither ought hee, if he could, nor might if he would, make good, since it was done without the Kings privitie and consent of the people. And a very hard and unreasonable demand it was of his, that hee should renounce and surrender unto a Norman Prince, a meere stranger and of forreign linage, that kingdome wherein hee was invested with so great assent of all sorts. With this answer William was not well pleased, and he thought that Harold thereby sought starting holes for to hide his perjurie. Others therefore he sent out of hand in Embassage about the same matter, who should admonish him, how religiously hee had bound himselfe by oath, and that forsworne persons should be sure of final perdition at Gods hands, and reproachfull shame among men. But when as now the daughter of William affianced unto Harold in the covenant, (the very strength and knot of the foresaid stipulation) was by Gods appointment taken away by death, the Embassadors were with lesse courtesie entertained, and received none other answer than before. So that now by this time, there was nothing like to follow but open warre. Harold rigged and prepareth his navie, musters and presseth souldiers and placeth strong garisons along the sea coasts in convenient places, and provideth all things in readinesse which were thought needefull and meet for to bear backe the Normans forces: Howbeit, the first tempest of warre, beside the expectation of all men, arose from Tofto the brother in whole blood of Harold. He being a man of a proud, hauntie and fell heart, ruled in great authority a good while over Northumberland, but growing outrageous in cruelty to his inferiors, in pride towards his Sovereigne, and in hatred to his brethren, was outlawed by Edward the Confessor, and so withdrewd himselfe into France, and now, by the advice of Baldwin Earle of Flanders, and perswasion of William Duke of Normandie, as it seemeth probable, (For Tofto and William married two daughters of Baldwin Earle of Flanders) began to trouble his brother with open warre, whom a long time hee deadly hated. From Flanders hee tooke sea with a flect of 60. rovers-ships, wasteth the Isle of Wight, and annoyeth the sea-coast of Kent: but terrified at the coming of the Kings navie, hee set up saile and directing his course toward the more remote parts of England, landeth in Lincolneshire, and there harried the Countrey: where Edwin and Morcar give him battell: but being discomfited and put to flight, into Scotland hee goes, from thence to renew his forces and so to warre afresh. Now were all mens minds held in suspense with the expectation of a twofold warre, of the one side out of Scotland, of the other out of Normandie: and so much the more because at the feast of Easter, there was seeme about a sevennight together a blazing starre of an hideous and fearefull forme, which turned mens minds already troubled and perplexed: (as it falleth out in a turbulent time) to the foreseeing of some unluckie events. But Harold carried an heedfull eye to all parts of his kingdome, and the south coast hee fortified with garisons. Lesse feare hee had from Scotland and Tofto, because * Malcolm King of the Scots was more disquieted with civill dissensions. Meane while, William much busied in his mind about England, casting about what course to take, ever and anon communicated with his Captaine about the point; whom hee saw cheerefull, and full of forward hopes: But, altho the difficulty was how to make money, for defraying the charges of so great a warre. For, when in a publike assembly of all the states of Normandie, it was propounded as nothing of substance, answer was made, That in the former warre against the French, their wealth was so much impaired, that if a new warre should come upon them, they were hardly able to hold and defend their owne: That they were to looke rather unto the defence of their proper possessions; than to invade the territories of others: and this warre intended, just though though it were, yet seemed it not so necessary, but exceeding dangerous: beside, the Normans were not by their allegiance bound to military service in forain parts. Neither could they by any means be brought to grant a levie of money, although William Fitzosbern, a man in high favour with the Duke and as gracious among the people, endeavoured what he could to effect it: yea, and to drawe others by his owne example, promised to set out fortie tall ships of his owne proper charges towards this warre. Duke William then, seeing he could not bring this about in a publike meeting, goeth another way to worke. The wealthiest men that were he sendeth forth, severally one by one to repaire unto him: he speaks them faire, and requireth them to contribute somewhat toward this warre. They then, as if they had strived avie who should helpe their Prince most, promise largely: and when that which they promised was presently registred in a booke, there was a huge masse of money quickly raised, and more than men would ever have thought. These matters thus dispatched, he craveth aid and helpe of the Princes his neighbours, to wit, the Earles of * Anjou, * Poictou, * Maine and * Bulloigne, and unto them he promisseth faire Lands and possessions in England. Philip also the French King he goeth unto, and solliciteth: voluntarily promising in case he aided him, to become his vassall and leege man, and for England to take the oath of fealitie unto him. But it being thought nothing good for the state of France, that the Duke of Normandie, who already was not so pliable and obedient to the French King as he ought, should be bettered in his state by the addition of England (for, the power of neighbour potentates is alwaies suspected of Princes) so far was the King from yielding any helpe, that he dissuaded him rather from invading England. But by no means could the Duke be reclaimed from his enterpryse, nay much more encouraged he was now and set on, being once backed with warrant from Alexander the Bishop of Rome (for even now began the Pope to usurpe authority over Princes:) who allowing of his cause and quarrell, had sent unto him a sacred and hallowed banner as a luckie fore-token of gaining both the victorie, and Kingdome: yea, and with all cursed whosoever should oppose themselves against him. He assembled therefore all the forces he could possibly raise, and gathered together a mighty navie before the Towne of Saint Valeris, which standeth upon the mouth of the river Some, where he lay a long time windbound: For the procurement whereof with many a vow he importuned Saint Valeric the patron-Saint of the Towne, and heaped upon him a number of gifts and oblations. Harold, who with his forces had waited very long in vaine for his comming, determined to dissolve his armie, to withdraw his navie, and to leave the sea-coast: both for that he was compelled thereto for want of provision, as also because the Earle of Flanders had written unto him, that William would not stirre that yeere: whom he soone beleeveth as thinking that the time of the yeere was such as had locked up the seas and barred all navigation, forasmuch as the [autumnall] * Equinox was neere: While he thus deviseth with himselfe, driven he was (upon an unexpected necessity of new warre) to call backe his armie: for, Harold surnamed the * Hard and Harfager, king of Norway, who had practised piracie in the North parts of Britaine, and already subdued the Isles of Orkney, being by Tostig solicited and called forth in hope of the Kingdome of England, arrived within the mouth of the river Tine with a fleet of 500. shibotes or thereabout, where Tostig also came and joined his owne fleet. When they had a good while forraged and spoiled the countrey heere, they weighed anchor, and sailing along the coast of Yorkshyre, put into Humber, and there began to commit outrages with all manner of hostilitie. For the repressing of whom, the two Earles, Edwin and Morcar led forth a power of soldiers, whom they had raised suddainly and in tumultuary haste: but they not able to abide the violent charge of the Norwegians, fled for the most part as fast as they could, and together with the Earles made shift to escape: howbeit, many of them passing over the river Ouse, were swallowed up with the waves thereof. The Norwegians then, goe in hand to lay siege unto the Citie of Yorke, which straight waite they get by surrender, hostages being given on both sides. But after some few dayes, King Harold having gathered his whole power from all parts together, speedeth him to Yorke, and from thence marcheth against the Norwegians, who lay encamped strongly in a most safe place: for backed they were with the Ocean, flanked on the left hand with Humber, wherein their fleet rid as anchor, and had for their defence on the right side and afront, the river Derwent. Howbeit King Harold courageously setteth upon them: where first, there

A was a cruell conflict at the Bridge, standing over the river Darwent, which one Norwegian souldier, by report, made good for a time against the whole armie of the Englishmen, and held out so long untill he was shot through with a dart, and died: after this continued the battell a good while within the very campe, fought with equall valour, and indifferent fortune on both sides: But in the end, the Norwegians were disarayred and scattered, and in the midst of the battell Harold himselfe King of the Norwegians, and Tostig, with the greater part of the Armie lost their lives. Upon this Victorie, there fell unto King Harold an exceeding rich bootie, a great masse both of gold and silver, and that huge Armado, except twentie small Barques onely, which he granted unto Paul Earle of Orkney and O-lave the Sonne of Harold who was slaine, for to carry away those that were hurt, taking their oath first, that from thence forward they should not attempt any hostilitie against England. This happie victorie encouraged Harold and set him aloft: Now, he thought that he should bee a terrour, yea, to the Normans, howsoever hee grew odious unto his owne people, because hee had not divided the spoile among his souldiers. Howbeit, wholly hee employed himselfe to reforme the disordered state of the countrey, which in this part was piteously out of frame and lay neglected. Meane while, William Duke of Normandie, finding a fit season for his purpose, about the end of September weighed anchor and launched forth: then with a gentle gale of winde, he sailed with all his shipping, and arrived at Pevensey in Suffex, where being landed upon the naked shore, for to cut off all hope of return from his men, he did set fire on his ships: and having erected a fortresse there, for his men to retire thither in safetie, forward he marcheth to Hastings, where also he raised another strong hold, and placed therein a garrison. Now by this time, he maketh proclamation, declaring the causes of this warre: namely, to revenge the death of Alfred his Cousin, whom together with many Normans Godwin the Father of Harold had murdered: Item, to bee avenged of the wrongs that Harold had done, who when he had banished Robert Archbishop of Canterburie, even then by intrusion entred upon the Kingdome of England now pertaining to him, (treading under foot the religious respect of his oath.) Howbeit, by an Edict he straightly charged his souldiers not in hostile manner to spoile the English men. Newes hereof in all hast was brought to King Harold, who by all means thinking it good to use prevention, and as speedily as might be to encounter the Duke, sendeth out his messengers every way, calleth earnestly upon his subjects to continue in their faithfull allegiance, assembleth all his forces in every place, and with great journeyes hasteneth to London: where there presented himselfe unto him an Embassadour from Duke William; but as he made many words in claiming the Kingdom, Harold in a furious fit of anger and indignation, went within a litle of laying violent hands upon the very person of the Embassadour. For a hard matter it was to bereave a fresh Victorie of his pride and confident hope. Forthwith he dispatched his Embassadours also unto William, by way of insolent termes to menace him, unlesse with all speed he retired backe into Normandie. Yet William gave him a gentle answer, and dismissed them with great courtesie.

E Meane time, Harold mustreth up souldiers in London, and findeth that by the former battell against the Norwegians, his forces were very much diminished: yet a mightie armie hee levied of Nobles, Gentlemen, and others, whom the love of their native countrey had raised and brought into the field, for to put backe & repell the common danger. Presently he leadeh forth into Southsex, not withstanding his mother (though in vaine) did what she could to stay him: and with an undaunted heart, encamping upon a faine plaine, scarce seven miles from Duke William, sat him downe. And thither also immediately the Norman approached with his Armie. First there were secretly sent out on both sides Espies: and they of the English part, either not knowing the truth, or disposed to lie, made incredible report of the Normans number, their furniture and provision, of their good order also and discipline, inasmuch as Gyth, a younger brother of King Harold, a man renowned for martiall exploits, thinking it no good policy to hazard all in the trial of one battell, advertised the King, that the events of war were doubtful, that victories oftener depend of fortune than of valour, & that holding off, and deliberate delay, was the chiefe point of militarie discipline: Also, he advised him, that in case he had made promise unto William of the Kingdom, he should for his owne person withdraw himself: for, surely he could not with all his forces be fenced against his conscience, and God no doubt, would require punishment for breach of faith & promise: neither, faith he, wil any thing strike greater greater terror into the Normans, than if he should be levying and enrolling of a new Armie, whereby they might be received eftsoones with fresh battels. Furthermore, he assured him in his owne behalfe, that if he would commit the fortune of that battell into his hands, hee would not faile to performe the part of a good brother, and a valiant Capitaine: as who truiting upon the clearenesse of his heart, and a good conscience, might either more easily defeat his enemies, or else more happily spend his life for his country. The King was not well content to heare these admonitions and counsels which seemed to send unto his dishonour: for, as he could willingly abide the event and issue of warre, so in no wise could he endure the reproach of fearefull cowardise. And therefore, the praises of the Normans with bad words he depraved, neither thought he that it would stand with his owne dignitie, or the reputation of his former prowesse, being now come as it were to the utmost point of perill and hazard, like a milke-sop and dastard, to draw foot backe, and incurre the perpetuall staine and blot of shame. Thus, whom it pleased Almighty God to overthrow, hee first maketh them incapable of good counsell. Whiles these matters thus passed between them, Duke William upon a pious affection to preserve & maintaine the state of Christendome, and to spare the effusion of Christian blood, sendeth a Monke as a mediator between both, who proposed this offer & condition unto Harold, Either wholly to resigne up his Kingdom, or to acknowledge from thence forth, that he holdeth it of the Norman Duke as his superiour Lord, or else to decide the quarrell with William by combat, or at leastwise to stand to the judgment of the Pope of Rome, touching the Kingdom of England. But he as one having no rule of himselfe, and accepting of no condition whatsoever, referred the whole triall of the matter to the tribunall seat of God, & made answer, that the very next day following, which was the second* before the Ides of October, he would bid him battell: and this day upon a credulous error, he had assured himselfe would be fortunate unto him, because it was his birth day. All the night ensuing the Englishmen spent in licentious revels, in riotous excesse of banqueting, and in clamorous noises: But the Normans bestowed the same in prayers and vows for the safetie of the armie, and for victorie. The next morning by day light they embattell themselves on both sides: Harold placed in the vantage-guard, the Kentish men with their billes* and halberds, (for by an old custome the front of the battell was due to them:) and in the rereguard himselfe took place with his brother, and those of middle England with the Londoners. Of the Normans vaward Roger of Montgomery, and William Fitz osborne had the leading: the same consisted of horsemen out of Anjou, Perch, and little Britaine, the most part of whom served under Fergerius the Briton. The maine battell which stood of Poitouvins & Germans, Geoffrey Maitell, and a German Pensioner commanded. In the rereguard was the Duke himselfe with the whole manhood of Normans, and the flower of his Nobilitie and Gentrie. But in every place, were intermingled with the rest certaine companies of Archers. The Normans having with no confused nor untunable shout, sounded the battell, and advanced forward with their Battalions, & at the first encounter did let flie lustily on every side a volley of arrowes like haile, a kind of fight, which as it was strange to the Englishmen, so it terrified the exceedingly for, they flew so thicke, that they thought they had their enemies even in the midst of themselves. Then with a violent charge, they assaile the vaward of the English: and they for their parts, who resolutely had determined to cover the place which they had taken up with their bodies, rather than to give one foot of ground, bending all their forces, and keeping themselves close together right valiantly put the enemies backe, and slew a number of them: the Normans reinforced themselves againe upon them, and with an horrible noise, the battels of both sides gave the stroke. And now by this time were they come to the medley, wherein as if foot to foot, & man to man, they had coped together, there was for a good while a fierce & cruel fight: The Englishmen standing thick & close, as if they had stuck one to another, abid the brunt & charge of the enemies with constant resolution, inasmuch as after many a bloody wound received, they were now as the point to have reculed, had not William performing the part of a leader as well as of a souldier, with his authoritie restrained them. Thus the fight continuing still, the Norman horsemen brake in upon them, and withall from above, the arrowes flew so thicke about the English mens eares, that they were in manner overwhelmed with them: yet for all that, they kept their array unbroken. For, Harold neglecting no dutie of a valorous Capitaine, was ready in person every where: and William againe for his part bare himselfe as worthily, who having one or two horses stabbed and slaine under him, seeing that he could not

A by fine force, and true valour indeed get the upperhand, betooke himselfe to stratagems: commanding his men to sound the retreat, and keeping them still in good order and array, to give ground and retire. The English men supposing now, that they turned backe and fled, and that themselves had the victorie in their hands, display their ranks, and being thus distracted, presse hard upo their enemies, as making full account that the day was now sure enough theirs. Whereas the Normans casting themselves suddenly againe into array, and winding about, charge the English afresh, and thus setting upon them being scattered, and out of order, encloseth them round about, and made an exceeding great slaughter of them. Many of them whiles they stood doubtfull, whether to fight or to flie, were borne downe and slaine: but more of them having recovered an higher ground, casting themselves round into a ring, and comforted with the exhortation one of another, with good resolution, turned head and resisted a long time, as if they had made choice of that place for an honorable death: until that Harold being shot through the head with an arrow, together with his two brethren, Gyth, & Leofwin, lost his life. Then Edwin and Morcar with some others that remained alive, and escaped by flight, yielded to the hand of God, and gave place unto the time, considering that the battell had continued without intermission from seven of the clock in the morning unto the evening twilight. There were in this battell missed of Normans much about 6000. but of English many more by far. William now Conqueror, rejoiced exceedingly, & by way of a solemne supplication or procession, which he appointed, gave all honor to the Almighty and most gracious God: and when he had erected his pavilion in the midst of the bodies lying slain by heapes, there he passed that night. The morrow after, when he had buried his owne men, & granted leave unto the English men to do the like, himselfe returned to Hastings, partly to consult about following the traine of his victorie, and in part to refresh awhile his wearied souldiers. No sooner was the newes of this grievous overthrow by fearfull messengers brought to London, and to other cities of England, but the whole land generally was stricken into dumps, and as it were astonished. Githa the Kings mother, like a woman gave her selfe to plaints and lamentations, so, as that she would admit no consolation, but with most humble prayers intreated the Conqueror, for the dead bodies of her sonnes. And those she entereth in the Abbey of Waltham. Edwin sendeth Queen Alghitha his sister into the farther parts of the Kingdom: But the Lords and Peeres of the Realme, will the people not to cast downe their hearts, but lay their heads together about the State and Common wealth. The Archbishop of Yorke, the Citizens of London, and the Sea souldiers, whom they called Boten capten, gave their advice to consecrate Edgar King, and to begin warre againe with William: Edwin and Morcar plotted secretly to usurp the Imperiall rule and dignitie for themselves: but the Bishops, Prelates, and others, who were terrified with the flashing thunderbolts of the Popes curse, thought best to yield, and not by doubtfull battell to provoke the Conquerors heavie indignation against them: nor to strive against God, who now for the sinnet of the people calling for vengeance, had delivered England, as it were into the hands of the Norman. William all this while fortifying the Towne of Hastings, purposed to march directly with his armie in warlike manner to London: but because he would raise the greater terror abroad, and make all sure behinde, having divided his forces, he ranged over part of Kent, over Southsex, Suthrey, Southampton shire, and Berk shire, streich villages, and upland houses, driveth booties, at Wallingford hee passeth over the Thames, and terrifieth all the countrey as hee goeth. Yet for all this, the Nobles and Peeres wist not what counsell to take, neither could they be brought, to lay downe private grudges, and enmities, and with one heart to consult in common for the good of the state: The Prelates, to be absolved from curses of the Church, and censures of the Bishop of Rome, (whereby he now exercised his authoritie, not only over mens soules, but also over Kingdomes) seeing that the state of the Realme was now not decayed, but quite ruinate and past recovery, persisted in this mind to submit, in so much as many seeking to save themselves, secretly departed out of the Citie. But Alfred Archbishop of Yorke, Wolfstan Bishop of Worcester, and other Prelates, together with Eadgar Atheling, Edwin and Morcar, at Berkhamsted doe meete the Norman Conqueror, (who made them many and large promises:) and having given hostages, committed themselves to his protection, and submitted. Then forthwith speedeth he to London, where being received with great and joyfull acclamations, he was saluted King: for the solemnizing of his Coronation, which he appointed should been Christmas day, he made all the preparation that might bee, and meane while bent his whole mind, and all his thoughts to the sealing of the State.

Now was the period and revolution of the English-Saxons Empire in Britaine come about, which was determined within the compasse of 607. yeeres, and a notable alteration and change made in the Kingdome of England: which some lay upon the base avarice of the Magistrates, and the superstitious lazinesse of the Prelates: others impute to that Comet or blazing Starre, and the powerable influence of celestially bodies: some againe made God the Author thereof, who in his secret judgements, and those never unjust, disposeth of Kingdomes. Others also there were, who looked into neerer secondarie causes, and they found a great want and lacke of wisdom in King Edward, in that whiles under a goodly shew and pretext of religious and vowed virginittie, he casting off all care of having issue, exposed the Kingdome for a prey to ambitious humours.

Vhat an insolent and bloudie victorie this was, the Monks that write of it, have declamed with full mouth: neither is it to be doubted, but in this Victorie, (as it hapneth in other) wickednes tooke head and bare the full sway. William the Conquerour, in token as it were of a Trophie for this conquest, abrogated some part of the ancient positive lawes of England, brought in some Customes of Normandie. and by vertue of a decree, commanded, That all causes should be pleaded in the French tongue. The English hee thrust out of their ancient Inheritances, assigned their lands and Lord-ships to his souldiers, yet with this reservation to himself, that he should still remaine chiefe Lord and bind them to doe due service and homage unto him and his successors, that is to say, That all of them should hold their lands in Fee or fealty. He caused also a Seale for himselfe to be made of purpose, with this inscription upon the one side:

Hoc Normannorum Guilielmum nosse Patronum,

The Normans Patron William know, by this stamp that you see:
And on the other:

Hoc Anglis signo Regem fatearis eundem:

By this, a King to Englishmen, acknowledge him to be.

Moreover, as William of Malmesburie doth report, in imitation of Casars policy, who expelled the Germans, (lying hidden within that huge Forrest Ardenna, and by many a salie from thence annoying his armie) not by the helpe of his owne Romans, but by the Gaules his confederates: to this end, that whiles strangers and aliens killed one another, himselfe might triumph with their bloud-shed: the very same course, I say, did William take with the Englishmen. For, against certaine of them, who upon the first battell of that unfortunate man Harold were fled into Denmarke and Ireland, and returned with a puissant armie in the third yeere after, he opposed meeke English forces and an English generall, permitting the Normans to sit still and keepe holiday: foreseeing hereby and providing for his owne great easement, whether of them soever should have the better. Neither was he in this point frustrate of his purpose. For, the English, having thus a prettie while skuffeled and skirmished one with another, in the end rendred up the entire Victorie to the King, without his paines taking. And in another place: Having undermined and quite overthrowne the power of the Laimen, he provided by a sure and irrevocable edict, to suffer no Monke or Clerke of the English Nation, to endeavour for to get any dignitie; much disagreeing herein from the clemencie and gentlenesse of King Cnuto in times past, who gave unto those that he conquered, all their honours entire. And hence it came to passe, that when hee was once dead, the naturall Inhabitants of the countrey upon light occasions fell to driving out of strangers, and recovered unto themselves their ancient right and freedome.

When he had brought this to passe, above all things hee laboured to turne away the storme of the Danish wars, that hung over his head, and to purchase peace, though it were with round sums of mony. Wherein he used Adelbert Archbishop of Hamburgh as his Instrument. For, Adam Bremenfis writeth thus: Betweene Suen and the Bayard there was continuall strife about England, although our Bishop being greased in the hand with Williams bribes, would have concluded a firme peace betweene the

Kings

A Kings. Which may seeme also to have beene established: for, since that time, England was never any whit afraid of the Danes. And William verily betooke himselfe wholly to the defence and maintenance of his Imperiall dignitie, and to governe the state by excellent lawes. For, as Gervase of Tilburie writeth; When the renowned Conqueror of England King William, had subdued the farther coasts of this Island, under his dominion, and thoroughly tamed the stomachs and hearts of rebels by terrible examples, lest that from thenceforth they should licentiously run into error and commit trespasse, he determined to reduce his subjects under the obedience of positive, and written Lawes. Having therefore all the lawes of England laid before him, according to the Tripartite Division, whereby they were distinguished, that is to say, Merchenlag, Denelag, and Westsex-enlag, when hee had rejected some of them, and allowed of others, he adjoynd thereto those Lawes of * Neustria beyond the seas, which seemed most effectfull to preserve the peace of his Kingdome. Afterwards, as mine Author Ingulphus saith, who flourished in those daies, He commanded every Inhabitant of England to doe him homage, and to sweare fealtie to him against all men: He tooke the survey and description of the whole Land, neither was there an Hide of England ibrough, but he knew both the value, and the owner thereof; there was neither plash nor place, but set it was in the Kings Roll: and the rent, revenue, and profit thereof, the very tenure of possession, and possessor himselfe was made knowne to the King, according to the credit and true relation of certaine Taxers, who being chosen out of every country, did put downe in writing the territorie properly belonging thereto. And this Roll was called, the C Roll of Winchester, and by the Englishmen (for the generalitie thereof, because it contained fully and exactly, all the tenements of the whole Land) named, Domesday. I have beene more willing to make mention of this booke, because it is to be cited & alleaged often times hereafter: which booke also, it pleaseth me to name, Guilielmi librum Censuales, that is, The Tax-booke of William: Anglia Notitia, that is, The Notice of England: Anglia commentarios Censuales, that is, The Taxe Register, or Seising booke of England: and Anglia Lustrum, that is, the Survey of England.

But whereas Polydore Virgill writeth, how William that Conqueror, first brought in the Trial or Iudgement of * twelve men, there is nothing more untrue. For, most certaine it is, and apparant by the lawes of Etheldred, that it was in use many D yeares before. Neither hath he any cause to terme it a terrible Iudgement. For these 12. free-borne and lawfull men, are duely by order empannelled, and called forth of the Neighbourhood; these are bound by oath to pronounce and, deliver up their Verdict, * de facto: they heare the counsell pleading in courts on both sides before the Bench, or Tribunal, and the disposition of witnesses: then saking with them the evidences of both parties, they are shut up together; and kept from meate, drinke, and fire, (unlesse haply some one of them be in danger of death thereby) so long untill, they be all agreed of the fact: which when they have pronounced before the Judge, hee, according to right and law giveth his definitive sentence. For, this manner of triall our most sage and wise Ancestours have thought the best to finde out the truth, to avoid corruption, and cut off all partialitie and affections.

* A Jurie of twelve.
* As touching the fact.

Now, as touching martiall prowess, how much the Normans excelled therein, let others tell: this may suffice for me to have said thus much, that being planted among most warlike nations, they alwaies saved themselves, not by obsequious baseness, but by force of armes, and founded most noble Kingdomes in England, and Sicilie. For Tancrede, nephew unto Richard the second of that name, Duke of Normandie, and his posteritie, atchieved brave exploits in Italie, and having compelled the Sarazens to flie out of Sicilie, erected a Kingdome there. Whereupon the Sicilian Historiographer doth freely acknowledge, that the Sicilians are beholden unto the Normans, for that themselves remaine still in their native saile, live in freedome, and continue Christians. Likewise in the holy Land their martiall prowesse hath been seen with singular commendation. Hence it is also, that Roger Hoveden writeth in these termes; Bold France having made triall once of the Normans warlike, durst not peepe out: Fierce England being conquered, yielded as captive unto them: Rich Apulia falling to the lot of their possession flourished a fresh: Famous Jerusalem, and renowned Antioch were both

subdued by them. And ever since their comming, England as well for martiall honour as civill behaviour, hath among the most flourishing Kingdomes of Christendome flourished with the best. In so much, as Englishmen were picked forth to guard the person of the Emperours of Constantinople. For, John the son of Alexius Comnenus, (as our writer of Malmesburie reporteth) having their fidelitie in great esteeme, applied himselfe especially to their familiaritie, commending their love unto his son after him: and a long time since, they were the Yeomen of the said Emperours guard, called by Nicetes Choniata, Inglini Bipenniferi, that is, English Halberdiers or Bill men, and by Cuiropalata, Barangi. These attended upon the Emperour in every place, carrying Polaxes or Halberds upon their shoulders: which they tooke up, and held upright whensoever the Emperour shewed himselfe from out his Closet, and knocking then their Halberds one against another to make a clattering noise, they in the English tongue, praised for his long life. As for that blot wherewith Chalcondilas hath besmirted our nation, for having wives in common, the truth it selfe washeth it cleane away, and represseth the overlasting vanitie of the Grecian. For, as faith that most learned man, and my singular good friend Ortelius in this very matter, those things be not alwaies true, which by every one are given out of all whatsoever. Well, these are the nations that seated themselves in Britaine, whereof remaine the Britans, Saxons, or English men, and Normans intermingled with them: the Scots also in the North: whereupon came the two Kingdomes in this Island, to wit, England and Scotland, long time divided, but most happily now in the most mightie Prince King James, under one Imperiall Diademe conjoynd and united.

Touching the Flemings, which flocked hither foure hundred yeares since, and by permission of the Kings, received a place in Wales to inhabit, it is not requisite to speake of them now, elsewhere I will treat of that matter. But let us conclude this argument with Seneca. By these, it is manifest that nothing hath continued in the same place, wherein it had the first beginning. There is a daily stirring and moving to and fro of mankind: some change or other there is every day in so great a revolution of this world. New foundations of Cities are laid: New names of nations spring up, whereas the old are either growne out of use, or altered by the comming in of a mightier. And considering that all these nations which have broken into Britaine, were Northern as all the rest, which about the same time over-ranne all Europe, and afterwards Asia; most truly from the authoritie of holy Scripture, wrote Nicephorus, Like as terrors oftentimes are sent from heaven by God upon men, as lightning, fire, and tempestuous showers; oftentimes from the earth, as open gapings of the ground, and Earthquakes; often from the aire, as whirlwinds and extraordinarie stormes: so, these terrors of the Northerne and Hyperborean parts, God keepeth by him in store, to send them forth for some punishment, when, and among whom, it pleaseth him in his divine providence.

THE DIVISION OF BRITAIN.

Now let us addresse our selves to the Division of Britaine. Countries are divided by Geographers, either Naturally, according to the course of rivers, and interpose of mountains: or Nationally, according as the people inhabit them: or Diversly and Civilly, according to the wils and jurisdiction of Princes. But forasmuch as wee shall treat here and there throughout the whole worke, of the first and second kinds, that third (which is civill and politike) seemeth properly pertinent to this place. Which yet is overcast with so darke a mist, through the iniquitie of former times, that much easier it is in this case to confute what is false, than to find out the truth.

Our Historiographers will needs have that division of Britaine to be most ancient, whereby they divide it into Laegria, Cambria, and Albania, that is, to speake more plainly, into England, Wales, and Scotland. But I would think this division to be of a newer and later edition, both because it is threefold, for it seemeth to have risen of those

How countries are divided.

A those three sorts of people, English, Welch, and Scottish, which last of all parted the Island among themselves: and also for that such a partition is no where extant in approved Authours before our Geffrey of Monmouth. For, the fable, (as the Critics of our age doe thinke) could not hang well together, unless he the said Geffrey had devised three sonnes of Brutus, to wit, Loocrine, Camber, and Albanact, because so many Nations flourished heere when he lived. Neither make they doubt, but hee would have found out more children of Brutus, if there had beene more nations distinct at the same time in Britaine.

The most ancient division of Britaine in the opinion of many learned men is that, which is found in Ptolomee, in the second booke of  Mathematicall Construction*, * cap. 6. where he threatneth the Parallels: namely, into Britaine the GREAT, and the LESSER. But by their leave, as great learned men as they be, they themselves shal see, if it please them to examine thoroughly and exactly in that place, the proportion of distance from the Aequator, and compare the same with his Geographical Descriptions, that hee calleth this our Island there, Britaine the GREAT, and Ireland, Britaine the LESSER. Howbeit some of our later writers named the higher part of this Island toward the South, GREAT, and that farther part Northward, the LESSER: the Inhabitants whereof in times past, were distinguished into MAIATAE, and CALEDONII, that is to say, into the habitation of the Champian, or Plaines, and the Mountaigners: as now, the Scots are divided into Hechtlandmen, and Lowlandmen. But for as much Britan Great and Small.

C as the Romans cared not for that farther tract, because (as Appian saith, it could not be profitable for them nor fruitfull; having set downe their bounds nor farre from Edenburgh, at the first they made this higher part reduced already into a Province, two-fold, to wit, the LOVVER, and the HIGHER, as it is gathered out of Dio. For, the higher or neerer part of England, together with Wales, he termeth the HIGHER, the farther and Northern part the LOVVER. Which thing the very sears, and abiding places of the Legions in Dio do prove. The second Legion Augusta, which kept at Gaelleon in Wales, and the twentieth surnamed Victrix, which remained at Chester or Deva, he placeth in the Higher Britaine: but the Sixth Legion Victrix, that was resident at Yorke, served, as he writeth, in the Lower Britaine. This division I would suppose, was made by the Emperour Severus, because Herodian reporteth, that hee after hee had vanquished Albinus Generall of the British forces, who had usurped the Empire, and therewith reformed, and set in order the State of Britain, divided the government of the Province in two parts, between two Prefects, or Governours.

Britaine the Higher, and the Lower.

After this, the Romans did set out the Province of Britaine into three parts, as is to be seen out of a manuscript of Sextus Rufus: namely, into MAXIMA CAESARIENSIS, BRITANNIA PRIMA, and BRITANNIA SECUNDA. Which, I take it, I have found out by the Bishops, and their ancient Diocesses. Lucius the Pope, in Gratian, insinuateth thus much, that the Ecclesiasticall Jurisdictions of the Christians, followed the Jurisdictions of the Roman Magistrates, and that Archbishops had their Seas in those cities, wherein the Romane Presidents in times past made their abode. The Cities and places (saith he) in which Primates ought to sit and rule, were appointed not by the Moderne, but long before the comming of Christ: to the Primates of which Cities &c. the Gentils also appealed in matters of greater importance. And in these verie cities after Christs comming, the Apostles and their Successors placed Patriarchs, or Primates, upon whom the affaires of the Bishops, and greater causes ought to be preferred. Whereas therefore Britaine had in old time three Archbishops, to wit, of London, of Yorke, and Gaelleon in Southwales, I suppose, that the Province which now we call of Ganterburie, (for thither the Sea of London was translated) made BRITANNIA PRIMA: Wales under the * Citie of Caer Leon, was BRITANNIA SECUNDA; and the Province of Yorke, which then reached unto the Limit or Borders, made MAXIMA CAESARIENSIS.

Tripartite Britaine.

Dis. 80. cap. 1.

F In the age next ensuing, when the forme of the Roman Empire was daily changing, either through ambition, that more men might attaine to places of honour, or the warie forecast of the Emperours, that the power of their Presidents which grew over great might be taken downe and abridged, they divided Britaine into five parts,

Lib. 18.

TO WIT, BRITANNIA PRIMA, SECUNDA, MAXIMA CAESARIENSIS, VALENTIA & FLAVIA CAESARIENSIS. VALENTIA seemeth to have been the northerly part of Maxima Caesariensis, which being usurped and held by the Picts and Scots, Theodosius Generall under Valens the Emperour recovered out their hands, and in honour of him named it Valentia, which Marcellinus sheweth more plainly in these words: The Province now recovered, which was fallen into the enemies hands, he restored to the former state, in such sort, as by his own procuring it had both a lawful governor, & was also afterwards called, VALENTIA, as the pleasure of the Prince. Now that the son of this Theodosius, (who being created Emperour was named Flavius Theodosius, and altered very many things in the Empire) added Flavia, we may very well conjecture, for that before the time of this Flavius we read no where of BRITANNIA FLAVIA. Wherefore to make up this matter in few words, All the fourth coast which of one side lieth between the British sea, and the river Thames with the Severn sea on the other side, was called BRITANNIA PRIMA. BRITANNIA SECUNDA, was that which now is Wales. FLAVIA CAESARIENSIS, reacheth from Thames to Humber. MAXIMA CAESARIENSIS, from Humber to the river of Tine, or the wall of Severus. VALENTIA from Tine to the wall or rampier neere Edinburgh, which the Scots call Gramedike, and was the utmost limit of the Roman Empire in this Island, when this last division was in use.

And now I cannot chuse but note some want of judgement in certaine men, who otherwise being very learned, doe reckon Scotland in this account, which some of them make to have beene Maxima Caesariensis, and others, Britannia Secunda: As if (forsooth) the Romans neglected not that part of the Island, lying under a cold climate, and reckoned here those Provinces onely, which they governed by Consular Lieutenants, and Prefidents: for Maxima Caesariensis, and Valentia were ruled by Consular Lieutenants; Britannia Prima, Secunda, and Flavia, by Prefidents.

Now if any man would have me render a reason of this my division, and accuse me as a false bounderer and surveyor, let him heare in briefe, what hath induced mee to this opinion. Having observed thus much, that the Romans alwaies called those Provinces PRIMAS, which lay nighest to Rome: as Germania Prima, Belgica Prima, Lugdunensis Prima, Aquitania Prima, Pannonia Prima; all which lay neerer to Rome, than those that were named, Secunda: and that these Prima, were by the finer sort of writers, termed Superiores, or higher: the Secunda, Inferiores, or Lower: I resolved, that the South-part of our Island, and neerer to Rome, was Britannia Prima. By the same reason seeing the Provinces Secunda (as they call them) were more remote from Rome, I supposed Wales was the Britannia Secunda. Moreover, having noted this also, that in the decaying State of their Empire, those Provinces onely had Consular Magistrates, which lay against the enemies, not onely in Gaule, but also in Africke, as appeareth in the booke of Notices: also, that in the said Booke, Valentia with us, and Maxima Caesariensis be accounted Consular Provinces; I have judged them being next and exposed to the Scots and Picts, to lie in those places which I have spoken of. I can doe no other but guesse, that Flavia Caesariensis here, was in the midst betweene them all, and in the very heart of England: and so much the more confidently, because that ancient writer Givaldus Cambrensis, is just of the same opinion with me. And thus much of the Divisions of Britaine under the Romans.

Afterwards, when the Barbarians made invasion on every side, and civill war daily increased among the Britans, the Island, as bereft of all life and vigour, lay for a time languishing and forlorne, without any shew at all of government. But at length that part which inclineth to the North became two Kingdomes, to wit, of the Scots and the Picts, and the Romans Pentarchie, or five portions; in this hither part became in proceesse of time the Heptarchie, or seven Kingdomes, of the Saxons. For, they divided the whole Province of the Romans, (setting Wales aside, which the remnant of Britans possessed) into seven Kingdomes, that is to say, Kent, Southsex, East-England, Westsex, Northumberland, Eastsex, and Mercia.

But what this Heptarchie of the English-Saxons was, and what their names were in those daies, in this chorographical table here adjoynd you may (if you please) behold. Considering

An Hide, as some thinke, is so much land, as one plough can eare in one yeare: as others thinke, 4. yard-lands.

Yet was not England when the Heptarchie flourished, thus divided into Counties, for so they be commonly called, but into certaine small regions with their Hides, which out of an old fragment that I had of Francis Tate a gentleman, most conversant in the Antiquitie of our Law, I have here put downe. But it containeth that country onely, which lieth on this side Humber.

Although some of these names may at the first sight be discovered, yet others of them a man shall hardly picke out although hee studie upon them: and they require one I professe it, of much sharper wit and quicker insight than my selfe, to guesse what they should meane.

Afterwards, when Aelfred was sole Monarch, like as the Germans our ancestors, as Tacitus witnesseth, kept courts and ministred justice in every Territoric and town, and had a Hundred men out of the the Common people as companions and assistants to performe this function: even so, to use the words of Ingulphus of Crowland, He first divided England into Counties, for that the neighbour inhabitants after the example, and under colour of the Danes committed outrages and robberies. Besides, hee caused the Counties to be parted into Centuries, that is Hundreds, and Decimes, that is Tithings: and commanded with all that every Homelinge or naturall Inhabitant should bee in some one Hundred and Tithing. Hee divided also the governours of the Provinces, who before were called Vice-Domini, that is, Vice-Lords, into two offices, to wit, Iudges, now Iustices, and Vice-Comites, that is, Sheriffes, which still retain the same name. By whose care and industrie, peace so much flourished within short space through the whole Province, that had a way-faring man let fall in the fields or common highwaies, a summe of money, how great soever it had bene, if he returned thither the next morning or a month after he might bee sure to see it there safe and untouched. Which our Historiographer of Malmesburie will declare unto you more at large. By occasion, saith he, and example of the Barbarians, that is, Danes, the proper and naturall inhabitants also were very greedy of spoile, so that no man could passe to and fro in safety, without weapons for his defence. Aelfred therefore ordained Centuries, which they terme Hundreds, and Decimes, which they call Tithings, that every English man living under law, as a liege subject, should bee within one Hundred and Tithing, or another. And if a man were accused of any transgression, hee should bring in straightwaies some one out of the same Hundred and Tithing, that would bee bound for his appearance to answer the law: but he that could not find such a surety, should abide the severity of the Lawes. But in case any man standing thus accused, either before or after suretiship, fled, then all that Hundred and Tithing, incurred a mulct or fine to bee imposed by the King. By this device he brought peace into the Country, so as along the common causes and highwaies where they crossed one another, he commanded bracelets of gold to be hanged up, Aelfred he is named in pieces of Coine: also Alured, in our English Chronicles.

Hundreds,

Wapentaks, Tithings and Lathes.

A To delude the greedinesse of passengers, whiles there was no man that durst take the away. But these Hundreds be in some places of the realme called Wapentakes: if you would know the reason thereof, I will tel you it out of the laws of Edward the Confessor. When a man received the government of a Wapentack, upon a certaine day appointed in the place where they were wont to assemble, all the elder sort met together and expected him: and as hee alighted from his horse, rose up unto him and did him reverence. Then he, setting his speare upright, received of them all, according to the custome, a covenant of Association. For, as many as came, with their speares touched his speare, and thus they assured themselves by touching of weapons, in peaceable manner. For, armes in English they call wapen, & Taccapē is as much as to confirme or establish: as if this were a confirmation of weapons: or, B to speak more significantly and expressly according to the English tongue, Wepentac, is the touching of weapons. For wapen soundeth as much, as armes, Tac is touching. There were besides, other governments and jurisdictions above Wapentakes which they called Dpiningar, for that this was the third part of a Province. And the rulers over those were termed Dpiningsepepar. Before these officers were brought those causes that could not be determined in the Wapentacks. And so, that which the Englishmen named a Hundred, these termed a Wapentack. And that which in English they called three or foure Hundreds, these named Dpiningse. Howbeit in some Provinces they called that Ley, which these terme Tithing: and that which could not be decided and ended in a Dpiningse, was brought into the Schyre.

C These Counties which you may properly and in Latine call, either Conventus or Fagos, we by a peculiar terme name Shires, of Scýpe a Saxon word, which significeth, to part or divide: and at the first division, were there in all but thirtie two. For, in the yeare after Christs nativitie 1016. whiles Etheldred raigned, the Chronicle of Malmesburie reporteth there was no more: For, thus writeth hee in the life of the said Etheldred. The Danes at this time when there bee reckoned in England thirty two Shires, invaded 16. of them. And in those daies, according to the varietie of lawes these counties or shires were divided. For the lawes of England were distinguished into three sorts: to wit, those of the West-Saxons which they called West-Saxenlage: those of the Danes, named Denelage, and those of the Mercians, termed Merchenlage. D To the law of the West-Saxons belonged nine counties, to wit, Kent, Suffex, Sushrie, Berkshire, Hantsire or Southampton, Wiltshire, Sommersetshire, Dorsetshire, and Den-shire. To the Danes law appertained 15. Counties, namely, Yorkshire, Darbyshire, Nottinghamshire, Leicestershire, Lincolnshire, Northamptonshire, Bedfordshire, Buckinghamshire, Hertfordshire, Essex, Middlesex, Northfolk, Suffolk, Cam-bridgehire, Huntingdonshire. The eight remaining, followed the law of the Mercians: there were, Gloucestershire, Worcestershire, Herefordshire, Warwickshire, Oxfordshire, Cheshire, Salop or Shropshire, and Staffordshire. But when William the First made a survey and taxed this Kingdome, there were reckoned, as wee read in Polychronicon, xxxvj. shires or counties: and yet the publike * record, in which he engrossed and registred this survey and taxe, doe make mention of 34. onely. For, Durham, Lancashire, Northumberland, Westmorland, and Comberland were not comprised in that number, because these three last were then subject to the Scots, as some will have it, and those other two were either free from payments and taxes, or comprehended under Yorkshire: but being afterwards added to the rest they made up in all, the number of 39. shires, which we have at this day. Unto which are adjoy-ned since 12. more in Wales: whereof sixe were in the time of Edward the First, the rest Henry the Eighth ordained by Parliamentarie authoritie.

F In these Shires there is appointed in troublesome times by the Prince, a Prefect or Deputie under the King, whom they call a Lieutenant, to see that the Common-weale sustaine no hurt. The first Institution of this Lieutenant, as it may seeme, is to be fetched from King Aelfred, who appointed in every Countie certaine Custodes or Keepers of the Kingdome: whom Henry the Third afterward did set up and restore againe, naming them Capitaines. For hee in the fiftieth yeare of his raigne, Held a Parliament as Iohn * of London writeth, wherein this wholesome ordinance was enacted, that that in every Countie there should be made at the Kings charge, one Capitaine, who with the helpe of the Sheriffe should restraine the cruel and outrageous robbers & theeves from stealth and rapine. Many therefore being frighted with this terror gave over, and so the Kings power began to breath againe and revive. With good forecast this was done verily by this Prince: but whether Canutus the Dane did more wisely, who in his Monarchie erected a Tetrarchie, let our Politicians and Statists dispute. For he, (Hermandus the Archdeacon is mine Author) being a prudent Prince, and watchfull every way, dividing the care of his Kingdome into foure parts, ordained Tetrarchs, such as hee had found to be most faithfull and trusty. The charge of the greatest portion, to wit, Westsex, hee tooke upon himselfe; of * Mercia, which was the second portion, he committed to one Edrich; the third, usually called Northumbrie, to Trinus, and to Turkil Earle of East-Englan, the fourth; which flowed in plenty and abundance of all wealth. For this instruction I am beholden to the diligence of Francis Thinn, a man, who with exceeding great commendation hath travelled very much in this Studie of Antiquities.

Now every yeare, some one of the Gentlemen Inhabitants, is made ruler of the countie wherein he dwelleth, whom we call in Latin Viccomitem, as one would say, the Deputie of the Comes or Earle, and in our tongue Sheriffe, that is, the Reeve of the Shire, who also may well be termed the Treasurer of the Shire or Province. For, it is his durie, to gather the common monies and profits of the Prince in his Countie, to collect and bring into the Exchequer all fines imposed, even by distraining: to be attendant upon the Judges, and to execute their commandements: to assemble and empanell the twelve men which in causes do enquire of the fact, and make relation thereof and give in their verdict to the Judges (for Judges with us sit upon the right onely of a cause: and not upon the fact) to see condemned persons executed, and to examine and determine certaine smaller actions. Moreover, there bee ordained in everie Shire, and that by the institution of Edward the Third, certaine Justices of peace, who examine Murders, Felonies, and Trespases, as they call them, yea and many other delinquencies. Furthermore, the King sendeth yearly into every Shire of England two Justices, to give Judgement of prisoners, and that I may use the Lawyers terme, to deliver the Goale. Of whom, more heereafter in the Trease of Iudiciall courts and Indgments treat.

As touching Ecclesiasticall jurisdiction, when the Bishops of Rome had assigned severall Churches to severall Priests, and laid parishes unto them, Honorius Archbishop of Canterbury, about the yeare of our Redemption 636. began first to diuide England into parishes, as wee reade in the Historie of Canterbury. But now hath England two provinces, and accordingly two Archbishops: to wit, the Archbishop of Canterbury Primate and Metropolitan of all England, and the Archbishop of Yorke. Under these are twenty five Bishops: to the Archbishop of Canterbury are subject twentie two, to the Archbishop of Yorke, the other three. Now what Bishopricks these be, with the shires and Diocesses that are at this day under their jurisdiction, that godly, and right reverend father Matthew Parker, [late] Archbishop of Canterbury, a man very studious and skilfull in antiquitie, and a worthy Patron of good learning, sheweth in these his owne words.

IN THE PROVINCE OF CANTERBVRIE.

THE Bishopricke of Canterburie together with that of Rochester containeth under it Kent it selfe. The Bishopricke of London hath under it Essex, Middlesex, & part of Hertfordshire. The Bishopricke of Chichester hath belonging unto it Suffex. The Bishopricke of Winchester compriseth Southampton shire, Surry, and the Isle of Wight, Gernsey also and Iersey, Islands lying against Normandy. The Bishopricke of Salisbury, compriseth Wiltshire and Berksheire. The Bishopricke of Excester containeth Deneshire and Cornwall. The Bishopricke of Bath and Wells joined together, hath under it Sommerfetshire: The Bishopricke of Gloucester hath belonging to it Gloucestershire. To the Bishopricke of Worcester, is subject Worcestereshire & part of Warwickshire. To the Bishopricke of Hereford, Herefordshire & part of Salop or Shropshire. The

- A Bishopricke of Coventrie and Lichfield joyned together, have under it, Staffordshire, Derbshire and the other part of Warwickshire, as also that part of Shropshire which lieth toward the river Repil. Then, the Bishopricke of Lincolnshire, which of all other is the greatest, is bounded with Lincolnshire, Leicestershire, Huntingdonshire, Bedfordshire, Buckinghamshire, and the other part of Hertfordshire. To the Bishopricke of Ely pertaine Cambridgeshire, and the Isle it selfe of Elie. Under the Bishopricke of Norwich is Norfolk and Suffolke. The Bishopricke of Oxenford hath under it Oxenfordshire. The Bishopricke of Peterborough compriseth Northamptonshire and Rutlandshire. Under the Bishopricke of Bristol, is Dorsetshire. Vnto which eigheteene Diocesses in England, are to be added those of Wales, which are both bereft of their owne peculiar Archbishopricke, and made also fewer in number; seven being brought scarce to foure: to wit, the Bishopricke of Meneva, having the seat at Saint Davids, the Bishopricke of Landaffe; the Bishopricke of Bangor, and the Bishopricke of Saint Asaph.

IN THE PROVINCE OF YORKE.

- C THE Bishopricke of Yorke comprehendeth Yorkeshire it selfe, and Nottinghamshire. The Bishopricke of Chester containeth, Cheshire, Richmondshire, Lancashire, part of Cumberland, of Flintshire, and of Denbshire. The Bishopricke of Durham, hath Durham it selfe under it, and Northumberland. The Bishopricke of Carleil containeth within it part of Cumberland, and the Countrey of Westmerland. To these you may adde, the Bishopricke of Sodor, in the Isle of Mona, which commonly is called Man. Among these, the Archbishop of Canterburie hath the first place: the Archbishop of Yorke the second: the Bishop of London the third: the Bishop of Durham the fourth: the Bishop of Winchester the fifth: the rest as they are consecrated or entailed first, so in prioritie they take the place. Howbeit, if any of the other Bishops happen to be Secretary to the King, hee challengeth by his right the fifth place. Besides, there are in England Deaneries xxvj. whereof thirteene were ordained by Henrie the Eighth in the greater Cathedrall Churches after the Monks were thrust out. Archdeaconries three skore: Dignities and Prebends five hundred fortie foure.

Numbered also there are parish-churches under Bishops, 9284: of which 3845, be Appropriat, as I find in a Catalogue exhibited unto King James, which here I have put downe underneath. Now, Appropriat Churches those are called, which by the Popes authority coming betwene, with consent of the King and the Bishop of the Diocese were upon certaine conditions tied, or as the forme runneth, of our Law, united, annexed, and incorporate for ever, unto Monasteries, Bishopricks, Colledges and Hospitals, endowed with small lands, either for that the said Churches were built with in their Lordships and lands, or granted by the Lords of the said lands. Which Churches afterwards when the Abbaies and Monasteries were suppressed, became Laye Fees, to the great dammage of the Church.

A They were 1520. by Counties are reckoned, 9407. Churches. How this variety should come, I cannot say, unless that in the former age some Churches were pulled downe, and the Chappels which belong unto Parishes be omitted, and others that are but bare Chappels, counted in the number of Parish-churches. Yet, out of this booke of Wolsey, have I put downe the number of Parish-churches to every Shire.

There were also, in the reigne of Henrie the Eighth (I hope without offence I may speake the truth) many religious places, Monuments of our fore-fathers pietie and devotion, to the honor of God, the propagation of Christian faith and good learning, and also for the reliefe and maintenance of the poore and impotent, to wit, Monasteries of Abbaies, and Priories, to the number of 645: of which when by permission of Pope Clement the seventh, fortie were suppressed by Cardinall Wolseies meanes, who then had begun to found two Colledges, one at Oxenford, the other at Ipswich: straight waies, about the xxxvj. yeere of the reigne of the said Henrie the Eighth, a sudden floud (as it were) breaking thorow the banks with a maine streame, fell upon the Ecclesiastical State of England; which whiles the world stood amazed, and England groined thereat, bare downe and utterly overthrew the greatest part of the Clergie, together with their most goodly and beautifull houses. For, that leave which the Pope granted to the Cardinall; the King with assent of the Parliament tooke to himselfe. Whereupon, in the yeere of our Lord, 1536. all religious houses every one, together with all their livings and revenues, as many I meane as might dispend by yeerely rent 200. pound or under, (and those amounted to the number of 376) were granted to the King. And in the yeere next following, under a faire pretence and shew of rooting out superstition, all the rest, together with Colledges, Chanteries and Hospitals were left to the dispose and pleasure of the King. At which time, the religious houses remaining, in number 605. were surveied, valued or taxed. Colledges there were, besides those in the Universties, 90. Hospitals 110. Chanteries and free Chappels 2374. All which for the most part, shortly after were every where pulled downe, their revenues sold and made away, & those goods & riches which the Christian pietie of the English nation had consecrated unto God, since they first professed Christianity were in a moment as it were dispersed, and (to the displeasure of no man be it spoken) prophaned.

THE STATES AND DEGREES of England.

E Touching the division of our Common-wealth, it consisteth, of a King or Monarch, Noblemen or Gentry, Citizens, Free-borne, whom we call, Yeomen, and Artisans or Handicraftsmen.

The King

THE KING, whom our ancestors [the English-Saxons] called Coning and Gyning, (in which name is implied a signification both of power and skill) and wee name contractly, King, hath soveraigne power and absolute command among us, neither holdeth he his Empire in vassalage, nor receiveth his investure or entailing of another, ne yet acknowledgeth any superiour but God alone: and as one said, All verily are under him, and himselfe under none, but God onely. Also, he hath very many rights of Majesty peculiar to himselfe, (the learned Lawyers terme them, Sacra sacrorum, that is Sacred, and Individa; that is, inseparable, because they cannot be severed: and the common sort Royall prerogatives) which they terme, The flowers of his Crowne, in which respect they affirme that the regall materiall Crowne is adorned with flowers. Some of these, are by positive or written law; others, by right of custome, which by a silent consent of all men without law, prescription of time hath allowed, the King justly enioieth: and most deservedly; considering that His matchfull care defendeth the state of all, his painfull labour maintaineth the rest of all, his studious industry upholdeth the delights of all, and his busie employment affordeth ease to all. But these are points of a loftier discourse, and not of the argument now in hand.

The Prince.

* Nobilitas Cesar.
* Cesar Nobilitas.* Dux Cornubie natus.

* Lords.

A Duke.

* Dukes.
* Earles.

The second or next to the King, is his first begotten sonne: who, like as among the Romans, the heire apparant, and assigned succellour to the Empire, was first entituled, Principes Inventus, that is, Prince of the youth; and afterwards (as flatterie did increafe) stiled by the name of Cesar, * Noble Cesar, and the * most Noble: so, with our Ancestors the English-Saxons, hee was named in their tongue, Aetheling, that is, Noble, and in Latine Clito, of the Greeke word, κλυτο, that is, Glorious or Excellent (see how that age affected the Greeke Language.) And hereupon, of that Edgar, the last heire male of the English blood royall, this old said law is yet rife in every mans mouth, Eadgar, Edeeling, Englan, Eadeling. And in the ancient Latine Patents and Charters of the Kings wee read often times, Ego E. vel Ae. Clyto, Regis filius: But this addition Clyto, I have observed to be given even to all the Kings sonnes. After the Norman conquest, no certaine or speciall title of honour was assigned unto him, nor any other to my knowledge, than singly thus, The Kings sonne, and, The first begotten of the King of England, untill that Edward the first summoned unto the high Court of Parliament his sonne Edward, by the name of Prince of Wales, and Earle of Chester; unto whom hee granted afterwards, the Dukedome also of Aquitaine: like as the same Prince, being now King Edward the Second, called unto the Parliament his young sonne Edward, not full ten yeeres old, by the title of Earle of Chester, and of Flinth. But the said Edward, having now attained to the Crowne, and being Edward the Third, created Edward his sonne, a most valiant and renowned man of warre, Duke of Cornwall. Since which time, the Kings first begotten sonne, is reputed * Duke of Cornwall at the houre of his birth. And soone after, he adorned the same sonne by solemne investiture and creation, with the title of Prince of Wales. And gave the Principality of Wales in these words, To be held of him and his heires Kings of England. And as the declared or elect Succellours of the Roman Empire, (as I said even now) were named Cæsares, of the Greeke Empire, * Despote; of the Kingdome of France, Dolphins, and of Spaine, Infants: so from thence forward, the Heires apparant of the Kingdome of England, were entituled, Princes of Wales. And this title continued unto the daies of Henrie the Eighth, when Wales was fully united to the Kingdome of England.

But now, whereas the Kingdomes of Britaine formerly divided, are by the happy good luck, and rightfull title of the most mighty Prince, King James grown into one, his Eldest sonne Henrie, the Lovely Ioy and Dearing of Britaine, is stiled, PRINCE OF GREAT BRITAIN: who, as he is borne thus to the greatest hopes, so all Britaine from one end to the other, prayeth unceasingly from the very heart, that God would vouchsafe to blisse him with the greatest vertues, and continuance of honour, that hee may by many degrees, and that most happily exceede our hope, surpass the noble Acts of his Progenitours, yea, and outlive their yeeres. As for our Nobilitie, or Gentry, it is divided into Superiour, and Inferiour. The Superiour or chiefe Noblemen we call, Dukes, Marquesses, Earles, and Barons: which have received these titles from the Kings of this Realme for their Vertue and Prowesse.

Dux, is the chiefe title of honour among us next after PRINCE. This was a name at first of charge and office, and not of dignitie. About the time of Aelius Verus the Emperour, those who governed the Limits and Borders, were first named Duces, and this degree in the daies of Constantine was inferiour to that of Comites. After the Romane government was heere in this Iland abolished, this title also remained as a name of office: and those among us, who in old Charters, during the Saxons time, are so many of them called Duces, were named in the English tongue onely Ealdermen: and the verie fame, that were named Duces, they called also, * Comites. As for example, that William the Conquerour of England, whom most call Duke of Normandie, William of Malmsburie, termeth Comes, or Earle of Normandie. But, as well Duke as Earle, were names of charge and office, as appeareth by this Briefe or Instrument of creating a Duke or Earle, out of Marculphus an ancient Writer. In this point especially is a Princes regall Clemencie fully commended, that throught the whole people there bee sought out honest and vigilant persons; neither is it meete to commit hand over head, unto every man a judicarie Dignity, unlesse his faithfulness

A and valour seems to have bene tried before: seeing then therefore, we suppose that we have had good proofs of your trustie and profitable service unto us, wee have committed unto you the government of that Earldome, Dukedome, Senatourship, or Eldership in that Shire or Province, which your Prowesse untill this time seemed to have exercised, for so manage and rule the same accordingly: provided alwaies, that you evermore keepe your faith untouched and unstained toward our Royall governance, and that all people there abiding may live, and be ruled under your regiment and governance, and that you order and direct them in the right course, according to law, and their owne customes: That you shew your selfe a Protector to widowes, and Guardians to Orphans: that the wickednesse of thieves and malefactors be most severely by you punished: that the people living well under your regiment, may with joy continue in peace quietly: and whatsoever by this very execution is looked for to arise, in profit due to the Exchequer bee brought yearly by your selfe into our Coffers, and Treasure. This title of Duke, began to be a title of honour under Otho the Great, about the yeere 970. For hee, to bind more treitly, and neerer unto him, martiall and polike men, endowed them with Regalities and Roialties, as hee termed them. And these Roialties were either Dignities, or Lands in fee. Dignities were these, Dukes, Marquesses, Earles, Capitaines, Palatours, Palatines. Later it was ere it came to be an Hereditarie ritle in France: and not before the time of Philip the third King of France, who granted, that from thence forth, they should bee called, Dukes of Britaine, who before time were indifferently stiled, both Dukes and Earles. But in England, in the time of the Normans, seeing the Norman Kings themselves were Dukes of Normandie, for a great while they adorned iose with this honour: nor before that Edward the Third created Edward his sonne, Duke of Cornwall, by a wreath upon his head, a ring on his finger, and a silver verge or rod: like as the Dukes of Normandie were in times past created by a sword, and banner delivered unto them: afterwards, by girding the sword of the Duchie, and a circle of gold, garnished with little golden roses in the top. And the same King Edward the Third, created in a Parliament his two sonnes, Lionel Duke of Clarence, and John Duke of Lancaster, by the girding of a sword, and setting upon their heads a furred chapeau, or cap, with a circlet or coronet of gold, pearle, and a Charter delivered unto them. From which time there have bene many hereditary Dukes among us, created one after another, with these or such like words in their Charter or Patent: We give and grant the Name, Title, State, Stile, Place, Seat, Preheminence, Honour, Authority, and Dignitie of a Duke, in N. and by the cincture of a sword, and imposition of a Cap and Coronet of gold upon his head, as also by delivering unto him a verge of gold, we doe really invest.

A MARQUESS, that is, if you consider the very nature of the word, a Governor of the Marches, hath the next place of honour, after a Duke. This Title came to us but of late daies, and was not bestowed upon any one, before the time of King Richard the Second: For, hee made his minion Robert Vere, who was highly in his favour, Marquess of Dublin: and then it began with us to be a title of honour. For before time those that governed the Marches, were commonly called, Lord Marchers, and not Marquesses (as now we terme them. Henceforth they were created by the King, by cincture of the sword, and the imposition of the Cap of honor and dignitie, with the Coronet, as also by delivery of a Charter or writing. Neither will I think it much to relate here, that which is found recorded in the * Parliament Rols. When John de Beaufort, from being Earle of Sommerfet, was by Richard the Second created Marquess of Dorset, and afterwards by Henrie the Fourth, deprived of that title; what time as the Commons of England made humble suite in Parliament to the King, that hee would restore unto him the title of Marquess which he had lost: he opposed himselfe against that petition, and openly said, That it was a new dignitie, and altogether unknowne to his Ancestours; and therefore hee neither craved it, nor in any wise would accept of it.

Earles, called in Latine, Comites, are ranged in the third place, and may seeme to have come unto us from our Ancestours the Germans: For, they in times past, as Cornelius Tacitus writeth, had their Comites, Who should alwaies give attendance upon their Princes, and bee at hand in matters of counsell and authority. But others thinke, that they they came from the Romans to us, as also to the Fraks, or French. For, the Emperours, when as the Empire was growne now to the full strength, began to have about them a certaine privie Counsell, which was called Comitatus: and then those whose counsell they used in warre and peace, were termed Comites: whence it is that in ancient Inscriptions, wee find oftentimes COMIT. IMPR. And in few yeares the name of Comes, grew so ripe, that it was given to all Officers and Magistrates that observed or gave attendance upon the said sacred or privie Counsell, or that came out of it: and from hence afterward the name extended to all those which were the Provosts or Over-seers of any matters of state. And Suida defineth Comes, to be The ruler of the people, as Cuiacius hath taught us: who also teachth us, that before Constantine the Great, the name of Comes was not in use, to signify any honour. But he, when he altered the forme of the Roman Empire by new distinctions, and endeavored to oblige many unto him with his benefits, and them to advance unto honour, ordained first the title of Comes without any function or government at all to be a title of dignitie: and this Comes had a certaine power and priviledge, for to accompanie the Prince, not onely when hee went abroad, but in his palace also, in his privie chamber, and secret roomes, to have libertie likewise to be present at his Table, and private speeches. And hereupon it is, that wee read thus in Epiphanius, quis est autem in Basilica ad dextram Regis sedens, that is, Who so obtained of the King, the Dignitie of Comites. At length, to them which were beholden unto him for this honourable preerment, hee granted other dignities with charge: and againe, upon those that were in place of Magistracie, and executed any office of State, either at home or abroad, he bestowed that title of honour, Comes Domesticorum, L. Great Master of the Household; Comes sacrum largitionum, L. High Treasurer; Comes sacra vestis, Master of the Wardrobe; Comes Stabuli, Master of the Horle; Comes Thesauri, Treasurer; Comes Orientis, Lieutenant of the East; Comes Britannia, Comes Africa, &c. Herchence it came, that ever since the name of Comes, imported Dignitie, and authoritie, or government, at the first temporarie, afterward for terme of life. Moreover, in proceesse of time, when the Empire of the Romans became rent into many kingdomes, this title yet was retained: and our English-Saxons, called them in Latine, Comites, and Consoles, whom in their owne language, they named Galdopmea, and the very same the Danes termed in their tongue, Eorlas, that is, Honourable, as Ethelward writeth, by which name somewhat mollified, they are called of us at this day, Earles. And verily for a long time, they were knowne by this name simply: at length, with addition also of the place over which they were put in authoritie. Neither as yet descended this honour to the next heire by inheritance. Where, by the way thus much I note, that the first hereditarie Earles in France, were the Earles of Britaine. But when William of Normandy had made conquest of this Land, and seated himselfe in the absolute government of this Kingdom, Earles began to bee Fendall, Hereditarie, and Patrimoniall, that is, By fee, or Tennure by service, by inheritance, and by Lands, who also, as it appeareth in  Doomesday booke*, were simply without any addition at all, named Earles, as Comes Hugo, Comes Alanus, Comes Rogerus; Earle Hugh, Earle Alan, Earle Roger, &c. Afterwards, as wee may see in ancient Charters, Earles were created with the name of a place joyned unto them, and the third pennie of the Shire was assigned unto them. As for example, Mawd the Empreffe, daughter and heire to K. Henry the First, created an Earle in these words, as appeareth in the very Charter which I have: I Mawd, daughter of K. Henry, and Ladie of the Englishmen, doe give and grant unto Geoffrey de Magnavil for his service, & to his heires after him by right of inheritance to be Earle of Essex, & to have the third pennie out of the Sheriffs Courts, issuing out of all pleas, as an Earle should have through his Countie in all things. And this is the most ancient Charter that hitherto I have seen, of an Earles creation, Likewise Henry the Second, King of England her sonne, created an Earle by these words: Know yee, that wee have made Hugh Bigod, Earle of Norfolk, to wit, of the third pennie of Norwic, and Norfolk, as freely as any Earle of England holdeth his Countie. Which words, an old booke of Battaille Abbey expoundeth thus: An usuall and ancient custome it was throughout all England, that the Earles should have the third pennie to themselves of the Provinces, whereof they tooke the name, and were called Earles. Semblably, another booke without name, more plainly: The Shire or Countie hath the name of the Earle or Count, or else contrariwise, the Count of the Countie. And Count or Earle he is, because he receiveth the third part of those things, that accrew or arise, by plea in every Countie or Shire: But all Earles reape not these fruits, but those to whom the King hath granted them by right of inheritance, or in their owne persons. And hereupon Polydore Virgil writeth truly, and according to the manner of our age. It is a custome in England, saith he, that the titles of Earldomes be given at the Princes pleasure, even without possession of those places, from whence the very titles are taken. And therefore the King is wont to give unto them, that possess nothing in that Countie, some certaine pension or summe of money out of his owne revenues, in lieu of the possession.

Earles were created in old time without any complement or ceremonie at all, but onely by delivering unto them a Charter. Under Stephen who usurped the kingdom, during the heat of civill war, many also tooke upon them the titles of Earles, whom the Historie of Waverlew Church, and others of that age calleth Pseudo-Comites, that is, counterfeit Earles, and Comites imaginarios, that is, Earles in conceit, whiles it reporteth unto us, that Henrie the Second deposed them. And King Iohn, was the first by my observation, that used in creating of them, the cincture of a sword. For Roger of Hoveden writeth thus: *King Iohn upon the day of his Coronation girded William Mareschall with the sword of the Earldome of * Strigulia*, and Geoffrey Fitz-Peter with the sword of the Earldome of Essex: who albeit they had bene called Earles before and governed their Shires, yet were they not girt with the sword of an Earldome: and upon that day they waited at the Kings table, wearing those swords by their sides. In the age next ensuing, there came up the imposition of a chaplet cap, with a Circlet of gold, that now is turned into a coronet with raies or points onely, and with a robe of estate. Which three, to wit, a sword with a girdle, a cap or chaplet with a coronet, and a mantle or robe of estate, are by three severall Earles borne before him, that is to be created Earle: and betwixt two Earles arraied also in their robes of estate, brought he is in his Surcoat unto the King sitting in his throne, where kneeling downe while the Patent or Charter of his creation is a reading: at these words, This same T. we erect, create, constitute, make, appoint, and ordaine Earle of S. and we give and grant unto him the name, title, state, stile, honour, authority, and dignitie of the Earle S. and in so it by the cincture of a sword really doe invest: Then is the robe or mantell of estate done upon him by the King: the sword hung about his neck, the cap with the Coronet put upon his head, and the said Charter of his creation being read before, delivered into his hand. But these matters are beside my purpose. Now, whereas it is growen to bee a custome, that he which is to be created Earle, if he were not a Baron before, should be made a Baron first; it is a new ceremonie come up of late daies, and put in use, since the time of King Henrie the Eighth. But among Earles, most honorable are they by many degrees, which are called Counts Palatine: For, as this terme Palatine was a name common to all them that had offices in the Kings palace; so Count Palatine was a title of dignity conferred upon him that before had bene an Officer Palatine, with a certaine roiall authority to sit in judgment within his owne Territorie. As for the Earle Mareschall of England: King Richard the second gave that title first to Thomas Mowbray Earle of Nottingham, whereas before they were simply stiled Marshalls of England and after the banishment of Mowbray, he granted to T. Holland Duke of Surrey substituted Earle Mareschall in his place, that he should carrie a rodde of gold enamelled blacke at both ends, when as before they used one of wood.

After Earles, next follow in order Vicomites, whom we call Vicounts: An old name this is of an office, but a new title of dignitie, not heard of with us before Henry the Sixth daies, who conferred that title upon I. Lord Beaumont. In the ranke of the superiour or chiefe Nobility, Barones have the next place. And although I am not ignorant, what the learned doe write of this words signification in Tullie, yet willingly will I accord to the opinion of Isidore and of an old Grammarian, who will have have Barones to signifie, hired souldiers. For, that place in Hirtius so well knowne, A touching the warre of Alexandria, seemeth cleerely to prove the same: and this it is. They came running together to defend Cassius; for, hee was wont alwaies to have about him Barones, and a great many chosen souldiers weaponed, from which the rest are severed apart. Neither dissenteth from this, the old Glossarie with Latin before Greeke, which interpreteth Baro, by Vir that is, a man. And throughout the laws of the Longobards, Baro is used for Vir, that is, a man. And for the Etymologies of this word which some have forged, I like the not. The French Heralds deduce Barones from the French tongue, as one would say, Par-hommes, that is, men of equall dignitie: our English Lawyers would have them to be as much, as Robora belli, that is, the strength of war, Some Germans say they import, as it were, Banner-heires, that is, Lord-bearing Banners. Isidorus saith, they are so termed, as a man should say, capit that is, grave or weighty. Alciaus deriveth them of Berones, an ancient people in Spaine, who were, as he saith, in times past, waged souldiers. But that derivation out of the German tongue is the better, wherein Bar betokeneth Free, and him that is his owne man, and at libertie. When this name first came into this Island I know not for certaine. The Brittaines doe not acknowledge it for theirs. In the English Saxon Lawes it is no where to be scene; nor found in the Saxon Glossarie of Alfricus among the Vocables or termes of honour; where, Dominus is translated Laforde, which wee have contracted short into Lord. The Danes called their Free-Lords, such as these Barons be at this day, Thani, and so they terme them still, as Andrew Vellius witnesseth. Howbeit, in Burgundie the use of the name hath bene of great antiquitie: For, Gregorie Turonensis writeth thus, The Barons of Burgundie as well Bishops as other Leudes, &c. In a fragment of the laws of Canutus King of English-men and Danes, was the first mention made of a Baron with us, so far as ever I could hitherto observe: and yet therein, according to the variety of copies we read indifferently these termes, Vironis, Baronis, and Thani. But that a Baron is meant therby, evident it is out of the Lawes of William the Conquerour, into which those ordinances of Canutus are in the Normans tongue translated under the name of Baro: and loe what the very words are: Exercituaia vero, &c. That is, Let the Heriots or Relevies be so moderate, as that they may bee tolerable. Of an Earle, as decent it is, eight horses, foure with saddles, and foure without saddles: foure Helmes, and foure shirts of mail: eight launces or speares, and as many shields, foure swords, and withall 200. mances of gold. Of a Viron or Baron to the King, who is next unto him, foure horses, two with saddles, and two without saddles, two swords, foure speares and as many targets, one helme, and one coate of maille, and with fifty mances of gold.

Also in the first time of the Normans, Valvasores and Thani were ranged in degree of honour, next after Earles and Barons: and the Valvasores of the better sort, if wee may beleve those that write de Feudis, were the very same that now Barons are. So that the name [Baro] may seeme to bee one of those, which time, by little and little hath mollified and made of better esteeme. Neither was it as yet a terme of great honor. For, in those daies some Earles had their Barons under them: and I remember that I read in the ancient Constitutions and ordinances of the Frenchmen, how there were under an Earle, twelve Barons, and as many Capitaines under a Baron. And certaine it is, that there be ancient Charters extant, in which Earles, since the comming in of the Normans wrote thus, To all my Barons as well French as English, Greeting, &c. Yea even Citizens of better note were called Barons. For, the Citizens of Warwick, in Domesday book, were named Barones: likewise, Citizens of London; and the Inhabitants of the Cinque-ports enjoyed the same name. But, some few yeares after, like as at Rome in times past, they chose Senators for their worth in wealth: so were they with us counted Barons, who held lands of their own by a whole Baronie: that is, 12. Knights Fees, and a third part of one Knights Fee: reckoning every fee, as an old book witnesseth, at 20.li. which make in all 400. marks. For, that was the value of one entire Baronie: and they that had lands and revenues to this worth, were wont to be summoned unto the Parliament. And it seemed to bee a dignitie with a jurisdiction: which the Court Barons, as they terme them, in some sort doe prove: yea yea and the very multitude that was of these Barons perswaded me, to thinke them to be Lords of this nature, as that they might in some sort minister and execute justice within their circuit and seigniorie, such as the Germans call Free-heires, and especially, if they had Castles of their owne. For then, they jumped just with the definition of that most famous Civilian Baldus, who defineth him to be a Baron, whosoever had a meere and subordinate rule in some castle, by the grant of the Prince. And all they, as some would have it, that held Baronies, seeme to have claimed unto themselves this honor: so that, as divers learned in our lawes are of opinion, a Baron and a Baronie, a Count or Earle and a Countie, a Duke and a Dutchie, were Conjugata: that is, termes as one would say, yoked together. Certes, in those daies, Henrie the Third reckoned

And hereupon it is, that in all the Charters and Histories of that age, all noble men in manner be called Barons: and verily that title then was right honorable, and under the terme of Baronage, all the superiour states of the kingdom, as Dukes, Marqueses, Earles and Barons, in some sort were comprised. But it attained to the highest pitch of honor, ever since that King Henrie the Third, out of so great a number, which was seditious and turbulent, called the very best, by writ or summon, unto the high Court of Parliament. For he (out of a writer I speake of good antiquity) after many troubles and enormous vexations, betwene the King himselfe, & Simon of Montfort with other Barons raised, & after appeased, did decree and ordaine, that all those Earles and Barons of the Realme of England, unto whom the King himselfe vouchsafed to direct his writs of Summons, should come unto his Parliament, and none others. But that which he began a little before his death, Edward the First and his successeur, constantly observed, and continued. Hereupon, they onely were accounted Barons of the kingdom, whom the Kings had cited by vertue of such writs of Summons, as they termed them, unto the Parliament. And it is noted, that the said prudent King Edward the First, summoned alwaies those of ancient families that were most wise to his Parliaments, but omitted their sonnes after their death, if they were not answerable to their parents in understanding. Barons were not created by Patent untill such time as King Richard the Second created Iohn Beauchamp de Holt Baron of Kidderminster by his letters Patent, bearing date the eighth day of October, in the eleventh year, of his raigne. Since that time, the Kings by their Parliaments, and the putting on of the mantle or robe of honour, have given this honour. And at this day, this order of creating a Baron by letters Patent, as also that other by writs of Summons, are in use: in which notwithstanding they are not stiled by the name of Baron, but of Chevalier; for the Common law doth not acknowledge Baron to be a name of dignity. And they that be in this wise created, are called Barons of the Parliament, Barons of the Realme, and Barons of honor, for difference of them, who yet according to that old forme of Barons, be commonly called Barons, as those of Burford, of Walton; and those who were Barons unto the Count Palatines of Chester and Pembroch, who were Barons in fee and by tenure.

England.

E These our Parliamentarie Barons carie not the bare name onely, as those of France and Germanie, but be all borne Peeres of the Realme of England, Nobles, Great States and Counsellors: and called they are by the King in these words, To treat of the high affaires of the kingdom, and thereof to give their counsell. They have also immunities and privileges of their owne, namely that in criminall causes they are not to have their triall but by a Iurie of their Peeres: that they be not put to their oath, but their protestation upon their Honor is sufficient: that they be not empannelled upon a Iurie of twelve men for enquest de facto. No supplicavit can be granted against them. A Capias cannot be sued out against them: Neither doth an Effoigne lie against them: with very many other, which I leave unto Lawyers, who are to handle these and such like. Besides these, the two Archbishops, and all the Bishops of England, be Barons also of the kingdom, and Parliament: even as in our Grandfathers daies, these Abbats and Priors following:

The Prior of Coventric. The order of S. Iohn at Ierusalem, who commonly is called Master of S. Iohns Knights, and would be counted the first and chiefe Baron of England.

Unto whom, as still unto the Bishops, By right and custome is appurtened, as to Peeres of the Kingdome, to be with the rest of the Peeres personally present at all parliaments whatsoever, there to consult, to handle, to ordaine, decree, and determine, in regard of the Baronies which they held of the King. For, William the first, (a thing that the Churchmen of that time complained of, but those in the age ensuing counted their greatest honor) ordained Bishopricks and Abbaies, which held Baronies in pure and perpetual Almes, and untill that time were free from all secular service, to bee under military or Knights service, enrolling every Bishopricke and Abbay at his will and pleasure, and appointing how many souldiers he would have every of them to find for him and his successors, in the time of hostilitie and warre. From that time ever since those Ecclesiasticall persons enjoyed all the immunities that the Barons of the Kingdome did, save onely that they were not to be judged by their Peeres. For considering that according to the Canons of the Church, such might not be present in matters of life and death: in the same causes they are left unto a iurie of twelve men to be judged, in the question of Feit, But whether this be a cleere point in law or no, I referre me to skilfull Lawyers.

Vassalors or Vassalors in old time, stood in the next ranke after Barons: whom the Lawyers derive from Valva, that is, leaved doores. And this dignitie seemeth to have come unto us from the French: For when they had soveraigne rule in Italy, they called those Valvasores who of a Duke, Marquesse, Earle or Captaine, had received the charge over some part of their people: and as Butelere the civill Lawyer saith, had power to chastise in the highest degree, but not the Libertie of faires and mercates. This was a rare dignitie among us, and if ever there were such long since by little and little, it ceased and ended. For, in Chaucers time it was not great, seeing that of his Franklin a good yeoman or Freeholder, he writeth but thus:

A Sheriffe had beene and a Countour,
Was no where such a worthy Vassalour.

Inferiour nobles are Knights, Esquires, and those which usually are called Generosi and Gentlemen.

Knights, who of our English Lawyers be termed also in Latin Milites, and in all nations well neere besides, tooke their name of Horses: for the Italians call them Cavallieri, the Frenchmen, Chevaliers, the Germans Reiters, and our Britains in Wales Margogh, all of riding. Englishmen onely terme them Knights, by a word that in the old English language, as also of the German, signifieth indifferently a servitor or minister, and a lusty young man. Heereupon it commeth, that in the Old written Gospels translated into the English tongue, wee read, for Christs Disciples, Christs Learning Cnyghts, and else where for a Client or Vassall, Inmyght: and Bracton our ancient civill Lawyer Lawyer maketh mention of Radnights, that is to say, serving horsemen: who held their lands with this condition, that they should serve their Lords on horsbacke: and so by cutting off a peece of the name, as our delight is to speake short, I thought long since, that this name of Knights remained with us. But whence it came, that our countrey-men should in penning of lawes, and in all writings since the Normans conquest terme those Knights in Latin, Milites, I can hardly see. And yet I am not ignorant, that in the declining time of the Roman Empire, the Denomination of Milites, that is, Souldiers, was transferred unto those that converting neere about the Princes person bare any of the greater offices in the Princes Court or traine. But if I have any fight at all in this matter, they were among us at first so called, who held any lands or inheritances, as Tenants in Fee, by this tenure, to serve in the warres. For those Lands were termed Knights Fees: and those that elsewhere they named Feudatary, that is, Tenants in Fee, were here called Milites, that is, Knights: as for example, Milites Regis &c. The Kings Knights, Knights of the Archbishop of Canterbury, Knights of Earle Roger of Earle Hugh &c. For that they received those lands or manors of them with this condition to serve for them in the wars, and to yeeld them fealty and homage: whereas others who served for pay were simply called Solidarij and Servientes, that is, Souldiers and Servitors. But these, call them Milites or Equites, whether you will, are with us of foure distinct sorts: The most honorable and of greatest dignitie be those of the Order of S. George, or of the Garter: In a second degree are Banerets: in a third ranke, Knights of the Bath: and in a fourth place, those who simply in our tongue, be called Knights, in Latin Equites aurati, or Milites, without any condition at all. Of S. Georges Knights, I will write in due place, when I am come to Windfor. Of the rest thus much briefly at this time.

Banerets, whom others terme untruely Baronets, have their name of a Banner: For, granted it was unto them in regard of their martiall vertue and prowesse, to use a foure square ensigne or Banner, as well as Barons: whereupon some call them and that truly Equites vexillarij, that is, Knights-Banerets, and the Germans, Bannerheires. The antiquitie of these Knights Banerets, I cannot fetch from before the time of King Edward the Third, when Englishmen were renowned for Chivalrie: so that I would beleve verily, that this honorable title was devised then first, in recompence of martiall prowesse, untill time shall bring more certainty of truth to light. In the publicke records of that time, mention is made among military titles, of Banerets, of Men at the Banner, (which may seeme all one) and of Men at armes. And I have scene a Charter of King Edward the Third, by which he advanced Iohn Coupland to the State of a Baneret, because in a battell fought at Durham hee had taken prisoner David the Second, King of the Scots; and it runneth in these words: Being willing to reward the said Iohn, who tooke David de Bruis prisoner, and frankly delivered him unto us; for the deserts of his honest and valiant service, in such sort as others may take example by this present to doe us faithfull service in time to come; we have promoted the said Iohn to the place and degree of a Baneret: and for the maintenance of the same state, we have granted for us and our heires to the same Iohn, five hundred pounds by the yeare, to bee received for him and his heires, &c. Worth the remembrance it is, to set downe heere out of Froissard the very maner and forme, whereby Iohn Chandos a brave & noble warrior in his time was made a Baneret. What time as Edward Prince of Wales, saith he, was to fight a field in the behalfe of Peter King of Castile against Henry the Bastard and the Frenchmen, Iohn Chandos came unto the Prince and delivered into his hands his own Banner folded and rolled up, with these words: My Lord, this is my Banner, may it please you to unfold and display it, that I may advance it into the field this day. For, I have by Gods favour renewed sufficient thereunto. The Prince then, and Peter King of Castile who stood hard by, tooke the Banner into their hands, unfolding the same, delivered it again unto him with these or such like words: Sir Iohn, in the name of God, who bleste this dayes service of yours, that it may speed well and turne to your glorie, Beare your selfe manfully, and give prooffe what a Knight you are. Having thus received the Banner, to his companies he went with a cheerefull heart: My fellow low souldiers, quoth he, Behold there is my Banner and yours, in case yee defend it courageously as your owne. Of later time, he that is to be advanced unto this dignity, either before the battell, that hee may bee encouraged; or after the battell ended, that hee may receive due honor for his valour, bearing an ensigne of a long fashion, such as they call a Pennon wherein his owne armes are depainted in their colours, is brought between two elderly Knights, with trumpeters and Heralds going before, into the presence of the King, or his Regent or Lieutenant generall: who after good words and wishes imparting happie fortune, commandeth the tip or point of the said pennon to bee cut off, that of a long pennon it might bee made a foure square banner.

the Bath.

Concerning Knights of the Bath, in all my readings hitherto, I could find no greater Antiquitie thereof, than this, that they were in use among the ancient French: and that Henrie the Fourth King of England, that day whereon hee was crowned in the Tower of London, dubbed 46. Esquiers Knights, who the night before had watched and bathed: unto every one of whom, hee gave greene side coats reaching downe to their ankles, with streit sleeves, and furred with miniver: also, they they were upon their left shoulder two cordons of white filke with tassels thereto hanging downe. These in former times were wont to be created, and selected out of the flower of Nobilitie (which had not before taken the degree of Knighthood) at the coronation of Kings and Queenes, and at their marriages: sometimes also, when their sonnes were invested Princes of Wales, or Dukes, or when they solemnly received the cincture or militarie girdle of Knighthood, and that with many ceremonies, which now for the most part are grown out of use. But in our daies, they that are called by the King to enter into this order (neither will I handle this argument exquisitely) the day before they are created, being clad in an Eremits gray weed, with a hood, a linnen coife, and booted withall, come devoutly to divine service, to begin their warfare there, as if they would employ their service for God especially: they suppe all together: and upon every one of them, there wait two Esquiers, and one Page: After supper, they retire themselves into their bed-chamber, where for each of them is prepared a prettie bed, with red curtains, and their owne armes fastened thereupon, with a bathing vessell standing close by, covered with linnen clothes, wherein after they have said their prayers, and commended themselves to God, they bathe themselves, that thereby they might bee put in mind, to be pure in bodie and soule from thenceforth. The next morrow, early in the morning awakened they are, and raised with a noyse of Muscical Instruments, and doe on the same apparell. Then the high Constable of England, the Earle Marshall, and others whom the King appointeth, come unto them, call them forth in order: and tender an oath unto them, namely, that they shall serve and worship God above all, defend the Church, honour the King, maintaine his rights, protect widowes, virgins, orphans, and to their power repell and put by all wrong. When they have sworne thus to doe, by laying their hand upon the Gospels, they are brought with state to morning prayer, the kings Musicians and Heralds going before, and by them likewise, they are conducted backe to their bed-chambers: where after they have devedsted themselves from their Eremites weed, they put on a mantle of martiall redde Taffara, implying they should bee Martiall men, and a white Hat with a white plume of feathers over their linnen coife, in token of sincerity, and tie a paire of white gloves to the pendant cordon of their mantle. This done, they mount upon Steddes, dight with sadle and furniture of blacke leather, with white intermingled, and having a crosse in the frontlet. Before every one of them rideth his owne Page, carrying a sword with a gilded hilt, at which there hang gilt spurs, and of either hand of them ride their Esquiers. With this pompe, and trumpets sounding before them, to the Kings Court they goe, where when they are brought by two ancient Esquiers to the Kings presence, the Page delivereth the Girdle and Sword hanging thereto, unto the Lord Chamberlaine, and he with great reverence unto the King, who therewith girdeth the Knight overthwart, and commandeth therewith two elder Knights to put on the Spurres, who in times past were wont with

A with good wishes, and prayers to kisse his knees that was to bee Knighted. And these new Knights thus created, used in old time to bring up the service of meates to the Kings Table: after this, they dine altogether, sitting to one side of the boord, every one under the Escutcheon of his owne Armes fastened over his head. At evening praier they repair to the chapel, offer their swords upon the high altar, and by laying downe a piece of money redeeme the same againe. Now, as they returne from divine service, the Kings Master-Cooke sheweth them his knife, and admonisheth them to performe the part of good and faithfull Knights, otherwise he would to their shame and reproch, cut off those Spurres of theirs. Upon the Coronation day, in that solemne pompe, they accompanie the King keeping their places, with their Swords girt to them, and their spurres on, in Joviall blew mantles, as a man would say, in the colour of just Jupiter, as a fore-token of justice, having the knot of white filke made in forme of a crosse, with an hood upon their left shoulder. But of these complements (which my purpose was not to prosecute in particular) this may bee thought sufficient, if not superfluous.

Now as touching those Knights, who simply without any addition bee called, Knights, and howsoever they are in order ranged last, yet by institution they be first, and of greatest Antiquitie. For, as the Romans, a gowned nation, gave unto them that were entering into mans estate, a virile and plaine gowne, without welt or gard: even so, the Germans our Ancestors bestowed upon their young men, whom they judged meet for to manage armes, armour, and weapons. Which Cornelius Tacitus will informe you of, in these words of his: The manner was not for any one to take armes in hand, before the State allowed him as sufficient for Martiall service. And then, in the very assembly of Counsell, either some one of the Princes, or the father of the young man, or one of his kinsfolke furnish him with a shield and a javelin. This with them standeth in stead of a virile gowne, this is the first honour done to youth: before this they seeme to bee but part of a private house, but now within a while members of the Commonwealth.

Knights.

De moribus Germanorum.

D And seeing that such military young men, they termed in their language (as we in ours) Knechts, from them I deeme, the originall both of name and institution also, ought to be fetched. This was the first, and most simple manner of creating a Knight, this the Lombards, this the Franks, this our countrymen, all descended out of Germanie in old time used. Paulus Diaconus reporteth thus; among the Lombards, This is the Custome, that the Kings sonne dineth not with his father, unlesse hee receive Armes before from some King of a forraigne nation. The Annals of France record, that the Kings of the Franks, gave armes unto their sonnes, and to others, and girded them with a sword: yea, and our Aelfred, as William of Malmesburie witnesseth, when he dubbed Athelstan his nephew, Knight, being a child of great hope, gave him a scarlet mantle, a belt or girdle set with precious stones, and a Saxon-sword with a golden scabbard. Afterwards, when as religion had possessed mens minds so, as that they thought nothing well & fortunately done, but what came from Church-men, our Ancestors a little before the Normans coming received the Sword at their hands. And this, Ingulphus who lived in those daies, sheweth in these words: He that was to be consecrated unto lawfull warfare, should the evening before, with a contrite heart, make confession of his sinnes unto the Bishop, Abbat, Monke, or Priest, and being absolved, give himselfe to prayer, and lodge all night in the Church, and when hee was to heare divine service the morrow after, offer his sword upon the Altar: and after the Gospel, the Priest was to put the sword first hallowed upon the Knights neck, with his Benediction, and so when hee had heard Masse againe, and received the Sacrament, he became a lawfull Knight. Neither grew this custome out of use streight waies under the Normans: For, John of Sarisburie writeth in his Polycraticon, thus; A solemne Custome was taken up and used, that the very day when any one was to be honoured with the girdle of knighthood, hee should solemnly goe to Church, and by laying and offering his sword upon the Altar, vow himselfe perpetuall service, and obsequious dutie unto the Lord. Peter also of Blois, writeth thus:

Epist. 94.

At this day young Knights, and souldiers receive their Swords from the Altar, that they might professe themselves Sonnes of the Church, and to have taken the Sword for defence of the poore, for punishment and revenge of malefactors, and delivery of their Country. But in proceſſe of time (saith he) it is turned cleane contrary. For, in these daies since they are become adorned with the Knights cincture, presently they arise against the Anointed of the Lord, and rage upon the patrimonie of Christ crucified. And as for this ceremonie, that they would be girt with a Sword, it may seeme no doubt to have proceeded from the militarie discipline of the Romans; because as they denied it unlawfull to fight with their enemy before they were bound to their militarie oath, by a drawn sword: even so, our Forefathers thought they might not go to warfare lawfully, before they were by this ceremonie lawfully authorized: according to which wee reade, that William Rufus King of England, was dubbed Knight, by Lanfranke the Archbishop. But this custome by little and little grew to disuse, since the time that the Normans, as Ingulphus writeth, laughed and scorned at it; and in a Synode at Westminster, An. 1102. a Canon passed, That no Abbats should dubbe Knights: which some notwithstanding expound thus, That Abbats should grant no lands of the Church to be held, by Knights service, or in Knights fee, or service.

Afterwards, Kings were wont to send their sonnes unto the neighbour Princes to receive Knighthood at their hands: thus, was our K. Henrie the Second, sent unto David King of the Scots, and Malcolm King of Scots unto our Henry the Second, and our Edward the first unto the King of Castile, to take of them Militarie or Virile armes: for, these termes and phrases they used in that age for the creation of a Knight. Then it was also, that besides the sword and girdle, gilt spurs were added for more ornament; whereupon at this day, they are called in Latin, Equites aurati. Moreover, they had the priviledge to weare & use a signet: for before they were dubbed knights, (as I gather out of Abendon Booke) it was not lawfull to use a seale: Which writing (quoth he) Richard Earle of Chester purposed to signe with the seale of his mother Ermenstrud, considering that all Letters which he directed (for as yet he had not * taken the Militarie girdle) were made up and closed within his mothers signet. In the age ensuing, knights (as it may be well collected) were made by their wealth, and state of living: For, they which had a great knights Fee, that is, (if wee may beleve old records) * 680.akers of land, claimed as their right, the ornaments and badges of knighthood: Nay rather under Henry the Third, they were compelled after a sort to be knights, as many as in revenues of their lands might dispend fifteen pounds by the year: so as now it seemed a title of burden, rather than of honour. In the year 1256. there went out an edict from the King, by verue whereof, commandement was given, & proclamation made throughout the Realme, that whosoever had fifteen pounds in land and above, should be dight in his armes, and endowed with knighthood: so the end that England as well as Italie might be strengthened with Chivalrie: and they that would not, or were not able to maintaine the honour of knighthood, should fine for it, and pay a piece of money. Hence it is, that in the Kings Records, we meet so often with this: For respit of Knighthood, A. de N. Lett. Eyc. Also such like presentments from the Jurors, or sworne Enquest, as this R. de S. Lawrence holdeth an entire and whole Fee, is at full age, and not yet Knight, therefore in misericordia, that is, To be fined at the Kings pleasure. To this time and after, unless I faile in mine observation, in the Briefes and Instruments our law when twelve men, or Jurors are named, before whom there passeth trial or prooffe de facto, that is, of a fact, they be called, Milites, that is, Knights, who have a compleat Fee, and those Milites gladio cincti, that is, Knights with cincture of sword, who by the King are girded with the belt of knighthood. At which time when the King was to create knights, as the said Matthew Paris writeth, he sat gloriously in his seate of estate, arrayed in cloth of gold of the most precious and costly Bawdkin, and crowned with his Crowne of gold, and to every Knight he allowed or gave 100. shillings, for his * harnessments. And not only the King, but also Earles in those daies created Knights. For the same author reporteth, How the Earle of Gloucester invested with a militarie girdle his brother William, after he had proclaimed a Turnement. Simon likewise de Montefort Earle of Leiceſter, did the same by Gilbert de Clare: Like as in France, (a thing that evidently appeareth by the Patent or Instrument of * Nobilitation) he that hath obtained such letters of * Ennobliſhment, is enabled to be dubbed Knight, and receive the girdle of knighthood at any Knights hand that he will himselfe. But since that time, hath no man with us beene created Knight, but either by the King himselfe, or the Kings eldest sonne, warranted before by authoritie received from his father, or else by the Kings Lieutenant, or Deputie Generall in the Campe, and that in consideration either of some valiant acts achieved, or exploits to be performed abroad in armes: or else of wisdom and policie at home. And verily a most prudent and wise order was this, that our Kings tooke, since they had not any Fees or Lands now to bestow upon them. Neither was their (I assure you) any thing of more validitie, to give an edge unto the courage of hardy men, and to bind unto them their best subjects, and such as had deserved well, (being otherwise worshipfully descended, and of honourable parentage, and withall sufficient for estate and living) than kindly and lovingly to adorne them with this high esteemed title of Knighthood, which was before time the name only of charge and function: when this right worshipfull title was by the Prince conferred upon one, adviſedly and for desert, it went (no doubt) for an ample reward, was prized as a benefit, and accounted among the tokens of honour. For, Knights in this manner dubbed, made this esteeme thereof, that in it consisted the gerdon of their vertue and valour, the praise of their house and family, the memorie of their stocke and linage; and lastly, the glory of their name. Infomuch, as our Lawyers have in their bookes written, That [Knight] was a name of dignitie, but so was not Baron. For in old time a Baron (if he were not of this order of Knighthood) was written simply by his Christian, or fore-name, and the proper name of his family, without any addition, unless it were of Dominus, a terme fitting Knights also. And this name of Knight may seeme to have beene an honourable additament to the highest dignitie, when Kings, Dukes, Marquesses, Earles, and Barons, requested to have the dignitie, and name together. Heere it likes me well to inferre, what Matthew Florilegus hath written concerning the creation of Knights in the time of Edward the First. The King (quoth he) for to augment and make a goodly shew of his expedition into Scotland, caused publike proclamation to be made throughout England, that whosoever were to be Knights by hereditarie succession, and had wherewith to maintaine that degree, should present themselves in Westminster, at the feast of Whitsontide, there to receive every one, the ornaments of a Knight, (saving the equipage or furniture that belongeth to horses) out of the Kings Wardrobe. When as therefore there flocked thither to the number of 300. young gallants, the Sons of Earles, Barons, and Knights, purple liveries, fine silke Scarfes, Roabes most richly embroidered with gold, were plentifully bestowed among them, according as was besitting each one: And because the Kings Palace, (large though it were) was streited of roome, for so great a multitude assembled, they cut downe the apple trees about the new Temple in London, laid the walles along, and there set up pavilions and tents, wherein these noble young gallants might array, and set out themselves one by one in their gorgeous and golden garments. All the night long also, these foresaid youths, as many as the place would receive watched and prayed in the said Temple. But the Prince of Wales, by commandement from the King his father, held his wake, together with the principall and goodliest men of this company within the Church of Westminster. Now such sound was there of trumpets, so loud a noise of minstrelsie, so mightie an applause and cry of those that for joy shouted, that the chaunting of the Convent could not be heard from one side of the Quire to the other. Well, the morrow after, the King dubbed his Sonne Knight, and gave him the Girdle of Knighthood in his owne palace, and therewith bestowed upon him the Duchie of Aquitaine. The Prince then, thus created Knight, went directly into Westminster Church for to grace with the like glorious dignitie his seers and companions. But so great was the preafe of people thronging before the High Altar, that two Knights were thronged to death, and very many of them fainted; and were readie to swoone, yea, although every one of them had three souldiers at least to lead and protect him: The Prince himselfe by reason of the multitude praesing up to him, having divided the people by the meanes of steeds of service, no otherwise than upon the high Altar girt him fore said companions with the order of knighthood. But in our daies, hee that receiveth the dignitie of a Knight, kneeleth downe, and then the * King with his sword drawne, slightly smiteth him upon the shoulder, speaking unto him these words withall, in French, Sois Chevalier au nom de Dieu, that is, Be thou Knight in the name of God: and afterwards hee faith moreover, Avances Chevalier, that is, Arise Sir Knight. As for all things else appertaining to this order, namely, what an excellent and glorious degree this of knighthood was esteemed with our Ancestours, how noble a reward to brave minded men, such as desired glorie and honour, it was reputed, how carefully they kept faith & troth, considering it was sufficient, if they undertook or promised ought as faithfull Knights or upon the faith of a Knight, how far they were from base gaine and lucre, and what manner of payment or Aid is to be levied for Knights fees, when as the Prince, the Kings eldest son should be invested in this honour, &c. I leave it for others to write: as also, when they had so far offended, that being to suffer death therfore, they were first disposed of their ensignes, and of their degree, to wit, their militarie Girdle ungirted, the Sword taken away, their Spurs cut off with an hatchet, their Gantlets or Gloves plucked from them, and the Escutcheon of their Armes reversed:

like as in the degrading * Ecclesiasticall order, all the Ecclesiasticall ornaments, booke, chalice, & such like are taken away. Let the curious also enquire, whether those knights were truly by some termed Knights Bachelars, or whether Bachelars were of a middle degree between these Knights and Esquires: For, in the Kings Record are read, The names of Knights, of Bachelars, and of Valets of the Earle of Gloucester, and of others. Whereupon there be that would have Bachelars so called, as one would say, Baf-Chevaliers, that is, knights of low degree: although other derive that name from the French verbe Battailer, which signifieth to combat or fight it out. Withall, let them weigh and consider, whether these dignities of knighthood in times past so glorious, (as long as they were more rare, and bestowed onely as the reward of vertue) may not be vilified, when it becometh common, and lieth prostitute (as it were) to the ambitious humour of every one. Whereof in the like case Æmilius Probus complained long fince among the Romans.

Esquires.

Next in degree after these Knights, are Esquires, termed in Latine, Armigeri, that is, Costrels, or Bearers of Armes: the same that Scutiferi, that is, Shield-bearers, and Ho- mines ad arma, that is, Men at Armes: the Goths called them Schilpor, all of carrying the shield: as in old time among the Romans, such as were named Scutarii, who tooke that name either of their Escutcheons of armes, which they bare as Ensignes of their descent, or because they were armour-bearers to Princes, or to the better sort of the Nobilitie. For, in times past every Knight had two of these waighting upon him: they carried his Morion and shield, as inseparable companions, they stuck close unto him, because of the said Knight their Lord they held certaine lands in Escutage, like as the knight himselfe of the King by knights service. But now a daies, there be five distinct sorts of these: for those whom I have spoken of already, be now no more in any request. The principall Esquires at this day those are accounted, that are select Esquires for the Princes bodie: the next unto them be knights eldest sonnes, and their eldest sonnes likewise successively. In a third place, are reputed younger sonnes of the eldest sonnes of Barons, and of other Nobles in higher estate: and when such heires male faile, together with them the title also faileth. In a fourth ranke are re-coked those, unto whom the King himselfe, together with a title, giveth armes, or createth Esquires, by putting about their necke a silver collar of * SS. and (in former times) upon their heeles a paire of white spurs silvered: whereupon at this day in the West part of the Kingdome, they be called White-spurs, for distinction from Knights who are wont to wear gilt spurs: and to the first begotten sonnes onely of these doth the title belong. In the fifth and last place be those ranged, and taken for Esquires, whosoever have any superiour publike office in the Common-weale, or serve the Prince in any Worshipfull calling. But this name of Esquire, which in ancient time was a name of charge and office onely, crept first among other chard the Second.

of worshipfull parentage, or raised up from the base condition of people, for their vertue or wealth.

Citizens or Burgeses, be such as in their owne severall citie execute any publike office, and by election have a roome in our High Court of Parliament.

Yeomen, are they whom some call, Free-borne, or Free-holders, and our law termeth, Homines Legales, that is, Lawfull men, and who of Free-lands may dispend fortie shillings at least by the yeare.

Yeomen;

Lastly, Craftsmen, Artisans, or Workemen, be they that labour for hire, and namely, such as sit at worke, Mechanicke Artificers, Smiths, Carpenters, &c. Which were termed of the Romans, Capite censi, as one would say, Taxed or reckoned by the poll, and Proletarii.

LAWV COVRTS OF ENGLAND.

S touching the Tribunals, or Courts of Justice of England, there are three sorts of them among us: for, some bee Ecclesiasticall, others Temporall, and one mixt of both, which being the greatest, and most honourable of all, is called by a name of no great antiquitie, and the same borrowed out of French, The Parlia- ment. The Anglo-Saxons our ancestours termed it, Wittena- ge-moot, that is, An assembly of the wise, and ge-pædnirr, that is,
A Councell, and Wiciljynod, of the Greeke word Synodus, that is, A great Synod or meeting. The Latine writers of that, and the ensuing age called it, Commune Concilium, Curiam altissimam, Generale placitum, Curiam magnam, Magnatum Convantum, Presen- tiam Regis, Pralatorum, Procerumq;, collectorum, Commune totius Regni Concilium, &c.
That is, The Common councell, The Highest court, The Generall Plea, The Great court, The meeting of States, The Presence of the King, Prelates and Peeres assembled together, The Publike Councell of the whole Kingdome, &c. And like as the Generall Councell of all Erolia is named by Livie PANATOLIUM, so this may well be termed PANANGOLIUM.
For it consisteth of the King, the Clergie, the superior Nobles, the elect Knights and Burgeses; or to speake more significantly after the Lawyers phrase, of the King, the Lords Spirituall, and Temporall, and the Commons, which States represent the body of all England. It is not held at set and certaine times; but summoned by the King at his pleasure, so often as consultation is to be had of high affaires and urgent matters, that the Common weale may sustaine no damage; at his will alone it is dissolved. Now this Court hath soveraigne, and sacred authoritie in making, confirming, repealing, and expounding Lawes, in restoring such as be attained or outlawed to their former estates, in deciding of the hardest controversies betwene private persons, and, to speake at a word, in all causes which may concerne either the safetie of the State, or any private person whatsoever.

Parliament.

The next Court after this, in the daies presently following the Normans comming, and some good while after, was, The Court of the King himselfe, and the same kept in the Kings house or Pallas, &c. accompanying the King whither so ever he retired or went in progresse. For, in the Kings Palace, a place there was for the Chancellor and clerks, such as were employed about writs or proccesses, and the seale for Judges also that handled as well Pleas (as they terme them) pertaining unto the Kings Crown, as betwene one Subject and another. There was also the Exchequer, wherein the Lord Treasurer, Auditours, and Receivers sat, who had the charge of the Kings revenues, treasure, and coffers. Every of these being counted of the Kings household in ordinary, had allowed them from the King, both diet, and apparell. Whereupon Gotzelinus in the life of S.
Edward, calleth them, The Lawyers of the Palace, & John of Salisburie, The Court Law- yers. But beside these and above them all, was one appointed for administration of Justice, named, Iustitia Anglie, The Iustice of England; Prima Iustitia, The principall Iustice, The Iusticer of England, and chiefe Iusticer of England, who, with a yearly pension of a thousand Marks, was ordained by a Commission or Charter running in these termes, The King, to all Archbishops, Bishops, Abbats, Priors, Earles, Barons, Sherifes, Forsters, and all other liege and faithfull people of England, greeting. Whereas for the preservation of our selves, and the peace of our Kingdome, and for the ministring of Iustice, in all and every person of our Realme, we have ordained our beloved and trustie Philip Basse, Chiefe Iusticer of England, so long as it shall please us; wee charge you upon the faith and allegiance that yee owe unto us, and doe straightly enioyne you, that in all things which concern the office of our foresaid Iusticeship, and the preservation of our peace, and Kingdome, yee fully attend, and assistant unto him, so long as he shall continue in the said Office. Witness the King, &c.

But when as in the raigne of Henry the Third, enacted it was that the Common Pleas of the Subjects should not follow the Kings Court, but be held in some certain place: within a while after, the Chancery and the Court of the Pleas of the Crowne, together with the Exchequer, were translated from the Kings Court, and established in certain places apart by themselves: as some, I know not how truly, have reported.

Having premised by way of Preface thus much, I will proceede to write briefly somewhat of these Courts, and others that arise from them, according as they are kept at this day. And whereas some of them bee Courts of Law, to wit; the King Bench, The common Bench or Pleas, the Exchequer, the Assises, the Star-Chamber, the Court of Wards, and the Admirals Court: others of Equitie, namely; The Chancery, the Court of Requests, The Counsell in the Marches of Wales, and in the North parts; of every of these in due order, somewhat, as I have learned of others.

Kings Bench. The Kings Bench, so called because the Kings were wont there to sit as President in proper person, handleth the pleas of the Crowne, and many other matters which pertaine to the King, and the Weale publique: and withall it sitteth and examineth the errors of the Common Pleas. The Judges there, beside the King when it pleaseth him to be present, are, the Lord chiefe Justice of England, and other Justices foure, or more, as the King shall thinke good.

Common Pleas. The common Pleas hath that name because in it are debated the common Pleas betweene Subject and Subject, according to our law, which they call common Heerein give judgement. The chiefe Iustice of the common Pleas, with foure Justices assistants or more. Officers attendant there be, The Keeper of the Briefes or writs, Three Protonotaries, and inferiour Ministers very many.

Exchequer. The Exchequer tooke that name of a boord or table whereat they sat. For, thus writeth Gervase of Tilburie, who lived in the yeere 1160. The Exchequer is a four cornered boord, about ten foote long, and five foote broad, fitted in manner of a table for men to sit round about it. On every side a standing ledge or border it hath of the breadth of foure fingers. Upon this Exchequer boord is laid a cloth bought in Easter terme, and the same of black colour, and rewed with stripes distant one from another a foote or a span. And a little after. This Court, by report, began from the very Conquest of the Realme, and was erected by King William: howbeit the reason and proportion thereof, taken from the Exchequer beyond Sea. In this are all causes heard which belong unto the Kings treasury. Judges therein, be The Lord Treasurer of England, The Chancellor of the Exchequer, The Lord chiefe Baron, with three or foure other Barons of the Exchequer. The servitours and Ministers to this Court are, The Kings Remembrancer, The Lord Treasurers Remembrancer, The Clerke of the Pipe, The Controller of the Pipe: Auditors of the revenues five: The Forrein Opposer, The Clerke of the Estreights, The Clerke of the Pleas, The Mareſhall, The Clerke of the Summons, The Deputie Chamberlaines Secundaries in the office of the Kings Remembrancer two, Secundaries in the office of the Lord Treasurers Remembrancer two, Secundaries of the Pipe two, Clerkes in divers offices foure, &c. In the other part of the Exchequer called the Receipt, these bee the Officers: Two Chamberlains, a vice Treasurer, Clerke of the Tallies, Clerke of the Pels, Tellers foure, Tynners of Tallies two, Deputie Chamberlaines two: The Clerke for Tallies, The Keeper of the Treasury, Messengers or Pursuivants ordinarie foure: Scribes two, &c. The Officers likewise of the Tenth and first Fruits belong to this Court, who were ordained, when as the Popes authoritie was banished and abolished, and an act passed, by which it was provided that the Tenth, and first fruits of Churchmens Benefices should be paid unto the King.

Beside these three Kings Courts for law, to cut off delays, to ease the subject also of travell and charges, King Henrie the Second sent some of these Judges and others yearly into every Shire or Countie of the Realme, who were called Iustices Itinerant, and commonly Iustices in Eyre. These determined and gave judgement, as well of the Pleas of the Crowne, as the Common Pleas, within those Counties whereunto they were assigned. For, the said King, as Matthew Paris saith, By the counsell of his sonne and the Bishops together, appointed Iustices to fixe parts of the Kingdome: in every part three, who should sweare to keepe and maintaine the right belonging to every man, sincerely and uncorruptly. But this ordinance vanished at length under Edward the Third: Howbeit, within a while after by Parliamentary authoritie, it was in some sort revived. For the Counties being divided into certain Circuits, as wee termethem, two of the Kings Justices together twice in the yeare ride about and keepe their Circuits, for to give definitive sentence of the Prisoners, and as we use to speake, to deliver the Goales or Prisons. Whereupon in our Lawyers Latin, they bee called Iusticiarii Gaole deliberanda, that is, Justices for Goale deliverie: as also to take Recognizances of Assises of new Defeisme, &c. whereof they be named Iustices of the Assises, to end and dispatch controversies depending, and growne to an issue in the foresaid principall Kings Courts, betweene plaintifffes and defendants, and that, by their Peeres, as the custome is: whence they are commonly called Iustices of Nisi prius, which name they tooke of the writs sent unto the Sheriffe, which have in them these two words, Nisi Prius, that is, Unless before, &c.

The Star-Chamber or the Court rather of Kings Counsell, wherein are discussed and handled criminall matters, perjuries, couſenages, fraud, deceit, riots or excesses, &c. This Court in regard of time is right ancient, and for dignitie most honourable. For it seemes that it may claime antiquitie ever since the first time that Subject appealed unto their Sovereignes, and the Kings Counsell was erected. Now, the Judges of this Court are persons right Honourable, and of greatest reputation, even the Kings Privie Counsellors. As for the name of Star-Chamber, it tooke it from the time that this Counsell was appointed at Westminster in a Chamber there anciently garnished, and beautified with Starres: For we read in the Records of Edward the Third, Counseil en la Chambre des Estoilles, pres de la Receipt at Westminster, that is The Counsell in the Chamber of Starres, neere unto the Receipt at Westminster. But the Authoritie thereof, that most sage and wise Prince Henry the Seventh, by authoritie of Parliament so augmented and established, that some are of opinion, though untruly, hee was the first founder of it. The Judges heere, are The Lord Chancellor of England, The Lord Treasurer of England, The Lord President of the Kings Counsell, The Lord Keeper of the Privy Seale, and all Counsellors of the State, as wel Ecclesiasticall as Temporal: and out of the Barons of the Parliament, those whom the King will call: The two chiefe Iustices of the Benches, or in their absence two other Judges. The Officers heerein are these, The Clerke of the Counsell, The Clerke of writs and processe of the Counsell in the Star Chamber, &c. And causes here are debated and decided not by Peeres according to our common Law, but after the course of Civill Law.

The Court of Wards and Liveries hath the name of Pupils or Wards, whose causes it handleth; was first instituted by Henrie the Eighth; whereas in former times their causes were heard in the Chancery and Exchequer. For, by an old Ordinance derived out of Normandie, and not from Henry the Third (as some doe write) when a man is deceased, who holdeth possessions or Lands of the King in chiefe by Knights service, as well the heire as his whole patrimonie and revenues are in the Kings power, tuition, and and protection, untill he be full one and twentie yeares of age, and untill by vertue of the Kings briefe or letter, restitution and re-delivery be made unto him thereof: In this Court, the Generall Master sitteth as Judge: under whom are these, The Supra-wisor, or Survivor of Liveries, The Attorney generall of the Court, The generall Receiver, The Auditor, The Clerke of the Liveries, The Clerke of the Court, Forie Fedaries, and a Messenger.

There have sprung up also in these later times, two other Courts, to wit, Of reforming Errors: whereof the first is, to correct Errors in the Exchequer, the other to amend errors committed in the Kings Bench. The Judges in the former of these twaine, are the Lord Chancellor, and Lord Treasurer of England, with others of the Kings Justices whom they are disposed to take unto them. In the later, The Justices of the Common Pleas, and the Barons of the Exchequer.

Admirals Court.

The Admirals Court handleth Sea matters. In this are reckoned the Lord Admiral of England, his Lieutenant, and a Judge: two Scribes, a Serjeant of the Court, and the Vice-Admirals of England. Now proceede we to the Courts of Equitie.

Chancerie.

The Chancerie drew that name from a Chancellor: which name under the ancient Roman Emperours, was not of so greates esteeme and dignitie, as wee learne out of Vopiscus. But now adaeas a name it is of highest honour, and Chancellors are advanced to the highest pitch of civill Dignitie. Whose name Cassiodorus fetcheth from crosse grates or lattices, because they examined matters, within * places severd apart enclosed with partitions of such crosse bars which the Latins call Cancelli. Regard, saith hee to a Chancellor what name you beare: It cannot bee hidden which you doe within Lattices. For you keepe your gates lightsome; your barres open, and your doores transparent as windows. Whereby, it is very evident, that he sate within grates, where he was to be seene on every side, and thereof it may be thought he tooke that name. But, considering it was his part, being as it were the Princes mouth, eie, and eare, to strike and dash out with crosse-lines latise like, those letters, Commissions, Warrants, and Decrees passed against law and right, or prejudiciall to the common-wealch, which not improperly they termed to cancell, some thinke the name of Chancellor came from this Cancelling: and in a Glossarie of latter time thus we read, A Chancellor is he whose Office is, to looke into and peruse the writings and answers of the Emperour: to cancell what is written amisse, and to signe that which is well. Neither is that true, which Polydore Virgil writeth, namely, that William the Conquerour instituted a Colledge or fellowship of Scribes, to write letters patents, &c. and named the Master of that Societie, Chancellor: considering it is plaine and manifest that Chancellors were in England before the Normans Conquest. How great the dignitie and authoritie of the Chancellor is at this day, it is better knowne than I can declare: but of what credit it was in old time, have here in a word or two out of a writer of good antiquitie. The dignitie of the Chancellor of England is this, He is reputed the second person in the Realme, and next unto the King, with the one side of the Kings Seale, (whereof by his Office he hath the Keeping) he may signe his owne injunctions, to dispose and order the Kings Chappell as hee liketh, to receive and keepe all Archbishopsricks, Bishopsricks, Abbeies, and Baronies, void and falling into the Kings hand, to be present at all the Kings Councils, and thither to repaire uncalled: also that all things be signed by the hand of his Clerke who carrieth the Kings Seale, and that all things be directed and disposed by advise of the Chancellor. Item, that by the helpfull merits of his good life through Gods grace, he need not die, if he will himselfe, but Archbishop or Bishop: And heereof it is, that the Chancellor-ship is not to be bought. The forme and manner of ordaining a Chancellor, (for that also I will note) was in the time of King Henry the Second, by hanging the great Seale of England about the necke of the Chancellor elect. But in King Henry the Sixth daies, this was the order of it, according to the notes I tooke out of the Records. When the place of the Lord Chancellor of England is void by death, the Kings three great Seales, to wit, one of gold, and other two of silver, which remained in the custodie of the Chancellor, presently after his death are shut up in a wooden chest fast locked, and signed with the Seales of the Lords then present, and so conveyed into the Treasurie: From thence brought they are to the King, who in the presence of many Noblemen

* Secretum, that is, the place of Judgement. Epist. 6. lib. 11.

Robert Fitz-Stephen, who lived under Henry the Second.

*Noblemen delivereth them into the hands of him that shall be Chancellor, and undertaketh the charge of executing the Office of Chancellorship, taking before an oath of him, well and truly to exercise the same: first he delivereth the great Seale of silver, then that of gold, and so the other of silver: who receiving the same bestoweth them againe in the chest: and being signed with his owne Seale conveyeth it home to his owne house, and before certaine of the Nobilitie, causeth the Kings Patents and writs to be Sealed. When a Chancellor is discharged of his place, he delivereth up into the Kings hands in the presence of the Lords and Nobles, those three Seales, first, the Seale of gold, then one broad Seale of silver, and so another of a lesse forme. Howbeit at this day one Seale and no more is delivered unto the Chancellor, neither is there mention any where made of these three Seales, but in the raigne of Henry the Sixth. To this Chancellors Office in proceesse of time much authoritie and dignitie hath been adjoynd by authoritie of Parliament, especially ever since that Lawyers stood so precisely upon the strict points of Law, and caught men with the traps and snares of their law termes; that of necessitie there was a Court of equitie to be erected, and the same committed to the Chancellor, who might give judgement according to equitie and reason, and moderate the extremities of law, which was wont to bee thought extreme wrong. In this Court there sitteth as President, the Lord Chancellor of England, and as assessors or assistants to him, twelve Masters of the Chancerie: whereof the chiefe and principall is the Keeper of the Rolls belonging to the same Court, and thereupon he is called Master of the Rolles. There belong also to this Court very many Officers, of whom some attend especially upon the Kings Seale, namely, The Clerke of the Crown, The Clerke of the Hanaper, The Sealer, The Chauff-wax, The Controller of the Hanaper, Cursitors twenty foure, A Clerke for the writs of Sub-paena. Others are attendant upon Bills of complaint there exhibited, to wit, A Protonotarie, sixe Clerkes, or Attornies of the Court, and a Register. There belong also thereto the Clekes of the Petty Bag, The Clerke of Presentations, The Clerke of Faculties, The Clerke for examination of Letters Patents, The Clerke for dismissions, &c.*

There is another Court also derived out of the Kings Privie Counsell, called The Court of Requests, which giveth hearing likewise, as in the Chancerie, to causes betweene private persons, but such as before are presented unto the Prince, or his Privie Counsell, as also to others. In this are employed certaine Masters of the Requests, and a Clerke or Register, with two Attornies or three. But as touching those Counsels held in the Marches of Wales and in the North parts, wee will speake with the leave of God in their due place.

Court of Requests.

As for Ecclesiasticall or Spirituall Courts there be two principall; to wit, The Synode, which is called The Convocation of the Clergie, and is alwaies kept with the Parliament: and the Provinciall Synods in both Provinces.

Ecclesiasticall Courts. See the Antiquitie of the British Church. Court of the Arches.

After these are reckoned the Archbishop of Canterburies Courts, to wit, The Court of the Arches: wherein sitteth as Judge the Deane of the Arches. He is called Deane, for that he hath jurisdiction in xiiij. Parishes of London, exempt from the Bishop of London, which number maketh a Deanrie; and Deane of the Arches, because the principall of his Churches is, S. Marias Church in London, the tower, steeple or lantern whereof is beautifully built of arched worke. He hath to doe with appeales of all men within the Province of Canterbury. Advocates there bee in this Court xvj. or more, at the pleasure of the Archbishop, all Doctors of the Law; two Registers, and ten Proctours.

The Court of Audience, which entertaineth the complaints, causes and appeales of them in that Province.

Court of Audience.

The Prerogative Court, in which the Commissarie sitteth upon Inheritances fallen either by the Intestate, or by will and testament.

The Court of Faculties, wherein there is appointed a chiefe President, who heareth and considereth of their grievances and requests that are petitioners for some moderation and easement of the Ecclesiasticall law, sometimes over-strict and rigorous; and a Register beside, who recordeth the Dispenfations granted.

Court of Faculties.

The

The Court of Peculiars, which dealeth in certaine Parishes exempt from the Bishops jurisdiction in some Diocesses, and are peculiarly belonging to the Archbishop of Canterburie. Other Courts of meaner account I willingly overpasse. Neither doe I wisely, I assure you, thus to entermeddle heerein: and yet Guicciardine in his Description of the Neatherlands hath given me a precedent hereof to follow.

Heere in this place my purpose was to have interferred somewhat, (so farre forth especially as concerned antiquitie) as touching the chiefe Magistrates, and highest Offices of England, as namely, The Lord Chancellor aforesaid, The Lord Treasurer, The President of the Counsell, The Lord Keeper of the Privie Seale, The Lord high Chamberlain, The Lord high Constable, The Mareschall, and Seneschal or Steward of the Kings household, &c. But understanding that others were in hand with these matters, so farre am I from preventing them, that right willingly I shall impart even to them, whatsoever in this behalfe I have observed.

Some man perhaps heere looketh, that I should out of Astrologicall rules, adde to the rest, under what Signe and Planet our Britaine is seated. And verily I will say somewhat to satisfie the Curious; for in those learned errors I have, I may tell you, in my youth taken some paines: although the Conjecturers of Astrologers touching this point are so divers, that the very diversitie may seeme to weaken the thing it selfe, and leave no place for the truth. M. Manilius an ancient Poet in this verse of his, seemeth to intimate, that Capricorne heere beareth rule in Britaine:

Tu Capricorne regis quicquid sub Sole cadente Expositum.

Thou Capricorne doest governe all,
That lies to Sun at his down-fall.

Ptolomee, Albumazar, and Cardane, doe make Aries our Tutelar Signe; Iohannes de Muris, the Planet Saturne: The Frier Perusator, Esquidus and Henrie Silen, the Moone; for that, as they say, it is in the seventh Climate. Roger of Hereford, Thomas of Ravenna, Philologus, and Hispalensis, are of opinion Pisces governe us; and last of all Schonerus, and Piratus, (see how they all disagree) have with no better reason than the rest, subjected us unto Gemini.

Now will I, by Gods assistance, make my perambulation through the Provinces or Shires of Britaine: wherein (according to the Preface that they used in old time, before they tooke any enterprize in hand) God grant me gracious good speed. In the severall discourses of every of them, I will declare as plainly, and as briefly as I can, who were their ancient Inhabitants; what is the reason of their names; how they are bounded; what is the nature of the soile; what places of antiquitie, and good account are therein; what Dukes likewise, or Earles have beene in each one since the Norman Conquest: And in this succession of Earles, to confesse frankly, by whom I have taken profit, I doe willingly and justly acknowledge that Thomas Talbot a most diligent Clerke in the Records of the Tower, a man of singular skill in our antiquities, hath given me much light.

And begin I will at the farthest parts in the West, that is to say, at Cornwall, and so passe over the other countries in order, imitating herein Strabo, Ptolomee, and the most ancient Geographers, who alwaies begin their description in the Western countries, as being first from the Meridian.

DANMONII.

That Region, which according to the Geographers, is the first of all Britaine, and growing straiter still and narrower, shooteth out farthest into the West, and bath on the North side the Severne-Sea; on the South the British, and on the West, the Vergivian or Westerne Ocean, beating upon it; was in ancient time inhabited by those Britaines, whom Solinus called, DVNMONII, Ptolomee, DAMNONII, or (as we find in some other copies,) more truly DANMONII. Which name, if it bee not derived from those ever-continuing mines of tinne in this tract, which the Britans terme Moina; may seeme to come of the dwelling there under hils. For, their habitation all over this Country is somewhat low, and in valleys: which manner of dwelling is called in the * British tongue Dan-munith: in which sense also the Province next adjoining, in like respect is at this day named by the * Britans Duffneint, that is to say, Low valleys. Now whether the OSTIDAMNII, called also OSTAEI, and OSTIONES, of whom Strabo maketh mention out of Pitheas of Marfiles, be our Danmonij, I wish the studious searchers of Antiquity would weigh with themselves, and examine somewhat more diligently. For, seated they were, by their report, in the farthest parts of Europe, toward the West Ocean over against Spaine, not farre from the Isle Vxantissa, now called Vlhant, Which particulars every one doe very well, and in each point agree unto this Region of our Danmonij. And seeing that those Ostiones be called by Artemidorus COSSINI as Stephanus in his Cities seemeth to note, I wish likewise they would consider (because these people are termed also Corini) whether in stead of COSSINI, we are not to read CORINI: For, we read Fusij for Furij, and Valesij for Valerij. And surely, the Geographers have not so much as a glimpse where to seeke these Ostidamnij and Cossini, by the westerne Sea, if they be hence excluded. But the Country of this nation is at this day divided into two parts, knowne by later names of Cornwall and Denshire, whereof wee will speake in order.

CORNWALL.

Cornwall, which also by later Writers is called Cornubia in Latin, of all Britaine doth beare most Westward, and is inhabited by that remnant of Britans, which Marinus Scotus calleth Occidentales Britones, that is, Britaines of the West parts, who in the British tongue (for as yet they have not lost their ancient language) name it Kernaw, because it waxeth smaller smaller and smaller in manner of an horne, and runneth forth into the Sea with little promontories, as they were hornes, on every side: For the Britaines call an horne, [Corn] and hornes [Kern,] in the plurall number: although others would have Cornwall to take the name of one Corineus, I know not what Companion of Brutus, and doe call it Corinea, according to this verse of a fabulous Poet;

Corn and

Pars Corinea datur Corineo, de duce nomen

Patria, deq; viro gens Corinenfis habet.

To Capitaine Corineus, part was given, to hold by right:

Of him both coast Corinea, and people Cornish height.

* Percepsa. or, Protopia.

But, no strange matter it is (if a man search Antiquities) for many places to have their denominations given them of such kind of scite as this. In Crete and * Taurica Chersonesus, there bee promontories termed, Kerai promontoria, that is, Rams Foreheads, because they shoote forth into the sea, after the fashion of Rams hornes. Semblably, Cyprus was of the Greekes in old time, called Cerastis, for that it butteth on the sea with promontories bearing out like hornes, so that it is no marvell, if the coast bee called Kernaw, and Corn, crookening inward as it doth, like unto an horne, and having divers smal capes and points sticking out, as it were hornes. Whereupon, when in the heat of the Saxons warre, many Britans retired themselves into this tract, trusting to the naturall strength of the place; for, they knew that the waies by land were hard enough to bee passed through by reason of mountaines, and crossed in divers places with armes of the Sea; that sailing likewise there, was comber some, because the places were unknowne: the Saxon being Conquerour, who called all forraigne things, and aliens or strangers, in their language Wealh, named the Inhabitants hereof Cornweale; and Wetweale. Hereof sprang the Latin name Cornwallia, and in the later age Cornubia, and in some writers Occidua Wallia. So farre it is off, that it should be called Cornwallia, of the Gaules that conquered it, which some there bee, that in flatterie of the French name and nation would uphold: who, if they were as quick-sighted at home, as they bee curious abroad, might find that their * Britaine lying upon the sea coast, opposite to this country, is so named of our Britan, and that Cornovaille, no small territorie therein, which speaketh the same language that our Cornishmen doe, tooke name of our country-men, that passed over hence to dwell there. For, as these our Britaines of the West parts, aided the Armorici of Gaule, inhabiting in that tract in their warres against Caesar; upon which occasion hee pretended a quarrell to invade Britaine, and they afterwards comming thither, as wee said before, changed the name of Armorici, and called it Britaine: so in the foregoing ages, readie they were, and ever at hand to helpe those Britaines their country-men against the French; and during the tempestuous troubles of the Danish warre, some of them put over thither also, and are thought to have left this name of Cornovaille behind them there. But to leave that Cornovaille.

Strabo.

This our Cornwall, as if nature made amends and recompence for the incroching in of the sea, is for the most part raised on high with mountaines, being in the vallies betweene of an indifferent glebe, with which the Sea weede, or reit commonly called Orewood, and a certaine kind of fruitfull Sea-sand, they make so ranke and battle, that it is incredible. The Sea coast, is beautified with very many Townes, able to set out a great fleet of Ships: the inland parts have rich and plenteous mines of tinne. For, there is digged out of them wonderfull store of tinne, yielding exceeding much profit and commoditie, where are made household pewter vessels, which are used throughout many parts of Europe in service of the table, and for their glittering brightnesse, compared with silver plate. The Inhabitants doe discover these mines by certaine tinne-stones lying on the face of the ground, which they call Shoad, being somewhat smooth and round. Of these Mines or tinne-works, there be two kinds: the one they call, Lode-works; the other Stream-works. This lieth in lower grounds, when by trenching they follow the veins of tinne, and turne aside now and then the streames of water comming in their way: that other, is in higher places, when as upon the hills they dig very deepe pits, which they call, Shafts, and doe under-

Orewood.

Tinne.

A mine. In working both waies there is seen wonderfull wit and skill, as well in draining of waters aside, and reducing them into one streame; as in the underbuilding, pinning and propping up of their pits: to passe over with silence their devices of breaking, stamping, drying, crasing, washing, melting, and fining the mettall, than which there cannot be more cunning shewed. There are also two sorts of Tinne, Blacke tinne, which is tinne-ore broken and washed, but not yet founded into mettall, and white tinne, that is molten into mettall; and that is either soft tinne which is best merchantable, or hard tinne lesse merchantable.

That the ancient Britans practised these tinne-works, (to omit Timæus the Historian in Plinie, who reporteth, That the Britans fetched tinne out of the Isle Ista, in wicker boats covered and stitched about with leather) appeareth for certaine out of Diodorus Siculus, who flourished under Augustus Caesar. For, hee writeth; that the Britans, who Inhabited this part, digged tinne out of stonie ground, and at a low water carried the same in carts, to certaine Ilands adjoyning. From whence Merchants transported it by ships into Gaule, and from thence conveyed the same upon horses within thirtie daies unto the spring-heads of the river * Eridanus, or else to the citie Narbone, as it were, to a Mart. Aethicus also, who ever hee was, that unworthily beareth title to be interpreted by S. Hierome out of the Slavonian tongue, infinuateth the very same, and saith, That hee delivered rules and precepts to these Tinne-workers. But it seemeth, that the English-Saxons neglected it altogether, or to have used the workmanship and labour of Arabians or Saracens. For, the Inhabitants in their language terme the mines forlet and given over, Attal Sarifin, that is, the leavings of the Saracens; if they did meane by that name, the ancient Panims.

Lib. 6. cap. 8.
c. 9.

* See

After the coming in of the Normans, the Earles of Cornwall gathered great riches out of these mines, and especially Richard brother to King Henrie the Third: and no marvell, sith that in those daies Europe had tinne from no other place. For, the incursions of the Moors, had stopped up the tinne mines of Spaine; and as for the tinne veins in Germanie, which are in Misnia and Bohemia, they were not as yet knowne: and those verily not discovered, before the yeere after Christs nativite, 1240. For then, (as a writer of that age recordeth) was tinne mettall found in Germanie by a certain Cornishman driven out of his native soile, to the great losse and hindrance of Richard Earle of Cornwall. This Richard began to make ordinances for these tin-works; and afterward Edmund his sonne granted a Charter, and certain liberties, and withall prescribed certaine Lawes concerning the same: which hee ratified or strengthened under his seale, and imposed a tribute or rent upon tin, to be answered unto the Earls.

These liberties, priviledges and lawes King Edward the Third, did afterwards confirme and augment. The whole common-wealth of those Tinner and workmen, as it were, one bodie, hee divided into foure quarters, which of the places they call Foy-more, Black-more, Tremaynaile, and Penwith. Over them all hee ordained a Warden, called, L. Warden of the Stanniers, of Stannum, that is, Tinne; who giveth judgement as well according to equitie and conscience, as Law; and appointed to every quarter their Stewards, who once every iij. weeks, (every one in his severall quarter) minister justice in causes personall betweene Tinner and Tinner, and betweene Tinner and Forrainger, except in causes of land, life, or member. From whom there lieth an appeal to the Lord Warden, from him to the Duke, from the Duke to the King. In matters of moment, there are by the Warden generall Parliaments, or severall assemblies summoned: whereunto Jurats are sent out of every Stannarie, whose constitutions do bind them. As for those that deale with tinne, they are of foure sorts: the owners of the soile, the adventurers, the merchants or regraters, and the labourers, called F. the Spadiards (of their Spade) who poore men are pitifully out-eaten by usurious contracts. But the Kings of England, and Dukes of Cornwall, in their times have reserved to themselves a præemption of tin (by the opinion of the learned in the Law) as well in regard of the proprietie, as being chiefe Lords and Proprietaries; as of their royall prerogative. Left the tribute or rent imposed, should be embellished, and the Dukes of Cornwall defrauded, unto whom by the old custome for every thousand pound waight of tinne there is paid forty shillings, it is by a Law provided, that all the tin which is cast & wrought, be brought to one of the foure appointed townes: where twice in the yeere it is weighed, and signed with a stampe, (they call it Coinage) and the said impost according paid: neither is it lawfull for any man before that, to sell or fend it abroad, under forfeiture of their tin. And now only tin is here found, but there with also gold and silver; yea, and Diamonds shaped, and pointed anglewise, smoothed also by nature it selfe: whereof some are as big as walnuts, and inferiour to the Orient Diamonds, in blacknesse and hardnesse only. Moreover there is found Eryngium, that is, Sea Holly, growing most abundantly every where along the shore. Furthermore, so plentifully is this countrey of graine, although not without great toile of the husbandman, that it hath not onely sufficient to maintaine it selfe, but also affoordeth oftentimes great store of corne into Spaine. Besides, a most rich revenue and commoditie they have by those little fishes that they call Pilchards, which swarming, as one would say, in mighty great skuls about the shores from Iuly unto November, are there taken, garbaged, salted, hanged in the smoake, laied up, pressed, and by infinite numbers carried over into France, Spaine, and Italie, unto which countreys they be very good chaffer, and right welcome merchandise, and are there named * Fumados. Whereupon Michael a Cornish Poet, and of Rhymers in his time the chiefe, in his Satyre against Henrie of Aurenches, Archpoet to King Henrie the Third, because he had unreverently plaied upon Cornishmen, as if they were seated in the nocke hole of the world; after much sarycally sharpnesse, came out with these round rhymes:

*Non opus est ut opes numerem quibus est opulenta,
Et per quas, inopes sustentat non ope lenta:
Piscis uti stanno nusquam tam fertilis ora.*

I need not here report the wealth, wherewith enrich'd it is,
And whereby alwaies to sustaine poore folke it doth not misse:
No coast elsewhere for fish and tinne, so plentiful, ywis.

And yet is Cornwall nothing happier in regard of the soile, than it is for the people; who as they were endued and adorned with all civilitie, even in those ancient times, (For by reason of their acquaintance with merchants sailing thither for tin, as Diodorus Siculus reporteth, they were more courteous toward strangers:) so they are valiant, hardie, wel picht in stature, brawny & strong limmed: such as for wrastling, (to speak nothing of that manly exercise, & feat of hurling the Ball which they use) so farre excell, that for slight and cleane strength together, they justly win the prize and praise from other nations, in that behalfe. Moreover, that Poet Michael, when as in the excessive commendation of his country men, hee had with gigging rimes refounded, how Arthur in his battels, gave them the honour, to give the first charge, he thus courageously concludeth in time.

Quid nos deterret? si firmis in pede stemus, Fraus ni nos superet, nihil est quod non superemus.

What frighteth us? if footing sure we have on steady ground, (Barre crafty sleights) there is no force but we can it confound.

And hereof peradventure ariseth the report so generally received, that Giants in times past inhabited this countrey. For, Havillan the Poet, who lived foure hundred yeares since, in describing of certaine British Giants, wrote pleasantly of Britaine, and the Cornish Giants, in this wise: ——— Titanibus illa

*Sed paucis famulosa domus; quibus udae ferarum
Terga dabant vestes, cruor haustus, pocula trunci, Antra Lares, Dumeta thoros, caenacula rupes,
Præda cibos, raptus venerem, spectacula cades,

Monticulis tellus: sed eorum plurima tractus
Pars erat occidui, terror majorq; premebat Te furor, extremum Zephyri, Cornubia, limen.*

A lodge it was to Giants fell (though few) of Titans brood Enthralled: whose garments were raw hides of beasts full wood;
Their blood they dranke, but cups they made of hollow blocks and stocks,

Did pester most the westernne tract: more feare made thee agast
O Cornwall, utmost dore that art to let in Zephirus blast.

Now, whether this firme and wel compact constitution of the Cornish-men which proceedeth from the temperature of heat and moisture, is to bee referred unto the breeding-west wind and the Westernne situation thereof, like as wee see, that in Germanie the Baravians, in France the Galcoines who be farthest Westward are the ablest and most valiant, or rather to some peculiar and speciall reason of aire and soile; it is not my purpose to search curiously.

Now let us treat of the Promontories, Cities and Rivers, whereof ancient writers have made mention: For, this is my principall project: beginning at the furthest point, and so surveying first the Southerne shore, then the Northern, and lastly the course of the river * Tamara, which severeth this countie from Devonshire. The utmost Promontorie which lieth upon the Western Ocean, and is distant 17. degrees and no more in the globe or surface of the earth, from the Ilands called Azores, is called by Ptolomee Belerium, and by Diodorus, Belerium; perhaps of the British word Pell, which signifieth a thing most remote or farthest off: by Ptolomee also the same is termed Antivestium, or ANTIVESTAEVM, by the Britans, I meane their Bardie onely or Poets, Penringuad; that is, the Promontorie of Bloud: For, the Welsh Historians name it Penwith, that is, the Promontorie on the left hand: The Saxons Penip-ræopt. For,

Stear with them betokeneth a peece of land shooting into the Sea: and hereupon all that Hundred of Penwith at this day is called by borderers in their language, Pen von las, that is, the end of the land: and in the same sence, we in English name it, The lands end; because it is the utmost part of the Iland toward the West. And if this Promontorie were sometimes called Helenum, as Volaterran and the late writers affirme, it came not of Helenus K. Priams sonne, but of Pen-Elin, which signifieth in the British tongue an Elbow, as Ancon doth in Greeke. And seeing that crooked and bending shores be termed of the Greekes Amōnes, as Elbows, for so Plinie witnesseth of Ancon in Italie, no absurditie is it at all, that this crooked and bowing shore should by the Britans in the same sence be called Pen-elin, and thereof that Latin name Helenum be derived. But as touching this name Antivestium, I was wont now and then to doubt, whether it favoured not of some Greek originall. For, seeing it was a common and usuall thing with the Greeks, to impose names upon places taken from the names of such as were opposite unto them, not only in Greece it selfe, where they have, * Rhium, and * Antirrhium, but also in the * Arabian gulf, where there is Bacchium and Antibacchium, as also upon the gulf of Venice, Antibarium, because it looketh towards Barrium, lying over against it in Italie; I searched diligently whether any place named Vestium, lay opposite unto this our Antivestium: but finding no such thing, I betooke my selfe againe to the British tongue, neither yet can I here resolve my self. But the Inhabitants doe suppose, that this Promontorie heretofore ran further into the Sea; and by the rubbish which is drawne out from thence, the Mariners affirme the same: yea and the neighbor Inhabitants avouch, out of I wote not what fable, that the earth now covered there all over with the in-breaking of the Sea, was called Lionesse. In the utmost rocks of this Promontorie, when at a low water they be bare, there appeare veins of tin and copper, and the people there dwelling report, that there stood a watch-Tower upon it, from whence by the light of burning fire, there was a signe given unto Sailers: no doubt, ad speculam Hispania, according as Orosius hath put downe in writing, That the most high watch-towre of Brigantia in Gallicia, a rare and admirable peece of worke, was erected ad speculam Britannia: that is, if I well understand him either for the use of Mariners sailing out of Britaine toward Spaine, or else, over against the watch-Towre of Britaine. For, no other place of this Iland looketh directly rectly to Spaine. Upon it there standeth now a little village named S. Buriens (in old time Eglis Buriens; that is, The Church of Buriens or Beriena) consecrated to Buriens, a religious Irish woman. For, this nation alwaies honoured Irish Saints as tutelar patrons of their owne, so all their Towns in manner they have consecrated unto them. This village King Athelstan, as the report goeth, granted to be a privileged place or Sanctuarie, what time as he arrived as Conquerour our of the * Iles of Syll: True it is, that he built here a Church, and that under William the Conquerour there was heere a Colledge of Chanons, unto whom the territorie adjoyning belonged. Neere unto this, in a place which they call Biscaw Woune, are to bee seene nineteene stones set in a round circle, distant every one about twelve foote from the other; and in the very center there is one pitched far higher and greater than the rest. This was some Trophee (or monument of victorie) erected by the Romans (as probably may bee conjectured) under the later Emperours, or else, by Athelstan the Saxon, when he had subdued the Cornish-men, and brought them under his dominion.

As the shore fetcheth a compasse by little and little from hence Southward, it leareth in a bay or creeke of the Sea, in manner of a Crescent, which they call Mount-bay: wherein, as the common speech goeth, the Ocean by rushing with a violent force drowned the land. Upon this lieth Moushole, in the British tongue Port Inis, that is,
The Haven of the Island: For which, Henry of Ticis, a Baron in his time and Lord of Alwerton and Tiwernel in this Country, obtained of King Edward the First the grant to have a market there. Likewise there is seated upon this Bay Pen-fans, that is, The Cape or Head of Saints, or as some thinke Sands, * a pretty market Towne: within a little whereof is that famous stone, Main-Amber; which, being a great Rock advanced upon some other of meaner size with so equall a counterpeize, a man may stir with the pith of his finger, but to remove it quite out of his place a great number of men are not able: as also Merkin, that is, Jupiters market, (because Thursday anciently dedicated to Jupiters is their market day) a dangerous roade for ships. And in the very angle and corner it selfe S. Michaels mount, which gave name unto the foresaid Bay; sometime called Dinsol, as wee find in the booke of Landaffe: the Inhabitants name it Cary Cose, that is, The hoary Crag or Rock, the Saxons Michel-top, that is, Michaels plat, as Master Laurence Noel, a man of good note for his singular learning, and who was the first in our age that brought into ure againe and revived the language of our ancestours the Saxons, which through disuse lay forlet and buried in oblivion, hath well observed. This Rocke is of a good height and craggy, compassed round about with water so oft as it is floud, but at every ebbe joynted to the main-land, so that they say of it, It is land and Iland twice a day. For which cause, Iohn Earle of Oxford, not many yeeres ago, presuming upon the strength of the place, chose it for his chiefest defence when he raised war against King Edward the Fourth, and valiantly held the same, but with no good successe. For, his souldiers being assailed by the Kings forces straightwaies yielded. In the very top heereof within the Fortresse, there was a Chappell consecrated to S. Michael, the Archangell, where William Earle of Cornwall and Moriton, who by the bounteous gift of King William the First had great lands, & large possessions in this tract, built a Cell for one or two monks, who avouched that S. Michael appeared in that mount: which apparition, or the like, the Italians challenge to their hill Garganus, and the Frenchmen likewise to their Michaels mount in Normandie. At the foote of this mountaine within the memorie of our Fathers, while men were digging up of tin they found Spear-heads, axes, and swords of brasse wrapped in linnen: such as were sometimes found within the Forrest Hercinia in Germanie, and not long since in our Wales. For, evident it is by the monuments of ancient Writers, that the Greeks, the Cimbrians and Britans used bra-zen weapons, although the wounds given with brasse bee lesse hurtfull, as in which mettall there is a medicinable vertue to heale: according as Macrobius reporteth out of Aristotle. But happily that age was not so cunning in devising meanes to mischiefe and murders, as ours is. In the rocks underneath, as also along the shore every where breedeth the * Pyrrhecorax, a kind of crow with bill and feet red, and

A not, as Plinie thought, proper to the Alpes onely. This bird the inhabitants have found to be an Incendiarie, and thevish beside: For, oftentimes it secretly conveierh fire-sticks setting their houses a fire and as closely filcheth and hideth little pecces of money. In this place the country is most narrow and groweth as it were into an * isthmus, for it is scarce foure miles over from hence to the Severn or upper sea. A little above this mount, there openeth a Creeke of good bredth, called of the mount, Mountsbay, a most safe roade and harbour for ships, when the South and Southeast winds are aloft and bluster, at a mid ebbe and returne of the Sea, six or seven fathom deepe. More toward the East ariseth Godolcan hill, right famous for plentifull veins of tin (they call it now Godolphin) but much more renowned in regard of the Lords B thereof, bearing the same name, who with their vertues have equalled the ancientnesse of that house and linage. But that name in the Cornish language, came of a white Aegle, and this family hath anciently borne for their armes in a shield Gules, an Aegle dilpaled Argent, betwene three Flower-deluces of the same, id est Argent likewise in a shield Gules.

From S. Michaels mount Southward, immediately there is thrust forth a bi-land or demi-Ile, at the very entrie whereof Heilston sheweth it selfe, called in their country language Hellas, by reason of the salt water flowing thereto: a Towne of great resort for their priviledge of marking and coinage of tin. Under which by the confluence C and meeting of many waters there is made a lake two miles in length, named Loopoolle, divided from the Sea by a narrow banke running betwene, which whensoever it is by the violence of waves broken thorow, a wonderfull roing of waters is heard far and neere all over the country adjoining. And not far from thence there is to be seene a militarie fence or rampier of a large compasse built of stones, heaped together and laid without mortar, they call it in their tongue, Earth; of which sort there be others heere and there: raised, as I verily beleeve, in the Danish warre. Neither is it unlike to those fortifications of the Britans, which Tacitus termeth rudēs & informes saxorum compages, that is, rude and unfavoured compacted piles of stone. As for the said D Demi-Iland, it selfe being of a good bignesse and replenished with villages, it is named Meneg, and no doubt that MENNA, which out of Cornelius a writer of Annals (but whether he be Tacitus, I wor not) Jornandes in his Geticks describeth, and is in some copies found written Memma. For, it is, as he saith, In the utmost coast of Britaine, having in it great store of mettall mines, very full of grasse and herbes, bringing forth more plentifully all those things which serve for pastorage of beasts, rather than non-ishment of men. But where as he said, that it hath plenteous store of Mettals, it is now so destitute, that it may seeme long since to have beene exhaust thereof. The Sailers, at this day call the utmost South-West point thereof Lisard; Pro-montorie of the DANMONII, add OCRINVM; Aethicus in that strange Geographie of his, OCRANVM; and he reckoneth it among the mountaines of the West

E Ocean. Which name whether it take of Oera, which by Sext. Pompeius, signifieth a craggy hill, I dare not affirme. And yet among the Alpes, Ocrea, Ocriscum, and Interocrea, drew their denomination of their steepe and rocky site. But seeing that Ochr betokeneth in the British tongue an Edge, what if I should thinke the name was given to this Promontorie, because it hath a sharpe edge and groweth at the end pointed in fashion of a cone? In the turning in of the shore from this Meneg, you meet with a Bay very commodious for ships to harbour in, by reason of so many turnings, cones and angled windings therein, receiving into it the little river Vale. Neere unto which within the country, flourished sometime that ancient Towne Voluba, menti-F oned by Protolomee: but it is long since either utterly decayed, or hath lost his name:
yet it remaineth partly in Valemoonsh; or Falemoonsh Haven. This Haven is as noble as * Brundisium it selfe in Italie: of exceeding great capacity; for it is able to receive an hundred ships, which may ride therein to a part by themselves, that out of never a one of them the top of anothers Mast can be seene: and most safe withall under the wind, by reason that it is enclosed on every side with brims of high rising banks. In the very entrance of this Haven, there mounteth up an high and steep craggy rock, which the inhabitants call Crage. The gullet on either hand, as well for the defense and safety of the place, as for terror to enemies, is fortified with block-houses: to wit, the castle of S. Maudit East-ward, and toward the West, the fort Pendinas, built both by King Henric the Eighth: Of which fortresses the * Antiquarian Poet writeth thus:

*Pendinas tenet asperi cacumen Celsum montis, & intonat frequenter.
Mauditi quoque subidet rotundum
Castrum, & impetu fulminat furenti, Portus ostia quâ patent Falensis.*

Pendinas mounted is aloft,

But the Haven it selfe is by Ptolomee called Ostium CENIONIS, The mouth of Cenion ostium. Cenio, doublet of the British word Genen, which betokeneth a doore and entrance. And this to be true, the Towne Tregenie neere adjoining doth testifie: for it is much (if a man interpret it) as a little Towne by the Mouth. Upon the innermost creeks and nooks of this Haven, there stand some Townes: namely, Peryn, for a market well frequented, where Walter Branscome Bishop of Excester, in the yeare 1288, erected a Collegiat Church, (they call it Glasnieth) and twelve Prebendaries: Armenak, the seat of the ancient and noble family of the Killigrewes; Truro, in the Cornish tongue Truru, so called of three Streets encircled, as it were, with two rivers; a Maior Towne, as they call it, and endowed with many privileges, and coyneage of tin: also Grampound, which is seated farthest from the Haven, and neighbour to its Golden the inheritance of Tregian, a house ancient and well allied. But descending to the Havens mouth you may see Fenten-Gollan, in English Harteswell, lately the seat of Carminow a family anciently of high esteeme for bloud and wealth, between whom and the Lord Scrope two hundred yeeres since, was a plea commenced in the Court of Chivalry, for bearing in a shield Azure a Bend Or. Under which on the Sea side lieth the territorie of Rosseland; so named, as some thinke, as if it were a role plot: but as I suppose, because it is an heath or place of lings: for so Ros significeth in the British tongue. Whereof, Rosse in Scotland, and another Rosse in Wales have their names, as being tracts drie, hungry and barren: Howbeit, this heere, through the industrie of the husbandmen is more battle-ground and fruitfull. Beyond this Rosseland presently the Ocean (as the land retireth and giveth back) shooteth in and maketh a large Bay; they call it Tru-ar-draith Bay, which is by interpretation, The Bay of the town upon the sand: whereunto fall many fresh rilllets, amongst which that is principal which passeth by Lanladron, whose Lord S. Serlo Lanladron was summoned a Baron to the Parliament, in that age when the select men for wisdom and worth amongst the Gentrie were called to Parliament, and their posterity omitted if they were defective therein. Scarfe two miles from hence, whereas the river Fawey falleth into the Sea, lieth the Towne Fowey, Feath in Cornish, stretching out in length upon the sea banke: a Towne most renowned in former ages, for sea-fights: which the very armes of the Towne doe witness, as being compounded of the Cinque-ponts arms. By the haven it hath bulwarks on both sides built by King Edward the Fourth who shortly after being displeased with these townsmen of Fowey, for that when the warre in France was compounded, they practised piracy upon the French; took from them all their ships and furniture for shipping. Von the other bank over against it standeth Hall, situate on the hanging of an hill with a right pleasant vvalke, the habitation full well knowne of Sir Reginald Mohun Knight, of an ancient and noble house by birth, as descended from the Mohunes, of Somerset, and the Courtneys Earles of Devonshire. Farther within the countrie, and by the same river, Vzella mentioned by Ptolomee is seated: which townne having not lost altogether the old name, is at this day called Left-ushell. It stood anciently upon an high hill, where the old old castle Leftmel now sheweth his ruins: but it was removed lower into the valley. From the high situation it received the ancient name; for Vchel in the British tongue foundeth as much as [high] or [aloft]: whence * Vxellodunum also in France took the name, because the townne standing upon an hill had a very steep fall on every side. In the British storie, this is called Pen-uchelcoit; that is, The high hill in the wood: which some would have to be Excester. But the situation in Ptolomee, and the name remaining still, prove this to be the ancient Vzella. In these our dayes, a small townne it is and nothing populous, because the river Fawey, which aforetime was wont at every tide or high water to flow unto the very townne and to beare and bring in ships, hath his channell so choked and dammed up now with sands, coming from the tin-workes (where with all the havens in this province are like in proceffe of time to be choked up) as that it is hardly able to beare the least barge that is. Howbeit, the chiefe townne it is of the whole countie, where the Shiriffe sitteth judicially every moneth and determineth causes: and there the Warden of the Stannaries hath his prison. It enjoyeth also the privilege, by the bounteous favour, as themselves say, of Edmund Earle of Cornwall (who there in times past had his honor) to scale or coyne the tin. But there be two townes above the rest that hinder the light and eclipse the fame of this; to wit, on the East side thereof Leskerd, situate on the top of a very high hill, much frequented for the mercat, and renowned for an ancient castle there: and on the North side Bodman, which standeth on the side hand of it scarce two miles off: and is named (if I be not deceived) Bosuenma in the Cornish tongue, and Bodminian in old Deeds and Charters. This townne situate thus in no healthy seat between two hills, and lying out in length East and West, is for the mercat there kept, of great resort, for the inhabitants populous, beautifull enough for building, and of name for their privilege of coineage of tin: but more famous in ancient time for the Bishops See there. For, about the yeere of our salvation 905, when the State of the Church lay in this tract altogether neglected, by vertue of a decree from Pope Formosus, King Edward the Elder erected heere a Bishops See, and granted at that time unto the Bishop of Kirton, three villages in this countie, Polton, Caling, and Lanwitham, that from thence every yeere he should visit the people of Cornwall, to fetch out of them their errors: for, before time they did what they could to resist the truth, and obeyed not the Apostolicall decrees. But afterwards, in the furious heat of that terrible Danish warre, the Bishoprick was translated to Saint Germans. Hard by Leskerd lyeth that which sometime was the Church of S. Guerin, that is, (if you interpret it out of the British speech) S. Leech or Physician: where, (as writeth Asserius) King Alfred lying prostrate at his prayers, recovered out of a sicknesse. But when Neotus a man of singular holiness and learning, was afterwards entombed in the same Church, hee outshone the light of the other Saint, so as that in his memorie it was named Neotestow, that is, The place of Neotus, and now Saint Neoths: and the religious men that served God therein were named Saint Neoths Clerkes, and had for their maintenance rich and large revenues, as we may see in William Conquerours booke. Neere unto this, as I have learned, within the parish of Saint Clare, there are to be seene in a place called Pennant, that is, The head of the vale, two monuments of stone: of which the one in the upper part is wrought hollow in manner of a Chaire: the other, named Otherhalfe stone, hath an inscription of Barbarous characters, now in manner worne out, in this wise.

Wringcheefe.

Hard by, there is a number of good big rockes heaped up together, and under them, one Stone of lesser size, fashioned naturally in forme of a cheefe, so as it seemeth to be pressed like a cheefe, whereupon it is named, Wring-cheefe. Many other Stones besides in some sort foure square, are to be seene upon the plaine adjoining; of which seven or eight are pitched upright of equall distance asunder. The neighbour inhabitants terme them Hurlers, as being by a devout and godly error perswaded, they had bene men sometimes transformed into Stones, for profaning the Lords Day, with hurling the ball. Others, would have it to be a Trophée (as it were) or a monument, in memoriall of some battell: And some thinke verily they were set as meet stones or land marks, as having read in those authors that wrote of Limits, that those were gathered together of both parties, and the same erected for bounders. In this coast the river Loo maketh way and runneth into the sea: and in his very mouth giveth name to two little townes, joynd with a bridge together. That on the West side, which is the newer, flourisheth most: but the other Eastward, time hath much decayed: although it bee a Corporation retaining still the priviledge of a Maior and Burgesies. Somewhat West-ward from this lieth Kilgarth the habitation of the Bevis of especiall good note for antiquity and gentry. From Loo East-ward you meet with no memorable thing, but a small river passing by Minbevet, whereby is Pole the seat of the Trelawnies, to whom with others the inheritance of the Courtneys Earles of Devon accrewed: untill you come to the Liver, a little river stored with oysters, that runneth under S. Germans a small towne, unto which during the tempestuous Danish warre, the Bishops Sees were for feare translated: where there is a pretty Church dedicated unto S. German of Auxiliodorum, who rooted out the heresie of Pelagius, that that sprung up againe in Britaine. Wherein after that some few Bishops had sitten, Levinus the Bishop of Kirton, who was in great favour with Cnutus the Dane, obtained by vertue of the Kings authoritie, that it should be joynd to his See. Since which time, there hath bene but one Bishop over this Province and Denhire both (whose seat is now at Exeter) and who appointed the little Towne of S. Germans to be the seat of his Suffragan. For at this day, it is nothing else but a village consisting of fishermens cabins, that make a good gainfull trade, by catching store of fish in the Ocean and rivers neere adjoining. Some few miles from hence, upon the same river standeth Trematon, bearing the name of a Castle, though the wall bee halfe downe; in which, as we find in Domesday booke, William Earle of Moriton had his Castle, and held his mercate, and was the capitall seat of the Baronie belonging to the Earles and Dukes of Cornwall, as we may see in the Inquisitions. When the Liver is past this Castle, neere unto Saltash, sometimes Esse, the habitation in old times of the * Valtorts, and now a Towne well replenished with Merchants, and endowed with many priviledges, it runneth into the river Tamar, the bound of the whole countrey: where at the East-side Mont-Edgcombe, the seat of that ancient family of the Edgcombs, siteth most pleasantly hath a prospect into an haven underneath it, full of winding creekes. Next unto which is Anthony, a Towne memorable for the elegant building thereof, as also for a fish poole that letteth in the Ocean, and yeeldeth sea-fish for profit and pleasure both: but more memorable it is for the Lord thereof, Richard Carew, who so maintaineth his place and estate left unto him by his ancestors, as that in ornaments of vertues he surmounteth them. Hitherto we have survied the South coast: now let us take a view of the Northern also. The Northern shore from the very lands end, having for a great length huge banks of sand driven upon heapes against it, shooteh out first to a Towne running into the sea with a long ridge like a tongue, called S. Iles, taking the name of one Iia an Irish woman that lived heere in great holinesse, for anciently it was named Pendinas. And from her the Bay underneath into which the little river Haile falleth, hath likewise received the name; for the Mariners call it S. Iles Bay. As for the Towne it selfe, it is now very small: For, the North west wind that playes the tyrant in this coast by drifts of sand hath so beaten upon it, that from thence it is translated and removed. From hence the countrey on both sides, still Eastward, waxeth broader, and the Northern shore with a more crooked winding holdeth on * North-east as far as Padstow: neither all that way along hath it any thing favouring of antiquity, save onely a Chappell built in the sands, to the honor of S. Piran, who being likewise an Irish Saint resteth heere entombed: unto whose Sanctitie a certaine vaine writer in his childish folly hath ascribed this miracle, that with three kine of his owne he fed ten Kings of Ireland and their armies eight dayes together: also that hee raised from death to life both pigs and men. Then, farther from the shore is seated S. Columbs a little mercate Towne, consecrated to the memoriall of Columba a right devout woman and a martyr, & not of Columban the Scot, as now I am given to understand for certaine, out of her life. Neere unto which, but more to the sea-ward, Lhanheton sheweth it selfe, the seat of the Arondels, a familie of Knights degree, who for their faire lands and large possessions were not long since called, the Great Arondels. In some places they are written in Latin, De Hirundine, and not amisse, if my judgement be ought: For Hirundo, that is, a Swallow, is named Arondell in French: and in a shield sables, they beare for their armes six Swallows argent. Certes, a very ancient and renowned house this is, spreading far and neere the branches of their kinred and affinity: unto the name and coat-armour whereof William Brito a Poet alluded, when as he describeth a valiant warriour out of this familie flying as it were upon William of Bar a French noble man, and assailing him, about the yeece of our Lord 1170. in these termes:

* Swallow.

more swift, than bird hight * Arondell

That giv's him name, and in his shield of armes emblazoned well,
He rides amid the armed troupes, and with his speare in rest
(The staffe was strong, the point right sharpe) runs full upon the brest
Of Sir Guillaume, and pierceth through his bright and glittering shield, Which on left arme he for defence, against him stoutly held.

Within a little hereof, there is a double rampire intrenched upon the pitch of a hill, with a causey leading thereto, named, Castellan Denis, that is, The Dances Camp; because the Dances when they preyed upon the coasts of England, encamped themselves there, like as they did in other places of this tract.

Castle Denis.

Nor farre from hence the river Alan, which also is called Camb-alan, and Camel, of the crooked windings & reaches that it makes in his course, (for so Cam with them doth signifie) runneth gently into the upper sea: which river at the very mouth thereof hath Padflow a pretty market towne, so called thort for Petrockflow, (as we read in the Histories of Saints) of one Petrock a Britan, canonized a Saint by the people: who, spent his daies here in the service of God, whereas before time it had the name of Laderic and Laffenac. The site of this Town is very commodious for traffique in Ireland, to which men may easily saile in foure and twentie houres. And much beautified it is with faire and goodly houses adjoyning thereto, in manner of a Castle, built by N. Prideaux, a Gentleman of ancient gentry in those West parts. At the Spring-head of this river Alan, standeth the little village Camelford, otherwise Gaffelsford. Leland Judgeth, it was in old time called Kamblan, who writeth also, That King Arthur our Hector was there slaine: For, as hee recordeth, peeces of armour, rings, horse-harness of brasse are otherwhiles digged up, and turned out of the ground by husbandmen: and the common fame that continued so many ages together, reporteth, that there was a notable battell fought in this place. There are also certaine verses in an unknowne Poet living in the middle time, of Cambula flowing with blood, shed in a battell of Arthur against Mordred: which I will not thinke much of my labour to put downe, because they may seeme to have bene written in no bad Poet's call vaine.

*Naturam Cambula fontis
Mutatam stupet esse sui, transcendit inundans
Sanguineus torrens ripas, & voluit in aquor
Corpora caesorum, plures natam videre
Et petere auxilium, quos nudis vita reliquit.*

Then Cambula was sore agast, the nature chang'd to see
Of his spring-head, for now the streame by this time gan to bee
All mixt with blood, which swelling high the banks doth overflow,
And carry downe the bodies' slaine, into the sea below.
There might one see how many a man that svum and helpe did crave,
Was lost among the billowes strong, and water was their grave.

And in very deed (not to deny this of Arthur) I have read in Marianus, that the Britans and Saxons fought in this place a bloody battell, in the yeere of our Lord 830, so that this may seeme a place consecrated unto Mars. And if it be true that Arthur here died, the same coast was destined unto him for his death, as for his birth. For, on the shore hard by, standeth Tindagium (the native place of that great Arthur) partly upon a little ridge, putting forth, as it were, a tongue; and partly within an Island, having both of them sometime a bridge betweene. They call it at this day Tindagel, beeing now a glorious ruine onely, in times past a stately Castle: of which a late Poet hath thus written:

*Est locus Abrini sinuoso litore ponti
Rupe situs media, refusus quem circuit aestus;
Fulminat hic laetæ turrito vertice castrum, Nominis Tindagium veteres dixere Corini.*

There is a place within the winding shore of Severne Sea
On mids a rocke about whose foote the tides turne-keeping play,
A Towry-topped Castle here farre thundreth over all,
Which Cornishmen by ancient name, Tindagel Castle call.

A long discourse it would aske to declare here out of Geffries history, how Uther Pendragon King of Britaine, within this Castle became enamoured upon the wife of Gorlous Prince of Cornwall, and how by Magick flights and delusions, taking the shape of her husband upon him, dishonourably violated the Ladie his wife, and of her begat the said renowned Arthur. It may suffice, if I doe but alleage the verses of our Poet John Havillan.

Whiles Pendragon that could not quench his flaming heats of love,
But beare a mind adult'rous still, by meanes brake in above
To Tindagel, disgui'd in face, by Merlin taught thereto,
By magicke and inchauntments strange, which all such feats could doe.
Duke Gorlous habite, absent then that was, he tooke by guile;
But preface of the King in place he did conceale the while.

This Uther Pendragon verily was a Prince flourishing in Martiall feats, & who valiantly upheld the decaying state of his countrey against the English Saxons: But whether came from him, That Royall Banner in England, having the portraict of a Dragon with a golden head, whereof neighbour nations have had experience, and which in far Lands beyond seas was under King Richard the First, terrible to the Panims, I dare not avouch: I would beleeve rather, it was received from the Romans, who a long time used the Eagle, after that Marius had rejected the Ensignes of a Wolfe, of Minotaurus, of an Horse, &c. And in the end under the latter Emperors, tooke them to the Dragon: Whereupon Claudianus writeth thus:

Hij picta Draconum Calla levanti

The banners these advance aloft
With speckled necks of Dragons wrought.

And Nemesianus:

Signa micant sinuati, truces levis aura Dracones.

Their Ensignes shine, and Dragons tell that therein pictur'd show, Wave to and fro with whiffes of wind, as it doth gently blow.

And Hoveden sheweth, that the West Saxon Kings used to carrie in their Banners, the Dragon. As for another Banner of the English, which Beda called Tufa, as also the Dances, Reafan, I will say nothing of them in this place, for feare I may seeme to have digressed too farre from my purpose. Betweene Padflow and Tindagel, inwardly there extendeth a fruitfull veine, and therein flourish the families of Roscarrock, Carnsew, Penkevell, Carvell, Pencavell, of ancient name and great respect in this coast.

Tufa, a Banner.

Forward still, Eastward on the same coast which is open, barren, and destitute of woods, there butteth upon the sea Botereaux Castle, corruptly by the common people, called Boscastle, built by the Lords Botereaux, who gave for their armes three Buffones, toads sable in a shield Argent. William Botereaux was the first famous man of honour in this familie, who married Alice the daughter of Robert Corber, whose sister was Paramour to King Henrie the First, of whom hee begat Reginald Earle of Cornwall. From this William there flourished eleven successively in order. But Margaret the onely daughter and sole heire of the last, was wedded unto Robert Hungerford: by whose posteritie the Inheritance is devolved upon the familie of the Hastings, which inheritance was augmented, and became more honourable by marriages;

ges, that those of Botereaux contracted with the heires of the Noble houses, De Mules, S. Laud, commonly called, S. Lo, and Thweng.

From hence the Land shooting forth into the Sea, extendeth it selfe so farre northward, that the countrey carrieth here full three and twenty miles in breadth, between the two seas, which hitherto went on still drawn after a fort together into a narrow streit. In this greatest breadth of it, standeth Stow upon the sea-side, the ancient habitation of the Greenwils: which verily for Antiquitie and Noblenesse of birth is a famous house: out of which one Richard, in the reigne of William * Rufus, was for his valour much renowned among those worthy Knights that subdued Glamorganshire in Wales: and another of late daies surnamed likewise Richard, for his magnanimitie surpassing the Nobilitie of his blood, fighting most valiantly against the Spaniards at the Ilands of Tercera, lost his life, as I shall shew more fully in my Annals. To this Stratton lieth close to a market Towne of no meane name amongst the neighbours for their gardens, and good garlicke: and next unto it Lancel a faire new seat of that old family, de Calvo monte, or, Chammond.

The river TAMARA, now TAMAR, shewing his head here not farre from the northern shore, takerh his course with a swift running streame southward; encreased with the channels of many rivelets hard by TAMARA, a Towne mentioned by Prohmee, now called Tamerton, by Tamar an ancient Mannour of the Trevisions, to whom by marriage, the Inheritance of Walesborough and Ralegh of Neclested descended, also, by Laustaphadon, that is, Saint Stephens, commonly and contrarily Launton, which standeth farther off from his banke: a proper little Towne this is, situate upon the pitch of a prettie hill, which of two Burgards, Dunnevet and Newport, is grown as it were, into one Burgh. At the first comming of the Normans, William Earle of Moriton, built a Castle there; and had a Colledge of * Chanons, or Secular Priests, as appeareth out of Domesday book, wherein it is named Launston, of that Colledge no doubt, built in the honour of Saint Stephen, which Reginald Earle of Cornwall, about the yeere of our Lord 1150, turned into a monasterie. Against which worke of his, the Bishops of Excester, carried away over much and seduced with mane and private affection, were verie maliciously bent, as fearing exceedingly, lest day it would become a Bishops seat, and so prejudice and impeach their jurisdiction. At this day this Town is best knowne, by reason of the common Goale of the countrey, and the Assises, which are often times kept there.

Then Tamar looketh up unto an high hill stretched out in length, with a vast head, which Marianus nameth Hengerdoun, and interpreteth it, Hengists mount, commonly called, Hengston-hill. Which in times past was so plentifull of Tinne veins, that the countrey people had this by word of it, [Hengston downe well wrought,] [Is worth London deere bought.] And it was an ordinarie place, where every seven or eight yeere, the Stannarie men of Cornwall and Denhire, were wont in great frequencie, to assemble together, and to consult about their affaires. At this hill in the yeere of salvation DCCCXXXI, the British Danmonij, who calling the Danes to aid them of purpose to break into Devonshire, that they might drive out the English from thence, who already possessed themselves of the countrey, were pitiouly defeated by King Egbert, and slaine almost to the very last man. Beneath it Tamar leaveth Halion the habitation of the Roufes, anciently Lords of Little Madbery in Devonshire, and running nigh unto Salt-Effe, a prettie market Towne seated in the descent of an hill, which hath a Major and certaine priviledges of their owne, as I said erewhile, it containeth the river Liver, on which standeth that same Towne of Saint German, whereof I spake before. And now by this time spreading broader, dischargeth it selfe into the Ocean, making the haven which in the life of Saint Indractus, is called Immerworth, after it hath severed Cornwall from Denhire. For Athelstane, the first English King that brought this countrey absolute under his dominion, appointed this river to be the bound or limit, between the Britans of Cornwal, and his Englishmen: after he had remooved the Britans out of Denhire, as witnesseth William of Malmsburie, who calleth it Tambra. Whereupon Alexander Necham, in his Praises of b vine wisedom, writeth thus: Loegria Tamaris divisior Cornubiæ, Indigenas ditat pinguibus Ificiis.

Tamar that Lhoegres doth divide from Cornwall in the west,
The neighbour-dwellers richly serves with Salmons of the best.

The place requirerh here, that I should say somewhat of the holy and devout virgin Urula descended from hence, as also of the eleven thousand British Virgins. But such is the varietie of Writers, whiles some report they suffered martyrdom under Gratian the Emperour about the yeare of our Lord CCCXXXII, upon the coast of Germanie, as they failed to Armorica; others by Attila the Hun, that scourge of God, in the yeare ccccl. at Coline upon Rhene, as they returned from Rome; that with some it hath brought the truth of the History into suspition of a vaine fable. And as touching that Constantine, whom Gildas termeth a tyrannous whelpe of the uncleane Danmonian Lianesse; as also of the Disforesting of all this countrey, (for before-time it was reputed a Forrest) let Historians speake, for it is no part of my purpose.

As for the Earles, none of British blood, are mentioned but onely Candorus (called by others Cadocus) who is accounted by late writers, the last Earle of Cornwall, of British race, and as they which are skilfull in Heraldry, have a tradition, bare x v. Be-faunts v. IIII. III. II. and I. in a shield Sable. But of the Normans blood the first Earle was Robert of Moriton, halfe brother to William Conqueror, by Herlotta, their mother; after whom succeeded William his sonne: who when hee had sided with Robert of Normandie against Henry the First, King of England, being taken prisoner in battell, lost both his libertie, and his honours; and at last turned Monke at Bermondsey. Then Reginald, a base sonne of Henrie the First, by the daughter of Sig Robert Corbet, (for that King plied getting children so lustfully, as that hee was father of thirteene Bastards) was placed in his roome. This Reginald dying without issue male legitimate, King Henry the Second, having assigned unto his daughters certaine lands and Lordships, reserved this Earledome to himselfe, for the behoore of his owne youngest sonne Iohn, a child of nine yeares old, upon whom his brother Richard the First conferred it afterwards with other Earledomes. This Iohn afterward was crowned King of England, and his second sonne Richard, was by his brother King Henry the Third, endowed with this honour, and the Earledome of Poitou: a Prince verily in those daies puissant, in Gods service devout and religious, in war right valiant, for counsell sage and prudent, who in Aquitaine fought battels with fortunate successe, and shewed much valour: and having made a voyage into the Holy Land, enforced the Sarazens to make truce with him: the Kingdome of Apulia, offered unto him by the Pope he refused; the troubles and tumults in England, he often times composed; and in the yeare of our Lord MCCCXII. by some of the Princes Electours of Germany was chosen King of the Romans, and crowned at Aquisgrane: whereupon, as if he had made meanes thereto by money, this verse was so ripe and currant every where.

Nummus ait pro me, nubit Cornubia Rome.

For me, my money, saith this,
Cornwall to Rome now wedded is.

For, so well monied he was before, that one, who then lived, hath put downe in writing, that for ten yeares together hee might dispend one hundred markes a day. But when as Germanie was all on a light fire with civil warres among competitors of the Empire, he returned quickly into England, where he departed this life, and was interred in the famous Monastery of Hales which he had built; a little after that his first begotten son Henry, newly in his return from the Holy Land, whiles he was at divine service, devoutly occupied within a church at Viterbium in Italy, was by Guy de Montfort, son of Simon Montfort Earle of Leicester, in revenge of his fathers death, wickedly slaine. Edmund therefore, his second son succeeded in the Earledome of Cornwall, who died without any lawfull issue: and so his high and great estate of inheritance returned to King Edward the First, as who was the next unto him in blood, and * found (as our Lawyers say) his heire. Whereas that Richard and Edmund his sonne, Princes of the bloud Royall of England, bare divers Armes from the Armes Royall of England, to wit, in a shield argent, a Lyon rampant, gules crowned, or, within a border fables Bezante, I have with others oftentimes much marvelled at: neither (I assure you) can I allage any other reason, but that they in this point imitated the house Royall of France, (for the manner of bearing Armes came from the French men unto us.)

For, the younger sonnes of the Kings of France, even to the time wee now speake of, bare other coats than the Kings themselves did, as we may see in the family of Per- mandois, Dreux, and Courtney: and as Robert Duke of Burgundy, brother to Henrie the First, King of France, tooke unto him the ancient shield of the Dukes of Burgundie: so we may well thinke, that this Richard having received the Earledome of Poitou, from Henry the Third his brother, assumed unto him that Lyon gules crowned, which belonged to the Earles of Poitou before him, (as the French writers doe record) and added thereto the border garnished with Befaunts, out of the ancient coat of the Earles of Cornwall. For so soone as the younger sonnes of the Kings of France began to beare the Armes of France with differences, semblably they did among us, and began first at Edward the First his children. But whither am I carried away from my purposed matter, as forgetting my selfe in the delight I take of mine owne studie and profession? When Cornwall was thus reverted unto the Crowne, King Edward the Second, who had received from his father faire lands and possessions here, bestowed the title of Earle of Cornwall, upon Piers Gaveston a Gascon, who had enslaved his youth by the allurements of corrupt life: But when as hee for corrupting the Prince, and for other heinous crimes, was by the Nobles intercepted, and beheaded;
there succeeded him Iohn of Eltham, a younger sonne of Edward the Second, advanced thereto by his brother Edward the Third, who dying young, and without issue also, Edward the Third erected Cornwall into a Dukedome, and invested Edward his sonne a Prince most accomplished with martiall prowesse, in the yeare of Christ 1336. Duke of Cornwall, by a wreath on his head, a Ring upon his finger, and a silver vey.
Since which time, that I may note so much under warrant of record, (let the skilfull Lawyers judge thereof) the King of Englands eldest sonne is reputed Duke of Cornwall by birth, and by vertue of a speciall Act, the very first day of his nativite is presumed and taken to be of full and perfect age, so that he may sue that day for his liverie of the said Dukedome, and ought by right to obaine the same, as well as if hee had beene full one and twentie yeares old: and he hath his Royalries in certaine actions, in Stannary matters, in wracks at sea, customes, &c. yea, and divers ministers or officers assigned unto him, for these and such like matters. But more plainly, and fully instructed are we in these points by Richard Carew of Anthony, a Gentleman innobled no lesse in regard of his Parentage, and descent, than for his vertue, and learning, who hath published, and perfected the description of this countrey more at large, and not in a slight, and meane manner, whom I must needs acknowledge to have given me much light herein.

DENSHIRE.

He neerer or hithermore region of the Danmonians, that I speake of, is now commonly called Denshire, by the Cornish-Britaines Deninan, and by the Welsh Britaines Duffneint, that is, Low valletes, for that the people dwell for the most part beneath in vales: by the English Saxons Deven-schipe, whereof grew the Latine name Devonia, and by that contraction, which the vulgar people useth, Denshire, and not of the Danes, as some smatterers of meane knowledge most stisly maintaine: a countrey which as it extendeth it selfe both waies wider than Cornwall, so is it harborous on either side with more commodious Havens, no lesse enriched with tin mines, especially West-ward; garnished with pleasanter meadows, sightly with greater store of woods, and passing well replenished with Townes, and buildings. But the soile in some places againe, is as leane, and barren: which not withstanding yieldeeth fruit to the Husbandman plentifully, so that he be skilfull in husbandry, and both can take paines, and be able withall to defray the cost. Neither is there in all England almost any place where the ground requireth greater charges: For, in most parts thereof it groweth in manner barren, if it be not overstrewn, and mingled with a certaine sand from the Sea, which is of great efficacie to procure fertilitie, by quickning, as it were, and giving life unto the glebe: and therefore in places far from the shore it is bought at a deare rate.

Sand, making grounds fruitful.

In describing of this region, I will first travell over the West-side, as the river Tamara runneth along, and then the South coast which bordereth on the Ocean: From whence by the Easterne bounds where it confineth upon Dorset, & Sommerfet shires, I will returne backe unto the Northern, which is hemmed in with the Severne Sea.

Tamar which divideth these two shires, first on this part receiveth into it from the East a rivelet called Lid, which passeth by Coriton, and K. Sidenham small townlets, but which have given surnames to ancient, and worshipfull families, to Lidstow a little mercate Towne, and Lidford, now a small village, but in ancient time, a famous Towne, which in the yeare 997. was most grievously shaken, and dispoiled by the furious rage of the Danes, (which as it is written in that booke, whereby William the First tooke the survey and value of England) was not wont to be rated and assessed at any other time, nor otherwise than London was. That little river Lid, here at the bridge, gathered into a streight, and pent in between rocks, runneth downe amaine, and holloweth the ground daily more and more so deepe, that his water is not seene; only a roaring noise is heard to the great wonder of those that passe over.

Beneath it, Tamar receiveth Teave a little river, on which Teavistok, commonly called Tavistoke flourisheth, a town in times past famous for the Abbey there, which Ordulph, the son of Ordgar Earle of Devonshire, (admonished by a vision from heaven) built about the yeare of our Saviour Christ Dccccxj. a place, as William of Malmesburie describeth it, Pleasant in regard of the groves standing so conveniently about it, and of the plenteous fishing there, for the handsome and uniforme building also of the Church, for the sewers from the river passing downe along by the houses of office, which runne with such a force of their owne, that they carry away with them all the superfluitie they find. Saint Rumon is much spoken of, and lies as Bishop there. There is to be seene also in the same Abbey, the Sepulchre of that Ordgar before named: and the huge bignesse of his sonnes tomb, who was called Ordulph, is thought to be a rare thing worth the sight: for he was a man of a mighty stature giant like, and of exceeding great strength, as who was able to burst in sunder the bars of great gates, and to stride over the rivelet there, ten foote broad; if ye list to believe the said William. But scarcely had this Abbey stood thirty yeare after it was first founded, when the Danes in their spoyling rage burnt it to the ground: yet it flourished againe, and by a laudable ordinance, lectures therein were kept of our ancient

ent language (I mean the English Saxon tongue) which continued even to our fathers daies; for feare lest the said language (a thing that now is well neere come to passe) should be forgotten. Tamar having thus received the Teave, draweth now very neere unto his mouth, where he and the river Plime together fall into the Ocean: of which river the Towne adjoining to it, is called Plimmouth: sometime named Sutton: and seemeth to have consisted of two parts. For, we read in the Parliamentary Acts, of Sutton * Vautort, and Sutton Prior, because it belonged partly to the family of the Vautorts, and partly to the Prior. Of late time it became of a poore fisher village to be a great Towne, and for the number of Inhabitants growne to that passe, (as now it is to be scene) that it may bee compared with a Citie. Such is the commodiousnesse of the haven, which without striking faile admitteth into the bosome thereof the tallest ships that be, & doth harbour them very safely, as well within Tamar as Plime, and beside against hostilitie sufficiently fortified: For, before the very midst of the havens mouth, lieth S. Michaels Isle, strongly fortified both by nature, and art: as for the haven it selfe at the very Towne, it hath fortifications on both sides, and is chained over when need requirerh, having on the South side a Pier against it, and upon an hill next adjoining a Castle built, as it is thought, by the * Vautorts. The whole Towne is divided into foure * Wards, governed by a * Major, ordained there by K. Henry the Sixth, and under him every ward had in times past a Captaine set over it, each of them likewise had his inferiour officers. As touching that fabulous wrestling betweene Corinamus, and Gogmagog the Giant in this place, let it suffice to set downe a versetwo out of Architenius concerning the same, and the Westerne Giants.

*Hos, audum belli robur Corinam Averno
Præpititis misit, cubitis ter quatuor alsum
Gogmagog Herculeâ suspendit in ære luctâ;
Anthemûq; sum scopulo destruxit in aquor.
Posavitque dato Thetis ebria sanguine fluctus, Divisumq; tulit mare corpus, Cerberus umbram.*

These martiall monsters, Giants strong, by Corinamus slaine;
With Gogmagog twelve cubits high, a combat did remaine:
Whom up he hang'd twixt heaven and earth, (thus once Alcides hung Antæus fell) and from the rock into the Sea him flung.
His bloud gave Thetis the waves to drinke (her selfe therewith was drunke)
His grisly ghost had Cerberus, when body torne was funke.

As for that rock, from whence, they say, this Giant was cast down, it is now called the Haw: a very hill standing between the Town and the Ocean: on the top whereof, which lieth spred into a most pleasant plaine, there is a right delectable, and goodly prospect every way, and for the use of Sailers a very faire Compass erected. The circuit of this Town not great, but much renowned it is among forraigne nations: and not so much for the commodious haven, as the valour of the Inhabitants in sea services of all sorts. For (to say nothing of all others) from hence was Sir Francis Drake that famous Knight, and most skilfull man at sea in our daies; who first (as I have heard himselfe relate) to repair the losses which he had sustained at the Spaniards hands, for two yeares space together with victorious successe held and kept the Bay of Mexico as it were besieged, and travailed over the * Isthmus of Dariena: From whence when he had once beheld the South sea (as the Spaniards call it) as another Themistocles stirred up with the Trophees of Miltiades, thought hee should have neglected himselfe, his country, and his owne glory, unless he failed over it, which continually presented it selfe as an object to his adventurous mind. In the yeare therefore 1577. putting to sea from hence, he entred into the streits of Magellan, and in two yeares and ten moneths, through many alternative varieties of fortune, God being his guide, and valour his confort, was the next after Magellanus, that sailed round about the world. Whereupon, one wrote thus unto him.

*Drake, pererrasti novit quem terminus orbis,
Quemq; semel mundi vidit uterq; polus.*

Francis Drake.

* Narrow passage.

*Si taceant homines, facient te sidera notum,
Sol nescit comitis immemor esse sui.*

Sir Drake, whom well the worlds end knows, which thou did'st compass round:
And whom both poles of heaven once saw, which North and South doe bound:
The Starres above will make thee knowne, if men here silent were,
The Sunne himselfe cannot forget his fellow-travailler.

The rest of his noble exploits, and of others who descended from hence taking example by him, flourished in glorious archivements by sea, seeing it belongs not to this place, let Historians record in writing. Neither have I ought else to say more of this Towne, but that in the raigne of William * Rufus, there flourished heere one Ealphege, a learned and married Priest. For, untill the yeare 1102. Priests in England were not forbidden to have their wives. Then, Anselme Archbishop of Canterbury violently forced both the sacred Scripture, and nature also, as our writers in those daies doe complaine, and namely, Henry of Huntingdon expressely of Anselme in these termes: He prohibited English Priests to have wives, who before-time were not prohibited. Which, as some thought to be a matter of greatest puritie: so others againe tooke it to be most perilous, lest while by this means they aimed at cleanness above their power, they should fall into horrible uncleannesse, to the exceeding great shame of Christianitie.

More inward in the country, and yet not farre from the water of Plim, is Plimpton seated, a mercate Towne, well frequented, where the remnants, and deformed ruines of a Castle shew themselves: of which many men have holden as our Lawyers terme it, in Castle guard; for it was the chiefe seat of the Redverses, or the Riparii, (for both we read) who were Barons of Plimpton, and Earles of Dentshire. Next unto this, stood Plimpton S. Mary, the glorie whereof then fell to decay, when as not long since the Colledge there of Canons was dissolved, which William Warlewast, Bishop of Exeter, in old time had founded. More, Eastward you see Modburie, a little Towne, which acknowledgeth it selfe to appertaine to the ancient and right worshipfull family of the Campernulphs, Knights, who also are called in old Deeds De campo Arnulphi, but commonly Champernouns, which received much advancement and reputation by the heire of the Vautorts.

From Plims mouth, where the South shore of this region beginneth, the countrey runneth along with a large and great front as farre as to Stert, a cape or promontorie (for, so the word in the English Saxon tongue signifieth) but so soone as the shore hath drawne it selfe back land-ward, the river Dert breaketh out, which arising from the inward part of the country runneth downe apace, through certaine leane and high grounds, called thereupon Dertmore, (wherein of late were Lode stones found) and carrieth downe with it certaine grit, and sand out of the Tin-mines, (which by little and little choke up the channell) through the Forrest of Dortmore, where David of Sciredun held lands in Sciredun, and Siplegh, by this tenure or service, to find two arrowes, when the King his soveraigne Lord should come to hunt in that Forrest: From thence by Dertinton, a Baronic sometimes of the Martins, who were Lords of Keimes in Wales, it holdeth in his streame unto Totnes. Which being an ancient little Towne standing pendant upon the fall of an hill, East, and West, flourished sometime in great honour. It paid no * tribute, as we find in Doomesday, the survey-book of England, but when Exeter paid; and then it yielded xl.d. and did service, if any expedition marched by land, or went by sea: and Totnes, Barnestaple and Lidford served and paid, as much as Exeter. King John granted unto it power to chuse a Major for the chiefe Magistrate: Edward the First enriched it with sundry liberties; and about that time it was fortified with a Castle by the Zouches, as the Inhabitants are perfwaded. The possession it was in times past of one Induël, surnamed De Totnais; afterwards of William Briwer a right noble personage, by one of whose daughters it came to the Brooses, and from them by a daughter likewise to George De * Cantelupo, Lord of Abergeveny, whose sister Melicent wedded unto Eudo De la Zouch, brought it in by her marriage to the family of the Barons La Zouches: and theirs it was, untill that John, Lord Zouch being attaint and proscribed, because hee tooke part with King Richard the Third, Henry the Seventh bestowed it frankly (as I have heard say) upon Peter Edgecombe a noble and wife gentleman. Adjoyning to this towne is Berie Pomerie, so called of the Pomeries a right noble house in those parts, which a little more Eastward, and somewhat farther from the river side, had a very proper Castle of their owne. These derive their pedigree from Radulph Pomerie, who in William Conquerors time held Wich, Dunwinesdon, Braverdine, Pudeford, Horewood, Teriland, Hekcom, and this Berie, &c. Of this Totnes, the frond or shore adjoyning, was called in old time Totonesse: where (as the British Historie saith) Brutus the founder of the British nation first landed, and Havillanus, as a Poet, relying thereon verified in this wife:

*Inde dato cursu, Brutus comitatus Achae, Gallorum spoliis cumulat is navibus aquor
Exarat, & superis, auram, faventibus usus, Littora felices intrat Totonesia portus.*

Thence hoisting sailes with Gaulish spoiles the fleet freight sea doth take Our Brutus with his trustiest friend; and through waves way doth make:
The Gods lookt cheerefull on his course, the wind he had at will;
At Totnesse shore, that happy haven, arriv'd he and stood still.

But, that river Dert, whereof I spake, having passed beyond Totnes bridge, at which it leaveth whole heape of lands brought downe by his streame from out of the Tin mases, hath for prospect on both sides, nothing but fruitfull fields, untill he come all weary with his long course, to his mouth; over which upon a hill reaching forth in length, standeth Dertmouth a Port Towne, by reason of the commodious haven, defended with two Castles, much frequented with Merchants and furnished with very good shipping. A Major it hath, by the grant of King Edward the Third. For Lords it acknowledged long since the Zouches, Nicolas of Tenkesbury, and the Briems, according to the variable change of the times; and hath sundry times defended it selfe stoutly against the French: but especially in the yeare of Christ 1404. Monsieur De Castell, a Frenchman, who by his men of warre and piracies had stopp'd all intercoure of traffique in those parts, and burnt Plimmouth, whiles hee invaded this place, was by women, and country people intercepted, and slaine with all his compaignie. And heere I must not passe over in silence Stoke Fleming that lieth hard by, and which taking that name of a noble man of Flanders, sometime Lord thereof, came by the daughter of Mohun to the Carewes.

From this place, as the shore giveth backe Northward, the sea followeth in upon it, and by that meanes with a large and spacious creeke, which taketh about ten miles in circuit maketh a bay, called now Torbay: a very safe rode and harbour for ships when the South-west wind is aloft; and hath fast by it a little village so called, where sometime the Briewrs dwelt, and built a religious house, who in the daies of King Richard the First, and King John, were men of great renowne and revenue: and afterward the habitation it was of the Wakes. Neere unto it is Cockington, where the family of the Caries (a different house from that of the Carewes) hath flourished a long time in great honour and estimation; out of which the Barons of Hunsdon, concerning whom I will speake more in due place, are descended. A little higher appears in sight Hacombe, the habitation in old time of Sir Jordan Fitz-Stephen Knight, surnamed of this place, de Hacombe: by whose daughter and heire Cecilie, it came into the familie of the Archdeacons; From which likewise by Hugh Courtney in proceesse of time, it was devolved upon the Carewes, whose house in these parts is reputed very worshipfull, and spread into many branches. For, Jane the daughter of the said Hugh, and heire to her mother, being joynd in marriage to Nicolas Baron Carew, brought him many children: and when the eldest of them, named Thomas, used not his mother with such dutifull respect as a sonne ought, she made a conveyance of that great, and wealthy inheritance to her three younger sonnes (from whom those three families of the Carews, de Hacombe, Anthony, and Bery are sprung) and to John Vere, a sonne that she had by a second husband, from whom the Earles of Oxford are issued.

Then

A Then meet you with Teignemouth a little village at the mouth of the river Teigne, whereof it hath also the name: where the Danes that were sent before to discover the situation of Britaine, and to sound the landing places, being first set a shore about the yeare of Salvation 800. and having slaine the governour of the place, tooke it as an ominous good token of future victorie; which indeed afterward they followed with extreme crueltie through the whole Island. More inward, neere unto the source of the river Teigne is Cheggford seated, where flourished sometime the noble family of the Prows: then Chidley, which gave the name to that great house, and linage of the Chidleyes: and next unto the very mouth thereof, Bishops Teignton, so called because it belonged to the Bishops; in which because there was a Sanctuarie, John Grandison descended out of Burgundy, Bishop of Exceter, as presaging what would ensue in future time built a very faire house, to the end that his Successors (these are the very words of his testament) might have a place whereon to leane, and lay their heads, if happily their Temporalities should be seized into the Kings hands. But so farre was it off that his purpose tooke effect, that his successors have not only lost that house, but also beene quite defleized now well neere of all the rest.

About six miles from thence, the river * Ifc, whereof Ptolomee maketh mention, which the Britaines call Ifc, and the English-Saxons Ex, with a large channell runneth into the Ocean. Whether it tooke this name of Ifcaw, that signifieth in the British tongue Elders trees, I wot not. Some fetch it from Reeds, which the Britaines call Hesk, wherewith Northerne nations, (and such are the Britaines) thatched, and covered their houses, yea and fastened together, as it were, with soder, the joynts of their ships. But considering that there be no reeds heere found, I am not hasty to give credit thereto. This river hath his head, and springeth first in a weely, and barren ground named Exmore, neere unto Severn sea, a great part whereof is counted within Sommerfetshire: and wherein, there are seene certaine monuments of anticke worke, to wit, Stones pitched in order, some triangle wise, others in a round circle, and one among the rest with an Inscription in Saxon letters, or Danish rather, to direct those (as it should seeme) who were to travaile that way. Now this Ex or Ifc beginning his course first from thence Southward by Tnisfordon, so called of two foorde, but commonly Teverton, a Towne standing much upon clothing, to the great gaine, and credit thereof, passeth forward through a faire country of good, and fertile fields, and is augmented with two especial rivelets, Creden from the West, and Columb from the East. Upon Creden in the Primitive Church of the Saxons, there flourished an Episcopall See, in a Towne of the same name, anciently called Cridiantun, now by contraction Kirton: where that Winifride or Boniface was borne, who converted the Hesians, Thuringers, and Frisians of Germany unto Christ, and for that was accounted the Apostle of Germany, and canonized a Saint. At this present, it is of no great reckoning, but for a small market, and the Bishop of Exceter his house there: E but within our fathers remembrance of much greater name, and request it was for a Colledge there of twelve Prebendaries, who now are all vanished and gone. The river Columb that commeth from the East, passeth hard by Columbton, a little Towne bearing his name: which King Alfred by his Testament, bequeathed to his younger sonne: and neere unto Poltimore the seate of that worshipfull, and right ancient family of Bampfild, intermingleth it selfe with the waters of Ex. And now by this time, Ifc or Ex growing bigger, and sporting himselfe, as it were, with spreading into many streames, very commodious for mills, hieth apace, and commeth close to the Citie of Exceter, unto which he leaveth his name: whereupon Alexander Neckam writeth thus, in his Poem of Divine sapience:

Exonia fama celebrimur Iscianomen Præbuit.

To Exceter, Ex a River of fame
(First Ifcia call'd) impos'd the name.

This Citie Ptolomee calleth Isca, Antoninus Isca Dvnm Oniorvm, for DANMONTORVM; others (but falsely) Augusta, as if the second Legion Augusta had there beene

beene resident; Whereas, wee shall shew hereafter that it kept station, and residence in * ISCA SILVRVM. The English Saxons termed it Exancester, and Monketon, of the Monks, at this day it is called Excefter, in Latine Exonia, in British Caerisk, Caeruth, and Pencaer, that is, a head or principall Citie. For Caer, (to tell you once for all) with our * Britans is as much to say, as a Citie, whereupon they use to name Jerusalem, Caer Salem; Lutetia or Paris, Caer Paris; Rome, Caer Ruffaine. Thus Carthage in the Punick tongue, was called, as Solinus witnesseth, Carthaea, that is, the new Citie. I have heard likewise, that Caer in the Syriack tongue, signified, a Citie. Now seeing that the Syrians, as all men confesse, peopled the whole world with their Colonies, may seeme probable, that they left their tongue also to their posteritie, as the mother of all future languages. This Citie, as saith William of Malmesbury, albeit the soiled, joyning bee wet, foule and wealie, scarce able to bring forth hungry oates, and many times empty huskes without graine in them, yet by reason of the flatnesse of the place, the riches of the Inhabitants, and frequent concourse of strangers, all kind of traffique, and commerce of merchants is there so fresh, that a man can aske there for no necessary, but hee may have it. Scituate it is on the Eastward banke of the river Ex, upon a little hill gently arising with an easie ascent to a pretty heighth, the pendant whereof lieth East, and West, environed about with ditches, and very strong walles, having many turrets orderly interposed, and containeth in circuit a mile and a halfe, having suburbs running out a great way on each side. In it there are xv. Parish-Churches, and in the very highest part thereof, neere the East gate, a Castle called Rugemont, sometime the feat of the West Saxon Kings, and afterwards of the Earles of Cornwall: but at this day commended for nothing else, but the antiquitie and situation thereof. For it commandeth the whole Citie, and territorie about it, and hath a very pleasant prospect into the sea. In the East quarter of the City, is to be seen the Cathedrall Church in the midst of many faire houses round about it, founded as the private history of the place witnesseth, by King Athelstan in the honour of Saint Peter, and replenished with Monks: which Church at length Edward the Confessor after he had removed some of the Monks from thence to Westminster, and translated thither the shops Sees of Cornwall, and Kinton, adorned with Episcopall Dignitie, and made Leofrike the Britan first Bishop there: whose Successours augmented the Church both with Edifices, and also with revenues: and William Bruier the ninth Bishop after him, when the Monks were displaced, brought in a Deane, and twentie and four Prebendaries. In which age flourished Joseph Ifcanus borne heere, and from hence taking his surname, a Poet of most excellent wit, whose writings were so well approved, as that they had equall commendation with the works of ancient Poets: For, his Poem of the Trojan war, was divulged once or twice in Germanie under the name of Cornelius Nepos.

When this Citie * Isca came under the Roman Jurisdiction it appeareth not for certaine: For, so farre off am I from thinking that Vespasian wonne it, (as Gessney of Monmouth affirmeth) what time as he warring in Britaine under Claudius the Emperour, was shewed by the Destinies unto the world, that I thinke it was then scarcely built. Yet in the time of the Antonines, it may seeme to have beene well knowne: for hither, and no farther this way did Antonine specifie any place in his way-faring book. It came not fully to the English-Saxons hands before the 465. yeare after their entrance into Britain. For, at that time Athelstane expelled the Britans quite out of the Citie, who before had inhabited it in equall right with the Saxons, yea, and drave them beyond Tamar, and then fortified the Citie round about with a rampire, and wall of fouresquare stone, and other bulwarks for defence. Since which time, many benefits by the Kings have beene bestowed upon it, and among the rest, as we read in William the Conquerours * booke, This Citie paid no tribute, but when London, Torke, and Winchester paid, and that was halfe a marke of silver for a souldiers service. And when there was any expedition set out either by sea or land, it served in proportion in five hides. It hath bene likewise from time to time much afflicted, once spoiled and fore shaken, by the furious outrages of the Danes, in the yeare of our redemption tion 875. but most grievously by Suen the Dane in the yeare 1003. at which time by the treacherie of one Hugh a Norman Governor of the citie, it was rased and ruined along from the East gate to the West. And scarcely began it to flourish againe, when William the Conquerour, most straightly beleaguered it: when the Citizens in the meane while thought it not sufficient to shut their gates against him, but malapartly let flie taunts, and flouts at him: but when a piece of their wall fell downe, by the speciall hand of God, as the Historians of that age report, they yielded immediately thereupon. At which time, as we find in the said survey-booke of his, The King had in this Citie three hundred houses: it paid fifteene pounds by the yeare, and fortie houses were destroyed after that the King came into England. After this it was thrice besieged, and yet it easily avoided all: First, by Hugh Courtney Earle of Denhire in that civill warre betweene the two houses of Lancaster and Yorke: then, by Perkin Warbeck that imaginarie, counterfeit and pretended Prince, who being a young man of a very base condition, faining himselfe to be Richard Duke of Yorke, the second sonne of King Edward the Fourth, stirred up dangerous stirres against Henrie the Seventh: thirdly, by seditious Rebels of Cornwall, in the yeare of Christ 1549: at which time the Citizens, most grievously pinched though they were with scarcitie of all things, continued neverthelesse in their faith and allegiance, untill that John Lord Russell, raised the siege, and delivered them.

But Excefter received not so great damage at these enemies hands, as it did by certaine dammes, which they call Weares, that Edward Courtney Earle of Denhire, taking high displeasure against the Citizens, made in the river Ex, which stop the passage so, that no vessell can come up to the Citie; but since that time all merchandize is carried by land from Topesham three miles off. And albeit it hath beene decreed by Act of Parliament, to take away these Weares, yet they continue there still. Hereupon, the little Towne adjoining is call Weare, being aforetime named, Heneaton: which was sometime the possession of Augustine de Bas: from whom in right of inheritance it descended to John Holland, who in his signet which my selfe have seene bare a Lion rampant, gardant among flowers de Lys. The civill government of this Citie is in the power of foure and twenty persons: out of whom there is from yeare to yeare a Major elected; who with foure Bailiffes ruleth heere the State. As touching the Geographickall description of this place, the old tables of Oxford have set downe the longitude thereof to be nineteene degrees, and eleven scruples: the latitude fiftie degrees, and fortie scruples or minutes.

This Citie; that I may not omit so much, hath had three Dukes. For, Richard the Second of that name, King of England, created John Holland Earle of Huntingdon and his brother by the mothers side, the first Duke of Excefter: whom Henrie the Fourth deposed from this dignitie, and left unto him the name onely of Earle of Huntingdon: and soone after for conspiracie against the King he lost both it and his life by the hatchet. Some few yeares after, Henry the Fifth set in his place Thomas Beaufort of the house of Lancaster, and Earle of Dorset, a right noble and worthy warriour. When he was dead leaving no issue behind him, John Holland sonne of that aforesaid John, (as heire unto his brother Richard who died without children, and to his father both) being restored to his blood, by the favour and bounty of King Henry the Sixth recovered his fathers honor; and left the same to Henry his sonne, who so long as the Lancastrians stood upright, flourished in very much honor; but afterwards when the family of Yorke, was a float and had rule of all, gave an example to teach men, how ill trusting it is to great Fortunes. For this was that same Henry, Duke of Excefter, who albeit he had wedded King Edward the Fourth his sister, was driven to such miserie, that he was seene all tottered, torne, and barefooted to begge for his living in the Low countries. And in the end after Barnet field fought, wherein he bare himselfe valiantly against Edward the Fourth, was no more seene, untill his dead bodie (as if he had perished by Shipwracke) was cast upon the shore of Kent. A good while after this, Henry Courtney, Earle of Denhire, the sonne of Margarine daughter to King Edward the Fourth, was advanced to the honour of Marquesse queſſe of Exceſter by Henry the Eighth, and deſigned heire apparant. But this Maqueſſe as well as the firſt Duke was by his high parentage, caſt into a great tempeſt of troubles, wherein as a man ſubject to ſuſpitions, and deſirous of a change in the State, he was quickly overthrowne. And among other matters becauſe he had with money, and counſell aſſiſted Reginald Poole (afterwards Cardinal) then a fugitive, practiſing with the Emperour and the Pope, againſt his owne Country, and the King who had now abrogated the Popes authoritie; he was judicially arraigned, and being condemned, with ſome others, loſt his head. But now of late by the favour of King James, Thomas Cecill Lord Burleigh, enjoyeth the title of Earle of Exceſter, a right good man, and the worthy ſonne of ſo excellent a father, being the eldeſt ſonne of William Cecill Lord Burleigh, high Treafurer of England, whoſe wiſedome for a long time was the ſupport of peace, and Englands happy quietneſſe.

From Exceſter, going to the very mouth of the River, I find no monument of Antiquitie, but Exminiſter, ſometime called Exanminiſter, bequeathed by King El- fred to his younger ſonne; and Pouderham Caſtle built by *Iſabell de * Riparius*, the ſea long time of that moſt noble family of the Courtneys, Knights: who being lineally deſcended from the ſtock of the Earles of Denſhire, and allied by affinity to moſt honorable houſes, flouriſh ſtill at this day, moſt worthy of their deſcent from ſo high Anceſtors. Under Pouderham, Ken a pretty brooke entrencheth into Ex, which riſeth neere Holcombe, where in a Parke is a faire place built by Sir Thomas Denis, whoſe family fetcheth their firſt off-ſpring and ſurname from the Danes, and were anciently written Le Dan Denis, by which name the Corniſh called the Danes. But lower upon the very mouth of the river on the other banke ſide, as the name it ſelfe doth teſtifie, ſtandeth Exmouth; knowne by nothing elſe but the name, and for that ſome fiſhermen dwelt therein.

More Eaſtward, Otterey, that is, The River of Otters, or River-Dogs, which we call Otters, as may appear by the ſignification of the word, falleth into the ſea; which runneth hard under Honnyton, a Towne not unknowne to thoſe that travell into theſe parts, and was given by Iſabell, heire to Earles of Devonſhire, to King Edward the Firſt, when her iſſue failed: and doth import his name to certaine places. Among which theſe are of greateſt note: above Honnyton, Mohuns Ottery, the poſſeſſion times paſt of the Mohuns, from whom by right of marriage it came to the Carews:
beneath Honnyton Saint Maries Otterey, ſo called of Saint Maries Colledge, which Joh Grandiſon Biſhop of Exceſter founded, who drew the whole eſtates of all the Clergie men in his Dioceſſe to himſelfe. For he perſwaded them in their Wills to give up, and make over all that they had unto his hands, as who would beſtow the ſame to godly uſes, in cadowing Churches, and in building of Hoſpitals, and Colledges therewith, which verily he (by report) performed accordingly very devoutly.

From the mouth of this Otterey, the ſhore runneth Eaſtward with many winding reaches, and turning creekes, by Budley, Sidmouth, and Seaton, famous Ports in times paſt, but now the havens there are ſo choked up with ſand, brought in with the reprocall courſe of the tides, and heaped up againſt them, that they have almoſt utterly loſt all that benefit. As for Seaton, I would gheſſe it to be that MORIDUNUM, which Antoninus ſpeaketh of, and is placed betwene DYNOVARIA and Iſca, (ſee the booke be not faultie) and called in Peutingerius table by a name cut ſhort, RIDV- NVM, conſidering both the diſtance, and the ſignification of the name. For, Mari- dunum in the Britiſh tongue is the very ſame that Seaton in Engliſh, to wit, A Towne upon an hill by the ſea. Hereto adjoyneth Wiſcomb, a Towne memorable in this reſpect that in it there dwelt William Lord Bonevill, whoſe heire Cecilie by her marriage brought the titles of Lord Bonevill, and Harington with a goodly inheritance in theſe parts, unto Thomas Grey Marqueſſe Dorſet.

Under theſe Townes the River Ax diſchargeth it ſelfe at a very ſmall chan-nell, after it hath paſſed downe by Ford, where Adelize daughter to Baldwine of Okehampton, founded an Abbey for Ciſtercian Monkes, 1140. and by Axminiſter, a Towne renowned in the ancient Hiſtories onely for their Tombes of the Saxon Princes,

A Princes, who were ſlaine in that bloody battell at Brunnaburg, and tranſlated hither; and ſituate it is in the very frontire and limit of this Province. Neere unto which Reginald Mohun of Duſſer, unto whom the Mannour of Axminiſter in right of inheritance fell by the Fourth daughter of William de Briewr, built the Abbey of Newen- ham in the yere of Grace 1246. Hence the Eaſt-bound runneth crookedly north-weſtward, by villages of no fame toward Severn ſide, along w^{ch} now let us take our way.

From Cornwall the firſt ſhore in this ſhire that stretcheth out it ſelfe in length to the Severn Sea, is by Ptolomee called, THE PROMONTORIE OF HERCULES, and retaineth ſtill ſome little remnant of that name, being called at this day Herty.
B point, and hath in it two pretty townes, Herton, and Hertland, famous in old time for the reliques of that holy man Saint Neſtan. In honour of whom there was erected heere a little Monaſterie, by Githa Earle Goodwins wife, who had this Neſtan in eſpeciall reverence, for that ſhe was perſwaded, that for his merits her husband had eſcaped the danger of ſhipwracke in a violent and raging tempeſt. Howbeit afterwards, the Dinants, who alſo are named Dinhams, that came out of Bretagne in France, whoſe demeanors, as in fee it was, were counted the founders thereof: and from them deſcended Baron Dinham, Lord high Treafurer of England, under K. Henry the Seventh, by whoſe ſiſters, and heires, the inheritance was divided between Lord Zouch, Bourchier Fitz-warin, Carew, and Arundell.

C The name of this Promontorie hath given credit to a very formall tale, That Hercules (forſooth) came into Britaine, and vanquiſhed here I wot not what Giants.
But if it be true as * Mythologers affirme, that there was never any Hercules, but that by him the power of humane wiſedome is underſtood, whereby wee overcome pride, luſt, envie, and ſuch like monſters: or if, according to the Gentiles divinitie, by Hercules they meane the Sunne, and by thoſe twelve Labours, endured and performed by Hercules, the twelve ſignes of the Zodiack, which the Sunne in his yearely courſe paſſeth through; what it is they ſay, let them looke to it themſelves. But for mine owne part, I willingly believe that there was an Hercules, nay, I could be content to grant with Varro, that there were of them fortie and three, all whoſe acts were aſcribed to that Hercules, who was the ſonne of Alcmena; yet can I not perſwade my ſelfe, that ever Hercules came hither, unleſſe haply hee failed over the Ocean in that Cup which God Nerius had given him, whereof Atheæus maketh mention.
But you will ſay, that Franciſcus Philoſophus in his Epistles, and Lilius Giraldus in his Hercules, averre no leſſe. Pardon mee, I pray you; theſe latter writers may well moove mee, but they are not able to remoove mee, conſidering that Diodorus Si- culus, who went on with the Greekiſh hiſtorie in order, even from the moſt remote, and firſt records of all Antiquitie, in plaine termes affirmeth, that neither Hercules, nor Father Bacchus went ever into Britaine. I am therefore verily perſwaded, that

E the name of Hercules even to this place, came either through the vanitie of Greekes, or from the ſuperſtitious Religion of Britaines. For, as theſe being a moſt warlike Nation themſelves, had valiant men in marvellous admiration, and as highly eſteemed of ſuch as vanquiſhed Monſters: ſo, the Greekes againe, whatſoever was any where ſtately, and magnificent, that they referred to the glory of Hercules: and becauſe hee had bene a great traveller, ſuch as travelled were wont to offer ſacrifice unto him; and to him likewiſe conſecrate the places where they firſt arrived. Hereof came Hercules-rocke in * Campania, Hercules Haven in * Liguria, Her- cules Grove in Germanie: hence likewiſe, the Promontories of Hercules in Mauritania, Galatia, and Britaine.

As the ſhore giveth backe againe from this Promontorie of Hercules, the two his channell maketh way Northward, insulating in a manner Podridge the Manse of the Familie, furnamed, Monke. Happily for that some one of them being a professed Monke by dispensation to continue his house, returned to temporall state, as that Noble house in France furnamed Archevesque, that is, Archbishop, tooke the name to continue the memorie that one of the Progenitours of an Archbishop, returned by dispensation to be a Temporall man. Certainly, whencesoever the name came, it is ancient, and they have worshipfully matched; and not long since with one of the daughters of Arthur Plantagenet, Vicount Lisley, naturall sonne to King Edward the Fourth. Hence Towridge hasteneth to Tourington. which it giveth name unto, standing over it in a great length upon the brow of a little hill: by Bediford so, a towne of right good name for the frequent resort of people, and number of inhabitants, as also for a goodly stone bridge, with arched worke, where straightwaies windeth it selte into the Taw. This Taw breaking forth out of the very midst and heart of the shire, first runneth downe by Chimligh a little market towne, not far from Cheshampton a small Village, where Hyertha, canonized a Shee-Saint, lay interred: from thence having passed by Tawton, where Westfane, and Putta, the first Bishops of Denshire had their See, about the yeare of our Lord 906, and Tawfoke over against it, now the seate of the right honourable Earle of Bathe, it maketh haste to Berstable. Reputed this is a very ancient Towne, and for elegant building, and frequency of people held chiefe in all this coast, situate amidst hilles in forme of a semicircle upon the river, being as it were, a diameter. Which River at every change and full of the Moone, by the swelling of the Ocean, overfloweth the fields so, as the very Towne it selte seemeth to be a demie Island: but when, (as one saith) * the sea receiveth it selte backe againe into the sea, it is so shallow, creeping betweene sands and shelves, as it hardly beareth smaller vessels. On the fourth side it hath a stately bridge built by one Stamford a Citizen of London: In the North part, where North End little river or brooke runneth, are seene the reliques of a Castle, which by the common report, King Athelstane, but (as others say) Iudaël of Totenais built: for the keeping, and defence whereof certaine Lands adjoyning therabout, are held in Collegiate guard. It had sometimes a wall about it, but now there remaine scarce any small remains thereof: The said Iudaël of Totenais received it in free gift in fee of King William the First: after him the Tracis held it for a long time: then, the Martins: and whom in the rainge of King Richard the Second, it came to John Holland Earle of Huntingdon, who afterwards was Duke of Excester; and last of all it fell to the Crowne. But Queene Mary gave the Mannour to Thomas Marrow, whose son sold it away. In K. William the First his daies, as we find in Domesday booke, It had with in the Burgh fortie Burgeses, and nine without. King Henrie the First, endowed it with many privileges, and King John with more. A Major, and two Bailiffes for a long time it had: but Queene Mary ordained there a Major, two Aldermen, and a Court fell of twentie and foure. The Inhabitants (for the most part) are Merchants, who by France, and Spaine trade, and traffique much. Neither must this be passed over with silence, that out of this Towns-Schoole, their issued two right learned men, and renowned Divines, John Jewell Bishop of Sarisbury, and Thomas Harding the publicke professor in Lovain, who most horly contended, and wrote learnedly one against the other, concerning the truth of Religion.

From hence, the river Taw saluting (as it were) Ralegh, which in times past had noble Lords of that name, but now is the possession of a right worshipfull house, furnamed Chichester: and afterwards encreased by Towbridge water, falleth into the Severne Sea, but it meeteth not with Kinwith Castle, whereof Afferius maketh mention. For, here about such a Castle there was of that name, for seite of the ground about it, very safe on every side, save onely on the East quarter: at the which in the yeare of Christ, 879. Hubba the Dane, who with many slaughters and overthrowes had harried the English Nation, was (with many other Danes) slaine. And thereupon the place afterwards was called by our Historiographers, Hubbestow. And then it was that the Englishmen wan the Danes banner, called, Reafan. Which, I note there fore the rather, because it may be gathered out of a pretty tale in Afferius Meneven, who hath delivered these things in writing, that the Danes bare in their Ensigne a Raven wrought (by report) in needle-worke, by the daughters of Lothbrooke, that is, Leather-breech, the Dane, with such an opinion of good lucke, as they thought that it never should be wonne.

After this, nothing there is to bee seene upon this coast but Ilfarcomb, a good and sure rode for ships, and Comb-Marton bordering hard upon it: under which, old mines of lead, not without veins of silver, have of late beene discovered. As for this word Comb, (to observe so much once for all) which is an usuall adjection to names of places in this tract, it signifieth, a low situation, or a Vale: and derived it may seeme to be of Kum a British word, that betokeneth the same: and the French men in their tongue retaineth it still in the very same sense, from the ancient Gallique language; the same with old British.

More South-East from hence, and neere unto Somersetshire Bampton, sometimes Bacinn, sheweth it selfe: which under William the Conquerour befell unto Walter de Dorey, with other right large and faire lands else where: of whose posteritie Iulianus Inheritrix, married to William Paganell, commonly Paynell, bare * Fulk de Bampton: and he begat William, and Christian the wife of Cogan of Ireland whose posteritie succeeded in the possession thereof; for that the issue of the said William died without children. But from the Cogans, the possession descended at length hereditarily unto the Bourchiers now Earles of Bathe, by an heire of Hancford, who had married likewise an heire of the Lord Fitz-warin.

In the prime and infancy of the Normans Empire, (to say nothing of Hugh the Norman whom Queene Emnia had before time made Ruler over this countrey) King William the First ordained one Baldwin to be the hereditarie Sheriffe, or Vicount of Denshire, and Baron of Okehampton: after whom succeeded in that honour Richard his sonne, who died without issue male: Then, King Henrie the First, bestowed upon Richard de Redversis, First Tiverton, and afterwards the honour of Plampton with other places appertaining thereto: and consequently created him Earle of Denshire, by granting unto him the third partie of the yearly revenues growing out of the same Countie. Now the revenue of the Countie which in those daies was due to the King, was not above thirtie marks: out of which, the said Earle tooke unto him for his part, ten marks yearly. After this hee obtained of the said King, the Isle of Wigh: whereupon styled hee was, Earle of Denshire, and Lord of the Isle. Hee had a Sonne named Baldwin, who siding with Maude the Empreffe against King Stephen was banished the Realme: Howbeit, Richard his Sonne recovered this honour of his Fathers: and hee left behind him two Sonnes, Baldwin, and Richard, who in order successively were Earles of Denshire, and died without issue. The honour therefore reverted backe againe to their unkle by their fathers side, named, William, furnamed, de Vernon, because he was there borne. This William begat Baldwin, who departed this life before his father: yet before his death, he had begotten of Margaret, daughter to Gwarin Fitz-Gerold, Baldwin the third of that name, Earle of Denshire. This Baldwin had two children, to wit, Baldwin the last Earle out of this family, that died without issue 1261. who changed the Ghryphon, clapping and crushing a little beast, (which mark his Ancestours used in their seate) into a Scutcheon, or with a Lyon rampant; azur; and * Isabell, who being espoused to William * de Fortibus, Earle of Albemarle, bare to him a Sonne, named Thomas, who died soone after, and Avellina a daughter married to Edmund Earle of Lancaster, whom she mightily enriched, with the inheritance of her father, and died issueless. After some time, King Edward the Third, by his letter missive onely, without any other complement of ceremonies, created Hugh Courtney, Earle of Devonshire, and linked as cousin, and next heire to the said Isabel. For he commanded him by vertue of those missives, to use that title, and by a precept to the high Sheriffe of the Shire, commanded he should be so acknowledged. Reginald Courtney was the first of this family that came into England, brought thither by King Henry the Second, and by him advanced with the marriage of the heire of the the Baronie of Okehampton, for that he procured the marriage betweene the said King and Eleonor his heire of Peitzu and Aquitaine. But whether hee was branched from the house of Courtney before it was matched in the bloud royall of France after which our Monks affirme, but Du Tillet Keeper of the Records of France doubteth, I may say somewhat in another place. After the first Earle Hugh, succeeded his sonne Hugh; whom Edward his Grand-child, by Edward his Sonne followed, who died before him; and when he died, he left it to his sonne Hugh: and hee likewise Thomas his sonne, who died in the thirtieth and sixth year of King Henry the sixth his raigne. The said Thomas begat three sonnes, namely, Thomas, Henric, and Iohn: whose estate during the heate of those mortall diffensions betweene the houses of Lancaster and Yorke, was much tossed and shaken, whiles they stood resolutely and stiffly for the Lancastrians. Thomas taken at Towton field, was beheaded at Yorke: Henry his brother, and Successour seven yeares after, dranke of the same cup at Salisbury. And although King Edward the Fourth, advanced Sir Humfrey Stafford of Suthwicke to the Earledome of Denshire, who within three moneths revolting from King Edward his advancer most ingratelously, was apprehended, and without processe executed at Bridg-water: yet Iohn Courtney afore said, the youngest brother, would not leave this title, but with his life, which hee lost in the battell of Tewksbury. For a long time after, this family lay in some sort obscured: yet under King Henric the Seventh, it resourised: for, hee advanced againe Edward Courtney the next heire male unto the honors of his Progenitors. He begat William Earle of Devonshire, who matched in wedlocke with Katherine, daughter to King Edward the Fourth: of whom he begat Henry Earle of Devonshire, and Marquesse withall of Excester, who under King Henry the Eighth, lost his head, as we have now shewed: whose Sonne Edward was restored againe by Queene Mary, a most noble young Gentleman, and of passing good hope, but he died an untimely death at Padua in Italy, for, the best men (as saith Quadrigrarius) are of least continuance. In the fortieth and sixth year after his death: King James gave the honorable title of Earle of Devonshire, to Charles Blunt Lord Mountjoy, and Lieutenant Generall of Ireland; which title hee assumed, as descended from a Cousin, and heire of Humfrey Stafford Earle of Devonshire. He was a worthy personage, as well for martiall prowesse, and ornaments of learning, as for ancient nobilitie of birth: for that he had recovered Ireland into the former good estate, by driving out the Spaniards, and by subduing or enforcing the Rebels to submission: Him (I say) he created Earle of Devonshire, him hee heaped with favours, and according to the bountifull munificence of a King mightily enriched. But within a small while, death envied him the fruition both of honour and wealth, which he enjoyed as few yeares, as his Predecessour Humfrey Stafford did moneths.

DVROTRI

DVROTRIGES.

Ext unto the Danmonians Eastward, Ptolomy placeth in his Geographicall tables ΔΟΤΡΟΤΡΙΓΕΣ, as hee wrote in Greeke, who in the Latine copies are written DVROTRIGES. The same people were named by the Brittaines about the yeare of Salvation 890. Dwr-Gwyr, as saith mine Authour Afferius Menevensis, who lived in that age and was himselfe a Britaine borne. The English-Saxons called them Dop-jettan, like as we at this day call this County, the County of Dorset, and Dorset-shire. That name DVROTRIGES, being ancient and meere British, may seeme by a very good and probable Etymologie to be derived of Dovr, or Dwr, which in the British tongue signifieth Water, and of Trig, that betokeneth an Inhabitant, as if a man would say, dwellers by the water or Sea-side. Neither verily from any other fountaine than from water are we to fetch those names of places in old France or Gaule, which used in times past the very same language that our ancient Britans did, which either begin with Dur, and Dour, or doe end in the same, As for example, DVROCASSES, DVROCOTTORVM, DVRAIVS, DORDONIA, DVROLORVM, DOROMELLVM, DIVODVRVM, BREVIDVRVM, BATAVODVRVM, GANODVRVM, OCTODVRVM, and a number of that sort, as well in Gaule as in Britaine. As for that English-Saxon word Dop-jetta, compounded of both tongues, British and English, it carryeth the same sence and signification that DVROTRIGES doth. For, Setta with our old Forefathers, like as with the rest of the Germans, foundeth as much as to inhabit or dwell upon. And therefore they termed mountaners in their language Dun-jettan: the Inhabitants of the Chiltern-hilles, Cyltepn-jettan: the dwellers by the river Arow, Apop-jettan: even as the Germans called the Inhabitants of Woods and Forrests Holt-fatten: because they dwelt within or among the Woods. Neither went our Britans from the reason and meaning of the old name, when they termed these DVROTRIGES, of whom we now treat, Dwr-Gwyr, that is to say, Men bordering on the Maritime or Sea-coast. For, their country lieth stretched out with a shore full of turnings or windings in, and out, for a long tract, to wit by the space of fiftie miles or there about, full upon the British sea, from West to East.

DORSET-

DORSET-SHIRE.

The Countie of Dorset as it is on the Northside bounded with Somersetshire and Wiltshire, on the West with Devonshire and some part of Somersetshire, on the East with Hampshire: so on the South part, where it carrieth the greatest length, it lieth all open to the Sea, bearing upon the British Ocean as I said ere-while for fiftie miles together or much thereabout. A fruitfull soile it is: The North part thereof being overspred with woods and forrests; from thence garnished with many a greene hill, whereon feede flocks of sheepe in great number with pleasant pastures likewise and fruitfull vallies bearing corne: it hath a descent even to the very Sea shore, which in my description I will follow as it leadeth me, for that I can find no better order.

In the very entrance into this, out of Denshire the first place that sheweth it selfe on this shore is Lime, a little towne scituate upon a steepe hill, so called of a small river of the same name running hard by: which scarcely may challenge the name of a Port or Haven towne though it be frequented with fishermen, and hath a rode under it called the Cobbe, sufficiently defended from the force of winds with rocks and high trees. In ancient booke I can hardly find any mention thereof: onely thus much I have read, that King Kinwulfe in the yeare of our Lord 774. gave (by these words) the land of one Mansion unto the Church of Scireburne, hard by the Wersterne bank of the river Lime, not farre from the place where he hideth the course of his streame within the Sea: to this end, that for the said Church salt might be boyled to the sustaining of manifold necessities, Neere thereunto the river Carr dischargeth it selfe into the Sea, and there standeth Carmouth a little village: where the bold roving Danes having good successe in sea-fights, wonne two victories of the English, first vanquished King Egbert in the yeare of Christ 831. and then eight yeares after King Aethelwulfe. Then theris Burport, or more truly Birtport, placed betweene two small rivers which then meete together: In this towne, in the daies of King Edward the Confessor, there were reckoned one hundred and twenty houses, but in William the Conquerors raigne, as we find in his booke of Doomesday, one hundred and no more. In our time in respect of the soile yeilding the best hemp, and skill of the people for making ropes and cables for ships, it was provided by a speciall statute, to remaine in force for a certaine set time, that ropes for the Navie of England should be twisted no where else. Neither is this place able to maintaine the name of an haven, albeit in the mouth of the river being on both sides enclosed within little hilles, nature seemes as it were of purpose to have begun an haven, and requireth in some sort art and mans helpe to accomplish the same.

From hence the shore winding in and out shooteth far into the Sea: and a banke called Chefil of sands heaped up thick together (with a narrow frith betweene) lieth in length for nine miles which the South-wind when it is up, commonly curteth & sunder and disperseth, but the Northerne wind bindeth, and hardneth againe. By this Banke or Sand-ridge, Portland, sometime an Island is now adjoynd to the main-land: The reason of which name is altogether unknowne, unlesse it were so called because it lyeth full against the Port Weymouth: but it soundeth more neere unto the truth, that this name was given it of one Port a noble Saxon, who about the yeare of our Salvation 703. infested and fore annoied these coasts. This Portland in the declining state of the Saxons Empire (for before-time writers never spake of it) felt as much as any other place, from time to time, the violent rage of the Danes. But when the Danish warre was ended, it fell to the possession of the Church of Winchester. For, what what time as Emme mother to King Edward the Confessor (whose name was called in question, and she charged for incontinenzie with Aldwin Bishop of Winchester) had gone bare-foot upon nine culters red hot in Winchester Church without harme (an unusuall kind of triall in those daies, and then called Ordalium) and so cleared her selfe of that imputation, that she made her chastitie by so great a miracle more famous to posteritie: She for a memoriall thereof, gave nine Lordships to the Church of Winchester: and King Edward her sonne, repenting that hee had so wrongfully brought his mothers name into question bestowed likewise upon the said Church this Island with other revenues. It is in compasse scarce seven miles, rising up about the sides with high rocks, but lying flat and low in the midst: Inhabited scatteringly heere and there: plentifull enough of corne, and good to feed sheepe: but so scant of woods, that in default of other fewell they make their fire with oxen and cow dung dried. The Inhabitants, of all English-men were the cunningest slingers; and very often doe find among the weeds or reeds of the sea, Isidis Plocamos, that is, Isis haire, which as Plinie reporteth out of Iuba, is a shrub growing in the Sea nor unlike unto Corall without leafe: cut it up it turneth into a black colour, and if it fall, it soone breaketh. On the East-side it hath one onely Church, and very few houses standing close thereto, and on the North a Castle built by King Henry the Eighth, which also defendeth the entrance into the haven of Weimouth. A little towne this is, upon the mouth of Wey a small river, over against which on the other side of the banke standeth Melcomb, surnamed Regis, that is, Kings Melcomb, divided from the other onely by the haven betweene. But the priviledges of the haven were awarded from them by sentence of the Parliament; howbeit afterwards recovered.

Weymouth.

These stood both sometimes proudly upon their owne severall priviledges, and were in emulation one of another: but now (God turne it to the good of both) many they are by Authoritie of Parliament incorporated into one body, conjoynd of late by a bridge, and growne very much greater, and goodlier in buildings by sea-adventures than heretofore.

From thence the shore stretcheth out directly along by the Isle of Purbeck (as they call it) which for a great part of it is an heath and Forrest like indeed replenished with Deere both red and fallow, having also veins of marble running scatteringly heere and there under the ground. In the midst whereof, there is an old large castle named Corfe seated upon a great stony hill, which after a long combat with time somewhat yielded as overcome, unto time, untill of late it hath bene repaired, and is a notable testimony and memoriall of a Stepmothers hatred. For, Alfrith to make way for her owne sonne Etheldred to the Crowne, when Edward her sonne in law King of England, came to visit her in this castle from his disport of hunting, set some villaines and hacksters to murder him, and like a most wicked Stepmother fed her eyes with his blood. For which deed repenting herselfe when it was too late, she sought afterward marvellously to wash out that sinfull stain, by taking her selfe to the mantle, and ring in the habite of an holy Votarie, and to building religious houses. This Purbeck is called an Isle, although it be onely a Demy Island, compassed round about with the sea, save onely on the West-side: For, on the East, the sea bendeth the banks inward, and breaking in at a very narrow straight betweene the two shores (against which a small Isle with a block house called Brensey standeth) maketh a broad and wide bay. On the North side wherof in the said Biland, there standeth over it the towne Poole, so as it is wholly environed with waters except it be on the North-side, where it closeth with the continent & hath one gate and no more leading unto it. We may well thinke it so named, because that bay aforesaid lying under it, in calme weather whē the waters be still resembleth a pond, such as we call a poole in our language. This of a Sedgeplot, & of a few fishermens cotages, in the last foregoing age, grew to be a mercate towne exceeding rich and wealthy, beautified also with goodly houses: and K. Henry the Sixth by consent of the Parliament granted unto it the priviledges of a port or haven towne which he had taken from Melcomb, and licensed the Major thereof, to wall it about: which worke afterward was begun at the haven, by King Richard the Third, a Prince who deserved to be ranked among the worst men and the best Kings. But ever since that time, by what fall destinie, I know not, or rather through the idleness and sloth of the townesmen, it is decayed: in so much as for want of Inhabitants, the very houses at this day, runne to ruine. Into the West Angle of this Bay falleth the greatest, and most famous river of all this tract, commonly called Frome, but the English-Saxons, as witnesseth Aerius, named it Frau; whereupon perhaps, for that this Bay was in old time called Fraumouth, the posteritie ensuing tooke the rivers name to be Frome. The head thereof is at Eureshot neere unto the West limit of this shire: From whence he taketh his course Eastward by Frompton, whereto it gave the name, and from the North receiveth a little river running downe by Cerne Abbey: which Augustine the Apostle of the English nation built, when hee had broken there in pieces, * Heil the Idol of the heathen English-Saxons, and chased away the fog of paganish superstition. Here was first bred among the religious men (as I have read) Iohn Morton Cardinall, and Archbishop of Canterbury borne at S. Andrews Milborne, worthily advanced to so high places for his good service in working Englands happinesse by the union of the two houses, of Lancaster, and York; and of this family there hath issued both R. Bishop of Worcester, and many gentlemen of very good note in this country, and elsewhere. Under this somewhat lower, the Frau or Frome (chuse whether you will) maketh an Island, and so goeth to see that most ancient towne [Dorchester] which in Antoninus his Itinerarium is termed DVERNORIA, that is, the river Passage or Ferry, and seemeth by Ptolomee to be named untruly, in sundry copies DVERNIVM and DVNIVM. This is the head Towne of the whole Shire, and yet is neither great nor beautifull, being long since depoyled of the walles by the Danes, who raised as it is thought certaine trenches; whereof one is called Mambury being an acre inditched, an other Poundbury somewhat greater: and the thirde mile off as a Camp, with five trenches containing some ten acres, called Maiden castle, which a man may easily conjecture to have bene a summer station or campe of the Romans. But of her antiquitie it sheweth daily expresse tokens, namely the Roman caufey of the Fosse high way, and coine of the Romans both copper and silver found there, and especially at Fordington hard by which the common people there call King Dorn his pence, whom by some allusion to the name, they dreame full sweetly, to have bene the founder of the towne. It had anciently a castle in that place where the Grey-friers built their Convent out of the ruines thereof, and hath now but three parish Churches, whereas the compasse of the old towne seemeth to have bene very large. But the most grievous hurt that it tooke, was when Suen the Dane had in most outrageous crueltie renewed the Danish warre: and Hush the Norman who ruled these countries a man of a perfidious and treacherous mind, suffered all to be spoiled and harried. But in what estate it stood soone after the Normans first coming in, take knowledge if it please you, out of Domesday booke being the Survey of England. In King Edwards daies there were in Dorchester 170. houses, and these for all the Kings service discharged themselves, and paid according to ten Hides: but to the use of Houscarles one marke of silver, excepting the customes which pertaine ad firmam nostris, that is, to the entertainment of the King for one night. There were in it two Mint Masters. Now there be therein but 82. houses: and one hundred have bene utterly destroyed since the time of Sheriffe Hugh. If these termes seeme to be very obscure (as Sextus Cecilius said in the like matter) impute it not to the fault of the writers, but to their ignorance who cannot conceive the meaning.

From hence Frome runneth by Woodford, where in old time Guy Briant a Baron and renowned warriour had a little Castle of his owne: which afterward was the habitation of Hugh Stafford of Suthwick; by one of whose daughters Inheritrices, it came as I have heard to Thomas Strangwaies, who being borne in Lancashire, and brought hither by the first Marquess Dorset, obtained a great and rich inheritance in these parts, and his issue built a very faire house at Milbery. Then holdeth hee on his course besides Byndon, in the Saxon tongue Beannon, which also had a monasterie, where Kinegilfus in the year 614. in a doubtfull, and dangerous battell vanquished the

These who were anciently named de Novo Burgo, and commonly Newboroughs, derive their pedigree from a younger soone of Henry the first Earle of Warwick of the Norman line: and held heere Winfrott, with the whole Hundred of the gift of King Henry the First, per servitium Camerarii (these be the words out of the booke of the Offices) in Capite de Domino Rege: that is, by service of Chamberlaine, in Chef, from our soveraigne Lord the King. But under Edward the Third I have read, that this was held by Sergeantie, namely, by holding the Laver or Ewre for the King his soveraigne Lord to wash, upon his Coronation day. Also Raulph Moien held the Mannour of Owres neere adjoining by service of Sergeantie in the Kitchin, of the gift likewise of King Henry the First: and R. de Welles the Mannour of Welles heereabout, since the Conquest of England, by the service of the Kings Baker. Which I note, onely by the way.

Where Frome maketh his issue into that Bay, whereupon Poole is situate, hard by the very mouth is planted Warham, in the Saxon tongue Weapeham, a towne strongly seated on every side but Westward, as being fenced on all parts beside, with the rivers Trent, Frome, and the Sea together: In King Edward the Confessors time, it had two Mint maisters: but whiles William the Conquerour reigned it could not reckon above seven dwelling houses in it. Yet afterwards it flourished againe, fortified with the wall, furnished with a mint house, a great number of Inhabitants, and a most strong Castle, which that King William the First built, it continued in a most flourishing state untill the daies of King Henry the Second, who when hee came to challenge the Crowne of England in the year 1142, hee arrived heere, besieged and tooke the Castle which was defended by Robert Lacy, against him in behalfe of King Stephen, and afterward Robert of Lincolne a man of mightie possessions in these parts defended the same against King Stephen. But from that time, by occasion partly of warres, and partly of suddene casualtie by fires, by reason also that the sea by little and little which draweth the commoditie of an haven, it is almost run to ruine: and in the very heart of the old towne it bringeth forth store of garlick. At this mouth likewise is discharged another small river with Frome, Aerius calleth it Trent, but now the Inhabitants thereby name it Piddle: From the North banke whereof scarce three miles off I saw the ruins of Middleton Abbey, which King Athelstane founded as a satisfaction to appease the ghost and soule of his brother Edwine, whom hee had deprived both of his Kingdome, and life. For when that solicitous desire of reigning had caused him quite to forget all Justice, hee put the young Prince heire apparent to the Crowne, with one page, into a little whirrey without any tackling or furniture thereto, to the end he might impute his wickednesse to the waves. And so the young Prince overcome with griefe of heart, and unable to master his owne passions, cast himselfe headlong into the sea. Under this Middleton, there is voided also another river, which runneth hard by Bere a little mercate towne, where for a long time, that ancient, and famous family de Turbida willa, commonly, Turbervill had their chief habitation, whereof as some were famous, so Hugh Turbervill in the time of King Edward the First was infamous for his traitorous practises with the French.

But to goe backe againe to the West part of the shire: At the spring head of Frome, where the soile is most fruitfull, the Forrest of Blackmore sometimes thicke, and full of trees, but now thinner growne, yeildeth plentiful game for hunting. This by a more common, and better knowne name is called The Forrest of white hart. The reason of which name, the Inhabitants by tradition from their forefathers report to be thus. When King Henry the Third came hither to hunt, and had taken other Deere, he spared a most beautifull and goodly White-Hart, which afterwards T. de la-Lynde a gentleman of this countrey with others in his company tooke and killed:

but how perillous a matter it was to bee twitching (as they say) of a lion they soone found and felt. For, the King conceived great indignation, and high displeasure against them, put them to a grievous fine of money for it, and the very lands which they held, pay even to this day every yeare by way of amercement a piece of money into the Exchequer, which is called White hart silver. There joyneth neere to this Forrest Shirburne towne, named also Shirburne Castle, in old time Seigneburn, which by interpretation is Fons Limpidus, or as it is else where written Fons clarus, that is, Pure fountaine or cleare well, scited on the hanging of an hill, a pleasant and proper seate, as William of Malmesburie saith, as well for the frequent number of Inhabitants, as the situation: and now it is the most populous, and best haunted towne of all this country, and gainerth exceeding much by clothing. In the yeare of our redemption 704, an Episcopall seat was heere erected, and Aldelme the first Bishop there consecrated: afterwards also in the raigne of Etheldred, Herman the Bishop of Sunning, having obtained this Bishoprick, translated his Episcopall see hither, and joynd the said Bishoprick of Sunning unto this, which under William Conqueror the same Bishop translated to Sarisbury, and reserved Shirburne to bee a retiring place for his Successors, unto whom it belongeth as yet: And one of them, namely, Roger, built a strong Castle in the East-part thereof, under which lay sometime a wide meere, and many fish pooles: and now being filled up are converted into most pleasant, and rich meadow ground. As for the Cathedrall Church, presently upon the translation of the See, it became a monasterie againe, and beareth shew of great antiquitie, although not many yeares past, in a broile betwene the townsmen and the Monks it was fired: which the burnt and scorched colour upon the stones doth as yet most evidently shew. Under this, the river Iuell, whereof I will speake some where else, winding in and out with many curving reaches, runneth Westward to Chifton, the seate sometime of the lineage of Maulbauch, from which it descended hereditarily unto the family of the Horfeies Knights, where it entrench into Sommerfetshire.

Chifton.

More toward the East the most famous river Stoure passing full of tenches and Eeles especially, arising in Wiltshire out of six fountaines commeth downe to Sturton, the honor and seat of the Barons of Sturton. So soone as it entered in this Shire it passeth through Gillingham Forrest, in which Edmund (urnamed Iron-side in a memorable battell put the Danes to flight: and three miles from thence saluteth Shafisbury standing upon an hill top, very defective of water, sometimes called by the Britains as it is commonly, but falsely thought, Caer Paladur, and in Latine by later writers Septonia: by the Saxons Sceapterbypys, perhaps of the Churches Spire steeple, such as they termed Scheafis. A little before the Normans time it had in it 104. houses, and three Mint masters, as we read in that * booke so often by me alleadged. And afterwards, it flourished the more, by reason of a Nunnerie which Elfgiva a most godly and devout Lady, wife to Edmund that was King Aelfrids nephews sonne had erected, and of ten parish Churches besides, or there about. But most famous in this place, by occasion of a pretie fable that our Historians doe report of Aquila prophesying here of the conversion or change of the Britaines Empire: For, some will have the bird, Aquila, that is, an Eagle, others a man so named to have foretold here, that the British Empire after the Saxons and Normans should returne againe to the ancient Britains: and these men affirme and maintaine that this place is of greater antiquitie than Sarurne himselfe, whereas most certaine it is, that it was first built by Alfred. For, the Historiographer of Malmesbury hath recorded, that in his daies there was an old stone translated from the ruines of the wall into the Chapter house of the Nuns, which had this Inscription:

The prophesie of Aquila.

ANNO

ANNO DOMINICÆ INCARNATIONIS ÆLFREDVS
REX FECIT HANC VRBEM. DCCC. LXXX. REGNI SVI VIII.

That is,
In the yeare of the incarnation of our Lord, King Aelfred built this Citie, 880.
of his raigne the eighth.

This Inscription I have the more willingly put down here for prooffe of the Truth, because in all the copies which I have seen it is wanting, save only in that in the Librarie of the late Lord Burghley, high Treasurer of England, and I have beene informed that it continued there untill the time of King Henry the Eighth. Yet the Inhabitants have a tradition that an old Citie stood upon the place which is called the Castle-Greene, and by some, Bolt-bury; now a faire plaine so scited that as of one side it joyneth to the Towne, so of another it is a strange sight to looke downe to the vale under it: whereby in the West end of the old Chappell of S. Iohn, as I heare now, standeth a Roman Inscription reversed. From thence the Stoure, by Marnhill, of which place L. Henry Howard brother of Thomas last Duke of Norfolk received of King James the title of Baron Howard, of Mernhill, before that he was created Earle of Northampton, makes speed to Stourminster, which is as much to say, as the Monasterie or Minster upon Stoure. A small towne this is, standing somewhat with the lowest: from which there is a stone bridge built reaching to Newton Castle; where offeth it selfe to be seene a lofty mount cast up (as they say) to that height with great labour, but of the Castle there remaineth nothing at all, but only the bare name. Of these, I have nothing of more antiquitie to say than this, that King Aelfred bequeathed Stourminster to a younger sonne of his. Hard by, at Silleston there rise two good great hills, the one named Hameldon, the other Hodde, and both of them fortified with a three fold Ditch and rampier. And not far from thence (but the very place I cannot precisely set downe) stood Okeford, the Capitall honour of the Baronie of Robert, the some of Pagan, commonly named Fitz-Payne, who married the daughter of Guido de Brient, who also in this West part enjoyed the honor of a Baron under King Edward the Third: but for default of heire males of those Fitz-Paynes, it came to the Poynings, Barons likewise in those daies, and at length by a daughter and heire of Poynings in the raigne of Henry the Sixth, these Barons titles, Fitz-Payne, Brient, and Poynings were conjoynd in the Percies Earles of Northumberland: Howbeit within our fathers remembrance through the favour of King Henry the Eighth, the title of Baron Poynings, reflowered in Sir Thomas Poynings, sonne of Sir Edward Poynings a martiall man and fruitfull father of much bafe brood; but with him it soone vanished away, as E. bastardly slips feldome take deepe root.

From hence Stoure passeth on by Brienton, that is, Brients towne, where the Regerses dwell, an ancient family of Knights degree, to Market Blandford, which since in our time it chanced to be burnt downe, arose againe, built more elegantly, and is better peopled with Inhabitants. Then Stoure from thence, by Tarrent, where Richard Poer Bishop of Sarisbury founded a Cell, for Virgins Votaries, speedeth himselfe apace to that most ancient towne VINDOGLADIA, where Antoginus maketh mention. Which in the Saxons tongue is called pynburnham, commonly Winburne, and of the Monasterie, Wenburnminster: and from hence to Dorchester are counted fixteene miles just so many as the Emperour Antonine in his Itinerarie reckoned betwene Vindogladia and Durnovaria. The name, as I conjecture, it taketh of the situation, because it is seated betwene two rivers: for, so in the British tongue Windugledy foundeth as much as betwene two Swords: now that the Britains, by a peculiar phrase of their owne, terme rivers, Swords, it appeareth by Aberduyledian, the British name of Milford Haven, which is as much to say, as the mouth of two rivers, for that two rivers named with them Glediau, that is, Swords, runne into it. The latter latter name also of this town seemeth to be fet from Rivers: For Winburn is compounded of Win, a parcell of the old name, and the Saxon word Burne, which among them betokeneth a river: and by the addition thereof the Saxons were wont to name places standing upon rivers. The very town it selfe is seated upon the piece of an hill large in compasse, & replenished with Inhabitants, but few faire buildings. In the Saxons time right famous it was and much frequented for no other cause, I believe, but for that those daies there remained divers tokens of the Romans majestie. In the yeare 713, Cuthburga sister to Ina King of the West-Saxons, when upon a loathing wearinesse of wedlocke she had sued out a Divorce from her owne husband King of Northumberland, built heere a Nunnerie: which yeilded unto the injurie of time, and fallen to decay, there arose in the very place thereof, a new Church with a faire Vault beneath under the quier, and an high spire besides the Toure-steeple. In which were placed Prebendaries in lieu of those Nuns. Over whom, in our fathers daies Reginald Pole was Deane, who afterwards being Cardinal, and Archbishop of Canteburie, over and above the nobilitie of his house (for descended he was of the Royall blood) became highly renowned for pietie, wisdom, and eloquence. King Esheldred a right good and vertuous Prince brother of Aelfred, slaine in the battell at Wittingham against the Danes, lieth entered in this Church: upon whose Tombe, which not long since hath bene repaired, this new Inscription is to be read:

IN HOC LOCO QUIESCIT CORPVSS. ETHELDREDI
REGIS WESTSAXONVM MARTYRIS, QVI ANNO DOMINI DCCC LXXII. XXII. APRILIS PER MANVS DANORVM PAGANORVM OCCVBIT.

That is,
Heere lieth at rest the bodie of Esheldred King of the West-Saxons, Martyr, who died in the yeare of our Lord, 872. the 23. of April, by the hands of the Danes, * Infidels.

* Or Painsims: Paganorum.

Near unto whom lieth entombed Gertrude Blunt Marchionesse of Excester, daughter to William Lord Montjoy, and mother to Edward Courtney the last Earle of Devonshire of that house: and on the other side of the quier Iohn de Beaufort Duke of Somerset with his wife Margaret daughter and heire to Sir Iohn Beauchamp of Blanchhoe: whose daughter Margaret Countesse of Richmond, and mother of King Henry the Seventh, a most godly and vertuous Prince, erected a Schoole heere for the training up of youth. But now will I turne my pen from the Church to the Towne; when the Danes by their crafty devices went about to set the Englishmen together by the cares, and would have broken that league, and unitie which was betweene King Ethelward the Elder, and his cosen Aethelwald; Aethelwald then lusting after the Kingdome and wholly set against his liege Prince, fortified this towne as strongly as possibly he could: But so soone as Edward came towards him with his forces, and pitched his tents at Basdan-bipig, now called Badbury, he fled and conveyed himselfe to his confederates the Danes. This Badbury is a little hill upon a faire dune, scarce two miles off, environed about with a triple trench, and rampier, and had by report in times past a Castle, which was the seate of the West-Saxon Kings: But now, if ever there were any such, it lieth so buried in the owne ruines, and rubbish, that I could see not so much as one token thereof. But, hard by, a sight I had of a village or mannour called Kingston Lacy, because together with Winburne it appertained to the Lacies Earles of Lincolne: unto whom by covenant it came from the Earles of Leicester, by the means of Quencie Earle of Winchester. For King Henry the first had given it to Robert Earle of Mellent and of Leicester: and at the last, both places, from the Lacies fell unto the house of Lancaster, whose bountie, and liberalitie Winburne had good triall of.

From this Winburne Stoure as it passeth, admitteth Alen a little brook, over which standeth

Badbury.

Kingston Lacy.

standeth S. Giles Winburne, the habitation of the worshipfull and ancient house of Astleys Knights, also Wickhampton, the inheritance sometime of the Barons de Maltravers: of whom the last, in the raigne of Edward the Third, left behind him two daughters onely, the one wedded unto Iohn de Arundell, grandfather to Iohn Earle of Arundell, who left unto his posteritie the title of Barons de Maltravers: the other, wife of Robert Le-Rose, and afterwards of Sir Iohn Keines, Knight. From hence the Stoure passeth on by Canford, under which not long ago, James Lord Montjoy, studious in Minerall matters began to make Calcanthum or Vitriol (we call it Copras) and to boile Alome: And out of which, in old time Iohn Earle of Warren, to the great disteining of his owne good name, and the damage of England, tooke, as it were, by strong hand and carried away, as it is to be seene in our Chronicles, Dame Alice Lacey, the wife of Thomas Earle of Lancaster. And now by this time Stoure leaveth Dorsetshire behind him, and after hee hath travelled through some part of *Hants*shire, at length taketh up his lodging in the Ocean: and yet not before hee hath entertained a pretty river that runneth to Cranburne, a place well watered. Where in the yeare of Salvation 930. Aethward a noble Gentleman, furnished for his whitenesse Meau, founded a little monasterie: which, Robert Fitz-Haimon a Norman, unto whom fell the possessions of the said Aethward, leaving heere one or two Monkes in a cell, translated to Theoksbury: From whom in order of succession, by the Clares Earles of Glocester, and Burghs Earles of Ulster, it came to Lionell Duke of Clarence, and by him to the Crowne. But now Cranborne hath his Vicount, now Earle of Salisbury whom King James for his approved wisdom and worth, honored first with the title of Baron or Lord Cecil of Essendon, and the next yeare after, of Vicount Cranborne. South from hence lieth Woodland emparked, sometime the seat of the worshipfull family of Filioll, the heires whereof were married to Edward Seimor after Duke of Somerset, and Willoughby of Wallaton.

Earles and Marquesses of Dorset. The life of Osmund, manuscript.

See the Dukes of Somerset.

* In Normandie.

As touching the Earles and Marquesses of this shire, King William the Conqueror, having now by conquest attained to the Kingdome of England, made Osmund that was Earle of Seez in Normandie, both Bishop of Salisbury, and afterward also the first Earle of Dorset, and his Chancellor; highly admiring the godly wisdom of the man, and his notable good parts. Long after that, King Richard the Second in the one and twentieth yeare of his raigne, advanced Iohn de Beaufort, Iohn of Gaunt his sonne and Earle of Somerset, to be Marquess of Dorset, of which dignitie King Henry the Fourth in hatred of Richard the Second deprived him. And when as in the high Court of Parliament, the Commons of England there assembled, who loved him very dearly, made earnest intercession that the said dignitie of Marquess might bee restored unto him, hee himselfe distasting this new title, and never heard of before those daies, utterly refused it. And then his younger brother named Thomas Beaufort was created Earle of Dorset: who after ward for his warlike prowesse and valour was by King Henry the Fifth adorned with the title of Duke of Excester, and with the Earledome of * Harcourt. For, he valiantly defended Harflew in Normandie against the Frenchmen, and in a pitched field encountering the Earle of Armignac put him to flight. After he was dead without issue, King Henry the Sixth nominated out of the same house of Lancaster, Edmund, first Earle, afterwards Marquess of Dorset, and lastly Duke of Somerset: whose sonnes being slaine in the civil wars, Edward the Fourth, when as now the family of Lancaster lay as it were, over troden in the dust, created Thomas Grey out of the house of Ruthin, who was his sonne in law (for the King had espoused the mother of the said Grey) Marquess of Dorset: when in right of his wife he had entred upon a great state, and inheritance of the Bonvilles in this country, and the territories adjoining. After him, succeeded in the same honour Thomas his sonne, and Henrie his nephew, by the said Thomas, who also was created by King Edward the Sixth Duke of Suffolk, having wedded Lady Frances daughter of Charles Brandon Duke of Suffolk, and Neece unto King Henry the Eighth by his sister. ambitious hopes, both in himselfe and in others. From that time the title of Dorset was bestowed upon none, untill King James at his first entrance into this Kingdom exalted Thomas Sackvill; Baron of Buckhurst, and Lord high Treasurer of England, a man of rare wisdom, and most carefull providence, to the honour of Earle of Dorset, who ended his life with suddaine death 1608. and left Robert his sonne his successor who deceasing within the yeare, left the said honour againe to Richard his hopefull sonne whom he begot of the Lady

BELGÆ.

BELGÆ.

B Pon the North and East side of the Durotriges, bordered in times past the Belgæ, who as it is by the name probable, and by authority of writers very likely, passed over from the Belgæ, a people in Gaule, into Britaine. For, those Belgæ having their beginning (as Cæsar according to the information he had from the men of Rhemes) of the Germans, and in old time being brought over the Rhene, finding the sweetnesse and fertility of the place, expelled the Gaules and planted themselves there: From whence, as the same Cæsar saith, they gat them over into Britaine for to spoile, and in warlike manner to invade the country: and were all of them called after the name of those countreyes from whence they came: where, after they had made warre they remained and began to till the grounds. But at what time they came hither to dwell, it is not certainly known, unlesse Divitiacus King of the Sueffones, who flourished before Cæsars time, brought over the Belgæ hither: For, a great part as well of Gaule as of Britaine he had under him. Whence also they were named Belgæ, it is not sufficiently shewed. Hubert Thomas of Liege, a great learned man, supposed Belgæ to be a German word for that the Germans use to call the French and the Italians Wallen, as strangers, yea and some of them Welgen. Iohn Goropius himself a Belgian, maintaineth it to be derived of the word Belke, which in the Belgicke tongue signifieth wrath or anger, as if they would be sooner incensed with choler than others. But seeing that the name of the Belgæ, seemeth not to be sought for out of that tongue which the Germans of the Low-countries use at this day, and is almost the same that our English-Saxon language (for from the Saxons it came, whom Charles the Great brought over into Brabant and Flanders) for my part I will in no wise diminish their credit, who fetch it forth of the ancient Gaules tongue, which remayneth in manner uncorrupt among our Welch-Britans, and will have them called Belgæ of Pell, which in that tongue betokeneth Remote or far off. For, of all Gaule they were the furthest, and as they were furthest from the civill behaviour and humanity of the Roman Province, so they were also in situation and seat: and the Poet hath shewed that the Morini were the people of all Belgica most remote, when he wrote thus: Extremiq; hominum Morini, that is, The morini of all men furthest. But come we now to our Belgæ, who inhabited far and wide in Somersetshire, Wiltshire, and the inner parts of Hantsire.

SOMER-

SOMERSETSHIRE.

He Countie of Somerset, commonly called, Somersetshire, is a verie large and wealthy Region: the North side whereof the Severne Sea beateth upon: the West part confineth with Den- shire: in the South it bordereth first upon Devonshire, and then upon Dorsetshire: Eastward, upon Wiltshire: and North-east, upon part of Gloucestershire. The Soile verie rich, yeelding for the most part thereof passing great plentie, both of pasture and corne, and yet not without stonie hilles: Exceeding populous, and full of Inhabitants furnished also with commodious havens, and ports sufficiently. Some thinke it was so called, for that the * aire there, is so mild and summer-like: and in that sence the Welch Britans at this day terme it Gladerhaf, borrowing that name out of our English tongue. And verily, howsoever in summer time it is a right summer-like Country, yet surely, in winter it may worthily be called, a winterish Region, so wet, and weely, so miry and moorish it is, to the exceeding great trouble and encombrance of those that travell in it. But I will beleve, that this name without all question grew from Somerton, a famous Towne in ancient time, and of all others in the shire most frequented, considering that Asserius a writer of great antiquitie, calleth this Countie in every place, Somertunensis, that is Somertunshire. In the very first limit of the shire Westward, where Exrith in a solitarie and hilly moore, first appeareth Dulverton, a filly marker, according to the soile, and neere unto it was a small religious house of Black-chacons at Barelinch, who in latter times acknowledged the Fetyplaces their founders.

Martyrs.

Higher upward on the Severne side, where this shire confineth upon Devonshire, first we meet with Porlock, (in the English-Saxon tongue Portloean, and Waschet) in times past Wecepoort, roades both, and harbours for ships, the which in the yeere 886. were most grievously afflicted by the Danish cruell piracies. Betwixt them standeth Dunster Castle upon a flat and low ground, enclosed round about with hilles, fa- ving to the Sea-ward; built by the Moions, or Mohuns. From whose heires by agree- ments and compositions it came in the end to the Lutterels. A right noble and migh- tie house this of the Mohuns was for a long time, and flourished from the verie Con- querours daies, (under whose raigne that Castle was built,) unto the time of King Richard the Second. Two Earles there were of this Countie out of that familie, as I shall shew hereafter, William and Reginald, who in the Barons warre lost that honor. The Posteritie afterwards were repured Barons: of whom the last named Iohn, left three daughters, Philip wife to Edward Duke of Yorke; Elizabeth, wedded to Wil- liam Montacute, Earle of Sarisburie, the second of that name; and Maud, Joyned in marriage to the Lord Strange of Knokin: The Mother of which three Ladies, as the report goes, obtained of her husband so much pasture-ground in Common by the Towne side for the benefit of the Inhabitants, as she could goe about in one day bare- foot.

Neere to this Castle, there lie two little Villages consecrate unto two peculiar Saints of those places: the one of them is named Caranton, of Carantoc the Britan: the other, Saint Decombs of Decuman; who putting to sea out of South-wales arri- ved here, in a waste and Desert Wildernesse, as we read, in an old * Agonell, overgrown with shrubs, bushes, and briars, among woods of great thicknesse, reaching out farre in length and breadth, lying out with high and steepe hilles one way, and wonderfully w- even with as deepe and hollow vallyes another way, where he bidding worldly vanity fare- well, was by a murderer stabbed to death, and of the people honoured as a Saint. And betwene these Clives, was an old Abbey of white Monkes, founded by William de Romara, Cosen to the Earle of Lincoln. Somewhat farther from the sea is seated Stoke-Cury, a Barony so named of the Lords thereof, the dwelling place of William De Cury, Sewer to King Henric the First. Out of which Familie, Iohn Cury (as some write) issued, that conquered Vlster in Ireland, whom nature framed for magnanimitie, gravitie, and all other vertues, a great person and a noble: the record and testimonie of whose approved valour, is to bee fetched out of the ancient Annals of Ireland. From thence the shore by little and little beareth out to Stertpoint, where the two greatest Rivers of all this Shire, meeting in confluence together, at one mouth runne forth into the Severne sea. Ptolomee calleth this confluence Uzella Æstuarium, of the river Ivel, which now hath lost his name alreadie before he came hither. It springeth in Dorsetshire, and no sooner entreth into Somersetshire, but he giveth name to Evel a great market towne, which rose by the decay of Ilchester, and taketh into him a rill, neere which is Camalet a steepe hill, and hard to get up: on the top whereof are to bee seene expresse tokens of a decayed Castle, with triple rampires of earth cast up, enclosing within it many acres of ground; and there appeare about the hill five or six ditches, so steepe, that a man shall sooner slide downe, than goe downe. The Inhabitants name it, King Arthurs Palace: That it was the Romans worke, appeareth by peeces of money of their coine daily digged out there. But what name it had among them, I know not, unlesse it be the same which in Ninnius his Catalogue of ancient Cities, is called Caer Camelion, in stead of Camelion, by transposition of the letters. Hereby are two townes, West Camalet, and East Camalet, or Queens Camalet, happily for that it hath been in dowrie to some Queene. As for Cadburie a little towne next unto it, we may guesse verie probably to have been that Cathbregion, where K. Arthur, (as Ninnius writeth) defeated the English-Saxons in a memorable battell. The other of that name, called, North, Cadbury, K. Henry the Third, gave unto Nicolas de Moeles, who had married * Hawisia, one of the heires of Iames of Newmarket, whose posteritie continued a long time in great fame and honour, untill that Iohn dying in the time of Edward the Third, left two daughters, Muriel and Isabel; the one wife to William Botereaux, and the former to Thomas Courtney. Here to digresse aside from the River Ivel, Wincaunton, no meane market, is neighbour to this North Cadbury, and neere thereunto is Pen, an obscure village now, but anciently famous, being ordained by destinie as it may seeme to the overthrow both of Britans and Danes. For at this verie place Kenwalch a West Saxon, had such a day of the Britans, that they would scarcely ever after abide to come into the field against the English-Saxons. And many a yeere after that, King Edmund surnamed Iron-side, gave there a notable foile to the Danes, as he pursued Canutus their King, then usurping the Crowne of England from place to place. The house of Lorty, called in Latine Records, de Vrtiaco, was great hereabout, possessing Stoke Triske, Cocklington, and other Mannours, and Henric Lorty of this house, was summoned a Baron to the Parliament, in the time of King Edward the First.

Now to returne: the river Ivel from hence runneth to Ischalys, mentioned by Ptolomee, now Iwelcester: named in the Catalogue of Ninnius (if I be not deceived) Pontavel Coit, for Pont-Ivel Coit, that is, Ivel bridge in the wood: by Florentius of Worcester, Givelcester: at this day of small account, but onely for the antiquitie, and the market there kept: for peeces of the Roman Cæsars, or Emperours money, of gold,* brasse, and silver, are other whiles here digged up. That in old time it had been a great towne, and on some sides strengthened with a double wall, the ruines declare, and two towers upon the Bridge. About the time of the Normans comming in, well peopled it was, and much frequented: For, reckoned there were in it one hundred and seven Burgeses. A sure place also in those daies, and well fortified: for in the yeere of Grace 1088, when the Nobles of England had conspired, & plotted against King William Rufus, to put him downe,* and set up his brother Robert Duke of Normandie in his Roiall throne, Robert Mowbray a warlike man, having burnt Bath, forcibly assaulted this towne, but with lost labour; yet, what hee could not doe then, long proceffe of time hath now partly effected, and in some sort over-mastred it.

A little beneath, by Langport a proper market town, the Rivers Iwel and Pedred running together, make between them an Iland, called Meehelney, that is to say, The great Iland, wherein are to be seen the defaced walles and ruines of an old Abbey, built by King Athelstane, as writers report. This Pedred, commonly named Rare, hath his beginning in the verie edge or skirt of the shire southward, and holding on a crooked and winding course thorow Crockborne, in the Saxon tongue, Croceborne, and Pedderton, to whom it gave the name, sometime Pedridan, the Roiall seat of King Ina, (which towne now adayes is of none account, unlesse it be for the market, and faire there held; which Henric Daubeney obtained of King Henric the Sixth) at this place runneth into Iwel, and robbeth him of his name, when hee is come downe three miles Eastward, and hath bidden farewell to Montacute. Formed by the Earle of Moriton, brother by the Mothers side to King William the Conquerour, (who built a Castle upon the verie hill top, and at the foot thereof a Priorie) because the said hill riseth up by little and little to a sharpe point: for, before time it was called Logoresburgh, and Biscopeston. As for the Castle, it came to nothing many yeeres since: the stones thereof being had away to the repairing of the Monasterie and other houses. Upon the pitch of the said hill, there was a Cha-pell afterwards fer, and dedicated unto Saint Michael, built with arch-woke, and an embowed rooffe overhead all of stone, right artificially: to which for halfe a mile wel nere, men ascended upon stone-staires, which in their ascent fetched a compasse round about the hill. But now that the Priorie and chapell both be pulled down, the faire and goodly house, which Sir Edward Philips Knight, and the Kings Sargeant at Law built lately at the hill foote, maketh a very beautifull shew. This high place Montacute hath given surname to that right honourable family of Montacute, which had their beginning of Dru the younger. Out of which there were foure Earles of Sarisburie: the last of them left one daughter onely, Alice, who by Richard Nevil, pare Richard that renowned Earle of Warwick, who kept such stirres, and made all England to shake, also Iohn Nevil Marquesse Montacute, who were both slain at Barnet field, in the yeere 1472. Afterward King Henric the Eighth conferred the title of Lord Montacute, upon Henric Poole, sonne of Margaret, daughter to George Duke of Clarence, that came of the daughter of that Richard Nevill aforesaid, Earle of Warwicke: and when hee had so done, straightwaies made him shorter by the head: afterwards Queene Marie advanced Anthonie Browne, whose Grandmother was a daughter of Iohn Nevill Marquesse Montacute, to the title and honour of Vi-count Montacute, which his Grandchild Anthonie who succeeded him now honourably enjoyeth.

And here I must not forget neither, Preston, sometime the seat of Iohn Sturton younger sonne to the first Lord Sturton, one of whose heires was married to Siden- ham of Brimston thereby; neither Odcombe adjoyning thereto, as small a towne as it is, seeing it had a Baron of the owne, William de Briewer (for so was his father named, in the Norman-French, because he was borne in an * heath) who being taken up in the new Forrest, by King Henric the Second in a hunting journey, proved a great man, and gracious in the Court (as whom King Richard the First highly favored as his minion, and all the world embraced and loved) grew unto a verie wealthy estate, married Beatrix of Vannes, widow to Reginald Earle of Cornwall, and his daughters, for that his sonne died without issue, by their marriages brought great possessions to their husbands Breos Wake, La-fert, and Piercy. Under this towne hard by, lieth Stoke under Hamden, where the Gornaies had their Castle, and built a Col-ledge. This familie of Gornaico, commonly named Gornay, was verie ancient, and of good account, descended from the same stocke, out of which the Warrens Earles of Surrie, and the Mortimers are sprung: but in the fore-going age it failed, and some of their lands defended by the Hamptons, to the house of the Newtons Knights, who willingly acknowledge themselves to bee come out of Wales; and not long since to have beene named Caradocks. Neither must I passe over in silence, how Matthew Gournay, a most famous warriour in the rainge of Edward the Third, was

A was buried heere; who in the fourescore and sixteenth yeere of his age, ended this life when (as appeareth by his Epitaph) he had fought at the siege of Algizer, against the Saracens, in the battels of Benamazin, Scluse, Crestie, Ingenos, Poitiers, and Nazars in Spain. Then * Pedred watereth Marstocke, a litle market Towne, which in times past William of Boloigne King Stephens sonne gave unto Faramuse of Boloigne, whose sole heire Sibyll, was wedded to Ingeltraine Fienes, from whom descended the Fienes, Bar- ons of Dacre, and Lords Say and Sels.

Parret from hence thorow the mire and moorish plaine countrey, holding his course Northward, passed by Langport a market Towne well frequented, and Aulre, B a Village consisting of a few poore Cottages, which seemeth to have beene a Towne of good account: for, when King Elfred had given the Danes such an overthrow in battell, and by strait siege compelled them to yeeld, so farre forth, that they tooke an oath immediately to depart out of his dominions, and Godrus their King promised to become Christian, (as writeth Afferius) at this very place he with great pompe was Godfather to the said Godrus at the sacred Font.

Beneath this place from the West, Parret receiveth into it the river Thone, which springing farre of in the West part of this Countrey, very neere unto Devon- shire, runneth thorow most rich and pleasant fields, passing downe neere Wivelscomb, assigned anciently to the Bishops of Bathe, and by Wellington, which in the time of C King Edward the elder was a land of six * Manentes, what time hee granted it together with Lediard, that had twelve Manentes, Hides, unto the Bishop of Shirburne.
Now, a prettie market Towne it is, and graced most by the habitation there of Sir Iohn Popham (For, vertuous men, and such as have so well deserved of their countrey, are not to be passed in silence) a man of an ancient worshipfull house, and withall a most upright Iusticer, and of singular industry, who being Lord chiefe Iustice of the Kings Bench, administred his office toward malefactours with such holefome and available severity, that England hath beene beholden unto him a long time for a great part of her private peace, and home-securitie.

Forthence with a soft streame, and gentle fall, Thone runneth by Thanton, D commonly Taunton, and giveth it his name. A very fine and proper Towne this is indeed, and most pleasantly seated: in a word, one of the eyes of this shire: where Ina King of the West Saxons, built a Castle, which Desburgia his wife raced, and laid even with the ground after shee had expelled from thence Eadbritch, King of the South-Saxons, who now had made himselfe Lord thereof, and used it as a bridle to keepe the countrey under, that he had subdued. When Edward the Confessour was King, it paid tribute (as wee find in the Kings Survey-Booke of England) after the rate of fiftie and foure Hides: and had in it threescore and three Burgers: The Bi- shop of Winchester held it as Lord, and his courts or Pleas were kept heere thrice in the yeere.

E And these Customes appertaine to Taunton, Burgheriffs, Theeves, * Breach of peace, han- nifare, pence of the Hundred, and pence of Saint Peter de Circeto, thrice in the yeere to hold the Bishops Pleas without warning, to goe forth to warfare with the Bishops men. The Country heere, most delectable on every side with greene meadows; flourishing with pleasant Gardens and Orchards, and replenished with faire Mannour houses; wonderfully contenteth the eyes of the beholders. And among these houses; those of greatest note are these: Orchard, which had in times past Lords of that name, from whom in right of Inheritance it descended unto the Portmans, men of Knights degree: Hach Beauchamp, and Cory Mallet, bearing those additions of their Lords. For, this was the seat of the Mallets, that came of the Norman race, and from them in short time, it fell by the female heire to the Pointzes. From among F whom in the rainge of Edward the First, Hugh was ranged in the rank of Parliament Barons, and out of that familie some remaine at this day of great reputation, and Knights in their Countrey. As for those Beauchamps, or de Bello Campo, they flourished in high places of honour, from the time of King Henric the Second: but especially since, that Cecilie * de Fortibus, which derived her pedigree from the Earles de Ferrarjs, and that great Marshall of England William Earle of Pembroke, matched in marriage with this familie. But in the raigne of Edward the Third, the whole inheritance, was by the sisters divided betwene Roger de S. Mauro, or Seimor, J. Maria, men of ancient descent, and great alliance. And hereupon it was, that King Henrie the Eight, when he had wedded Iane Seimor, mother to King Edward the Sixth, bestowed upon Edward Seimor her brother, the titles of Vicount Beauchamp, and Earle of Hertford, whom King Edward the Sixth afterwards honoured, first with the name of Lord and Baron Seimor to bee annexed to his other titles, left (as the King saith in the Patent) the name of his mothers familie should bee overshadowed with any other stile, and yet afterward created him Duke of Sommerfet.

As you goe from thence, where Thone windeth himselfe into Parret, it maketh a pretty lland betwene two rivers called in times past Aethelinge, that is, The Isle of Nobles, now commonly known by the name of Athelney: a place no lesse famous among us for King Alfreds throwding himselfe therein, what time as the Danes now had brought all into broile, then those Marishes of Minturny among the Italians, wherein Marius lurked, and lay hidden. For, touching that King an ancient Poet, wrote thus:

— Mixta dolori
*Gaudia semper erant, spes semper mixta timori.
Si modo victor erat, ad crastina bella pavebat,
Si modo victus erat, ad crastina bella parabat.
Cui vestes sudore jugi, cui sica crure
Tincta jugi, quantum sit onus regnare probant.*

With dolour great his joyes were mixt, his hope was joyn'd with dread,
If now he victour were, next day of warres he stood affraid:
If vanquish now, the morrow next forthwith hee thought it good
For to prepare for warre: his sword was aye begoird in blood.
His garments eke with painfull sweat, were evermore bestain'd.
Which well did shew what burden great he bare while that he raign'd.

And in truth, this Isle afforded him a very fit shrowding corner: for that by reason of waters partly standing there in plasches, and partly resorting reflowing thither, which Asferius termed Gronnas, Latinizing a Saxon word) there is in manner necessary into it. It had sometime a bridge betwene two castles, built by Aelfred, and a very large grove of Alders, full of goates and wild beasts: but of firme ground scarce two acres in breadth: on which, as saith William of Malmesbury (whose words these are and not mine) hee founded a little Monasterie: the whole frame whereof, hanged upon foure maine posts pitched fast in the ground, with foure round isles of Spherick work contrived and brought round about the same. Not far from this Isle Parret having received the said river runneth alone swelling with certaine sandy shelles sometime in his channell, by the Hundred of N. Pederton anciently acknowledging the Blunts to have bene Lords thereof, who are thought to have brought that name from Bluet in litle Britaine: Heere it taketh into him an other river from East to beare him company which openeth it selfe neere Castle Cary which William Lovell Lord thereof held against K. Stephen in the behalfe of Mawd the Empresse right inheritor of the Crown of England, whose issue male failing in the time of King Edward the Third, by heire female it came to Nicholas de S. Mauro a Baron (of a distinct familie from that which was a few lines before mentioned) and shortly after about the time of Henrie the Fifth by an heire female againe to the Lord Zouches of Harringworth: as a moitie of the lands of Lord Zouch of Ashby de la Zouch came before by coheires to the house of this S. Mauro. But when the Lord Zouch was attainted by K. Henrie the Seventh for assisting King Richard the Third, this Castle was given by the K. to Robert Willoughby Lord Brooke as his lands at Bridge-water to the Lord Daubeney and then hee was restored in blood. From Castle Cary this water passeth by Lites-Cary to bee remembered in respect of the late owner Thomas Lyte a gentleman studious of all good knowledge, and so to Somer-ton, the Shire towne in times past, as which gave the name thereto. A Castle it had of the West Saxon Kings, which Ethelbald King of Mercia forcing a breach through

A the wals sieged and kept: But now time hath gotten the mastery of it so, as that there is no apparance at all thereof: and the very Towne it selfe would have much a doe to keepe that name, were it not for a Faire of oxen and other beasts which is kept, there from Palme-Sunday untill the midst of June, with much resort of people; for that the countymen all there about are very great Graiers, breeders, and feeders of cattell.

No sooner hath Parret entertained this river, but he speeds him apace toward, a great and populous towne, commonly called Bridge-water: and is thought to have taken that name of the Bridge and water there: but the old records and evidences gaine say this opinion: wherein it is alwayes called in plaine words Burg-water, that is, Walters burgh or Burgh-walter: and (as we may very probably conjecture) of that Walter de Duaco, or Doway who served under William Conqueror in his wars, and received at his hands many faire mannors in this shire. Neither carrieth it any other name in that grant or donation, whereby Fulke Paynes Lord of Bampton passed the possession of the place over unto William Briwer, to curry favour with him, being so great a man and so gracious a favourite with King Richard the First: This Williams sonne and bearing his name, bettered this haven, having obtained licence of King John to fortifie a Castle, built heere a Fortresse: which now time hath wrought her will of: and began a bridge which one Strivet a gentleman of Cornwall with infinite cost finished: founded also the Hospitall of S. John heere, and Dunkeswell Abbey.
C But when this William Briwer the younger left this life without issue, in the partition of his heritage it fell to Margaret his sister, in right of whose daughter that she had by William De la fort, it came to the house of Cadurci or Chaworths, and from it hereditarily to the Dukes of Lancaster, as some lands heereabout by an other sister came to Breos, and so by Cantalupe to Lord Zouch. But the greatest honor that this place had, was by the title of an Earldome, that King Henrie the Eight adorned it withall, what time as he created Henrie Daubeney, Earle of Bridge-water, whose sister Cecilie, was married unto John Bourchier the first Earle of Bath out of that house.

Earles of Bridge-water.

Beneath this, some few miles off, Parret voideth it selfe into the Severne sea at a wide mouth, which, as we said, Ptolomee called Vzella astuarium: and some even at this day, Evelmouth: but the old English-Saxons Peopsean muð, at which place, as Marianus mine author writeth, Salisan Bishop of Shirburne about the yeere of Salvation 845. discomfited the Danish forces as they were stragling abroad. At the same mouth where we saw Honifpell an ancient Mannour of the Coganes, men of great fame in the conquest of Ireland, there meeteth it another river called of some Brius which ariseth out of that great and wide wood in the East-side of this shire, which the Britans named Cort Maur, the Saxons Selwood, that is, (by Asferius interpretation) The great wood, but now not so great. This river first visiteth Bruiton, to which he leaveth his name: (a place memorable, for that the Mobuns there entombed, who built a religious house of the Fitz-lames, runneth a long way by small villages and encreased with some other brooks, it watereth goodly grounds, untill it meete with softer soile then and there, it maketh certaine marshes and meres, and when the waters rise, environeth a large plot of ground, as an Isle, so called of old time in the British tongue, the Isle of Avalon, of Appulis: afterwards, named Inis Witrin, that is, The Glassy Isle, like as in the Saxon Idiom, the same sense Glar-ton-ey, and in Latin Glasconia. Of which, a Poet of good antiquity writeth thus.

*Insula pomorum quæ fortunata vocatur,

Non opus est illi sulcantibus arva colonis,

In this Isle under a great hill rising in great height with a tower thereon, which they call the Tor, flourished the famous Abbay of Glastenbury, the beginning whereof is very ancient, fetched even from that Ioseph of Arimathæa, who entered the bodie of Iesus Christ; and whom Philip the Apostle of the Gauls sent into Britaine for to preach Christ. For, thus much both the most ancient records and monuments of this Monasterie testifie, and also Patrick the Irish Apostle (who lived there a Monke thirtie yeeres) in an Epistle of his hath left to memorie. Whereupon this place was by our Ancestors named, The first land of God, The first land of Saints in England, The beginning and fountaine of all religion in England, The tombe of Saints, The mother of Saints, The Church founded and built by the Lords Disciples. Neither is there any cause why we should much doubt thereof, sithence I have shewed before, that the beames of Christian religion in the very infancy of the primitive Church were spread and thined upon this Iland, yea and Freculphus Lexoviensis hath written, that the said Philip conducted barbarous nations, neere unto darknesse and bordering jurg upon the Ocean, to the light of knowledge and port of faith. But to our Monasterie, and that out of Malmesburie his booke touching this matter. When that old Cell or little chappell which Ioseph had built by continuance of time was in the end decayed, Devi Bishop of Saint Davids erected a new one in the same place, which also in time falling to ruine, twelve men coming out of the North part of Britaine repaired it, and lastly King Ina (who founded a schoole in Rome for the training up and instruction of English youth, & to the maintenance thereof, as also for almes to be distributed at Rome, had laid an imposition of Peter-pence upon every house thorowout his realme) having demolished it, built there a very faire and stately Church, to Christ, Peter, and Paul: and under the very highest coping thereof round about caused to be written these verses:

*Syderi montes, speciosa cacumina Sion,
A Libano gemina flore comante, cedri;
Celorum porta lati duo lumina mundi.
Ore tonat Paulus, fulgurat arce Petrus:
Inter Apostolicas radiant luce coronas,
Doctior hic monitis, celsior ille gradu,
Corda per hunc hominum referantur, & astra per illum:
Quis docet iste stylo, suscipit ille polo.
Pandit iter cæli hic dogmate, clavibus alter,
Est via cui Paulus, janua fida Petrus.
Hic Petra firma manens, ille Architectus habetur, Surgit in huius templum quo placet ara Deo.
Anglia plaude lubens, mittit tibi Roma salutem, Fulgor Apostolicus Glasconiam irradiat.
A facie hostili duo propugnacula surgunt,
Quod fidei turres urbs caput orbis habet.
Hæc pius egregio Rex Ina refertus amore,
Dona suo populo non moritura dedit.
Totus in affectu divæ pietatis inhaerens,
Ecclesieque iuges amplificavit opes.
Melchisedech master meritò Rex, atq; Sacerdos, Complexit veræ religionis opus,
Publica jura regens, & celsa palatia servans,
Unica Pontificum gloria, norma fuit.
Hinc abiens, illinc meritorum fulget honore, Hic quoque gestorum laude perennis erit.*

These verses with some little change are found in booke of *Pe-ems: in the praise partly of partly of Nants.

Two mountaines high that reach the stars, two tops of Sion Faire,
From Libanon two cedar trees their flouring heads doe beare.
Two royall gates of highest heaven, two lights that men admire,
Paul thundreth with his voice aloft, Peter he flasheth fire.
Of all the Apostles crowned crew, whose raies right glittering bee,
Paul for deepe learning doth excell, Peter for high degree.
The one doth open the hearts of men, the other heaven doore,
For Peter lets those into heaven, whom Paul had taught before.
As one by meanes of doctrine shewes the way how heaven to win,
By vertue so of th' others Keys, men quickly enter in.
Paul is a plaine and ready way for men to heaven hie,
And Peter is as sure a gate, for them to passe thereby.
This is a rocke remaining firme: a Master builder hee:
Twixt these a Church and altar both, to please God, built we see.
Rejoice ò England willingly; For, Rome doth greet thee well,
The glorious Apostles light in Glaston now doe dwell.
Two bulwarks strong afront the Foe are rais'd; These towres of faith
In that this Citie holds, the head even of the world it hath.
These monuments King Ina gave of perfect meere good will Unto his subjects; whose good deeds remaine and shall doe still.
He with his whole affection in godlinesse did live,
And holy Church to amplifie great riches also give.
Well might he our Melchisedech, a Priest and King, be thought,
For he the true religious worke to full perfection brought.
The lawes in common weale he kept, and state in Court beside,
The onely Prince that prelates grac'd, and them eke rectified.
And now departed hence to heaven, of right he there doth reigne,
Yet shall the praise of his good deeds, with us for ay remaine.

In this first age of the primitive Church, very holy men and the Irish especially applied the service of God in this place diligently, who were maintained with allowances from Kings, and instructed youth in religion and liberall sciences. These men embraced a solitarie life, that they might the more quietly studie the Scriptures, and by an austere kind of life exercise themselves to the bearing of the crosse. But at length, Dunstan a man of a subtil wit and well experienced, when he had once by an opinion of his singular holinesse and learning wound himselfe into the inward acquaintance of Princes, in stead of these, brought in Monks of a later order, called Benedictines, and himselfe first of all others became the Abbat or ruler heere of a great convent of them; who had formerly, and afterward gotten at the hands of good and godly Princes a royall revenue. And having reigned as it were in all affluence 600. yeres (for all their neighbours round about were at their beck) they were by K. Henry the Eighth dispossessed & thrust out of all, & this their Monastery, which was growne now to be a pretty Citie, environed with a large wall a mile about; & replenished with stately buildings, was razed and made even with the ground: and now onely sheweth evidently by the ruines thereof, how great and how magnificent a thing it was.

Now, I might be thought one of those that in this age have vanities in admiration, if I should tell you of a Walnut tree in the holy Churchyard here, that never did put forth leafe before S. Barnabees feast, and upon that very day was rank and full of leaves; but that is now gone, and a young tree in the place: as also of the Hawthorne in Wiral-park hard by, which upon Christmasday sprouteth forth as well as in May. And yet there bee very many of good credit, if we may beleieve men of their word, who avouch these things to be most true. But, before I returne from hence, I wil briefly set downe unto you that, which Giraldus Cambrensis an eie-witnesse of the thing, hath more at large related touching Arthurs Sepulchre in the Churchyard there.

When Henric the Second King of England, tooke knowledge out of the Songs of British Bards, or Rhythmers, how Arthur that most noble Worthy of the Britans who

by

by his Martial prowesse, had many a time daunted the fury of the English-Saxons, by buried heere betwene two Pyramides, or sharpe-headed pillars, hee caused the Bodie to be searched for: and scarcely had they digged seven foot deepe into the earth, but they lighted upon a Tomb or Grave-stone, on the upper face whereof was fastned a broad Crosse of lead grossly wrought: which being taken forth shewed an inscription of letters: and under the said stone almost nine foot deeper, was found a Sepulchre of oake made hollow, wherein the bones of that famous Arthur were bestowed, which Inscription or Epitaph, as it was sometime exemplified, and drawn out of the first Copie in the Abbey of Glascon, I thought good for the antiquitie of the characters here to put downe. The letters being made after a barbarous maner, & resembling the Gothick Character, bewray plainly the barbarisme of that age, when ignorance (as it were) by fatall destinie bare such sway, that there was none to be found, by whose writings the renowne of Arthur might bee blazed, and commended to posteritie. A matter and argument doubtlesse, meet to have bene handled by the skill and eloquence of some right learned man, who in celebrating the praises of so great a prince, might have wonne due commendation also for his owne wit. For, the most valiant Champion of the British Empire, seemeth even in this behalfe onely, most unfortunate, that he never met with such a trumpetter, as might worthily have founded out the praise of his valour. But behold the said Crosse and Epitaph therein.

Neither will it be impertinent, if I annex hereunto what our Countrey man, Ioseph, [a Monke] of Excester, no vulgar and triviall Poet, versified, sometime of Arthur in his Poeme Antiocheis, wherein he described the warres of the Christians for recoverie of the Holy Land, and was there present with King Richard the First, speaking of Britaine.

* Alexandrum Magnum.

For famous death, and happie birth, hence flourish'd next in place,
Arthur the flower of noble Kings: whose acts with lovely grace Accepted and admired were, in peoples mouth and eare,
No lesse than if sweet hony they, or pleasant musicke were.
See former Princes, and compare his worth even with them all:
That King in Pella borne, whom we great Alexander call,
The trumpe of fame doth sound aloft. The Roman Stories eke Much praise and honour both, of their Triumphant Caesars speake.
And Hercules exalted is for taming Monsters fell:
But Pine-trees, hazels low, (as Sunne the Starres) doe farre excell:
Both Greeke and Latine Annals read: no former age his Peere,
Nor future time his match can shew. For this is plaine and cleere,
In goodesse hee and greatnesse both, surmounts Kings all and some,
Better alone, than all before, greater than those to come.

And this worthy Knight, (that I may note so much also by the way out of Ninnius the Britan, if it be worth the noting) was called, Mab iwer, that is, A terrible or dreadful Sonne, because hee was from his childhood cruell; and Artur, which in the British tongue importeth as much as a horrible beare, or any yron mall, wherewith the Lions jawes are bruised and broken.

Lo here also, if it please you, other monuments of this place, though they bee not of the greatest antiquitie, out of the foresaid William of Malmesburie. That (quoth he) *which to all men is altogether unknowne, I would gladly relate, if I could picke out the truth: namely, what those sharp pillars or pyramides should meane which beeing set distant certaine feet from the old Church, stand in the front, and border of the Churchyard. The highest of them, and that which is neerer to the Church, than the rest, hath five stories, and carrieth in height six and twentie foot: Which albeit for age it be ready to fall, yet hath it certaine antiquities to be seene, that plainly may be read, although they cannot so easily bee understood. For in the uppermost storie, there is an Image in habit and attire of a Bishop: in the next under it, the statue of a King in his royall robes, and these Letters, HER. SEXI. and BLISVVERH. In the third, these names likewise, and nothing else, WHEMCHREST. BANTOMP. WINEVEGNE. In the fourth HATE. WVLERDE. &c. EANFLEDE. In the fifth, which is the lowest, a portait, and this writing, LOGVVOR. WESLIELAS, &c. BREGDENE. SVVBLVVS. HVVINGENDES. BERNE. The other Pyramis is eightene foot high, and hath foure stories or stories; in which you may read, HEDDE * Bishop, &c. BREGORRED, &c. BEORVVALDE. What all this should signifie, I take not upon me rashly to define: but by conjecture I gather, that in some hollowed stones within, are contained the bones of those, whose names are read without. Surely LOGVVOR is affirmed for certaine, to be the same man, of whose name* the place was sometime called Loovvereseborgh, which now they call Mam-mus And Beorvalde semblably was Abbat next after Hemgiselvs.

Edgar the Peaceable.

To reckon up here the Kings of the West-Saxons, that were buried in this place, would be but needlesse: Howbeit, King Edgar the Peaceable, who alwaies rendered peace, in regard thereof, if there were nothing else, I cannot but remember, and put downe his Epitaph,

*Auctor opum, vindex scelerum, largitor honorum,
Scep-triger Edgarus regna superna petis.
Hic alter Salomō, legum pater, orbis pacis,
Quod caruit bellis, clarnit inde magis.
Templa Deo, templis monachos, monachis dedit agros, Nequitia lapsus, Iustitiæq; locus.
Novit enim regno verum perquirere falso, Immensum modico perpetuumq; brevis.*

That well of wealth, and scourge of sinne, that honour-giver great,
King Edgar hence is gone to hold in heaven his royall seat:
This second Salomon that was, laws-father, Prince of peace,
In that he wanted warres, the more his glorie had increase.
Churches to God, to Churches Monkes, to Monks faire Lands he gave, Downe went in his daies wickednesse, and Iustice place might have:
A pure crowne for a counterfeite he purchased once for all,
An endlesse Kingdome for a short, a boundlesse for a small.

Godney
Moore.

Beneath Glascon three Rivers which there meete, doe make a meere, and issuing forth at one litle mouth, rume all in one channell West-ward, to Uzel-la Frith, first by Gedney or (as others will have it) Godney more, which (they say) signifieth, Gods land, and was granted to Ioseph of Arimathea: then, by Week moore, a Mannour of King Ælfreds, which by his last Will and Testament, he gave as a legacie to his sonne Edward, and so by that moory or fenny-country Crentmashe, that runneth out verie farre, which the Monkes of Glastenbury interpreted to bee the Country of Fen Frogges, like as the litle Towne Brenknoll there, which signifieth, Frog-hill.

Mendip-hills.

From thence Eastward, Mendippe hills extend themselves in length and breadth, Leland calleth them Minerarios, that is, the Minerall hills; and rightly (as I suppose) being they be in old writings named Minneduppe: for, rich they are in lead mines, and good to feed cattell. Among these hills there is a cave or denne farre within the ground: wherein are to be seene certaine pits and rivelets, the place they call Osh-hole, whereof the Inhabitants feine no fewer tales, nor devise lesse dotages, than the Italians did of their Sibyls Cave in the mountaine Apeninns. The name (no doubt) grew of Ogo, a British word, that betokeneth, a Den: even of the like den, the Isle Eubæa, was by such another name sometime called Ocha. Not far hence, in the raigne of K. Henrie the Eighth, was turned up with the plough, a table of lead somewhat long, which lay long at Lambith in the Duke of Norfolkes house, erected sometime for a trophee in token of victorie, with this inscription:

Strabo.

T. I. CLAUDIUS CAESAR. AVG. P. M.
TRIB. P. VIII. IMP. XVI. DE BRITAN.

This Tribuneship of Claudius here mentioned, fell out to be in the 802. yeere after the foundation of Rome, when Antistius and M. Sullius were Consuls, what time P. Ostorius Governour of Britaine as Vice-Pretour, was welcomed thither with many troubles. Out of this time, give me leave, I pray you, to frame certain conjectures: That in this yeere Claudius erected two Trophees, or monuments of victorie over the Britans, his owne ancient coine sheweth as a most certaine witnesse, in the forepart

part whereof is this plaine Inscription, T. I. CLAUD. CÆSAR. AVG. P. M. T. R. P. VIII. IMP. XVI. P. P. and in the reverse thereof, DE BRITAN. and there is expressely stamped a triumphall Arch, with an Image of one galloping on horsebacke, and with two triumphall pillars. What Britaines these were then vanquished, Tacitus sheweth, testifying that this yeere Claudius by the conduct of Ostorius subdued two Nations of the Britans this yeere, to wit, The ICENI, and the CAN- Cangi, a people of Brit-taine.
nus (as it were) in another climate. What if I said, this Trophee was set up in token of victorie over the Cangi, a smaller nation among our Belge, and that those CANGI, were seated in these parts. For, not far from hence is the sea, that lieth toward Ireland, neere which he placeth the Cangi, of whose name there seemeth as yet in certaine places of this tract, some shadow to remaine, namely, in Cannington, & Cannings, pettie countries and Hundreds: as also in Wincauntion, which elsewhere is called Cangton. But of these matters let the reader be judge; my selfe (as I said) doth no more but conjecture, whiles I seeke to trace out these their footsteps, and hope to find them out some where-else.

Among these hills standeth Chuton, which was the habitation, (if I take not my markes amisse) of William Bonvill, whom King Henrie the Sixth called by his writ of Summons to the Parliament, by the name William de Bonvill and Chuton, among other Barons of the Realme, made him Knight of the Garter, and richly matched his sonne in marriage with the sole daughter of Lord Harington. But when he (unthankfull man that he was) in the heare of civill warre, revolted, and tooke part with the house of Yorke, as if vengeance had pursued him hard at heeles, that only sonne of his he saw taken from him by untimely death, and his nephew by the same sonne, Baron of Harington, slaine at the battell of Wakefield: and immediately after, (that his old age might want no kind of miserie) whiles he waited still, and long looked for better daies, was himselfe taken prisoner in the second battell of Saint Albans, and having now run through his full time by course of nature, lost his head, leaving behind him for his heire, his Grand-childs daughter Cecillie, a Damselfe of tender yeares, who afterwards with a great inheritance, was wedded to Thomas Greie, Marquess
D Dorset. But his blood after his death was by authoritie of Parliament restored.

Bonvill.

Under Mendip hills northward, there is a litle village, called, Cangersburie, so named of one Conger, a man of singular holinesse. Capgrave hath written, that hee was the Emperours sonne of Constantinople who lived there an Eremite: also Harpetre, a Castle by right of inheritance, fell to the Gornaies, and from thence descended to the Ab. Adams, who as I have read, restored it to the Gornaies again. Southward, not farre from the foresaid hole, where Mendip slopeth downe with a stony descent, a litle citie with an Episcopall See, is scituate beneath at the hill foot, sometime called, (as faith Leland) but whence he had it, I wot not, Theodorodunum, now Welles, so named of the Springs, or Wells, which boile and walme up there: like as Susa in Persia, Crota in Dalmatia; and Pagase in Macedonia, were named of the like fountaines; in their country speech: whereupon this also in Latin, is called, Fontanensis Ecclesia, as one would say, Fountain-Church. For multitude of Inhabitants, for faire and stately buildings, it may well and truly chalenge the preheminece of all this Province. A goodly Church it hath, and a Colledge, founded by King Ina, in honour of Saint Andrew, and soone after endowed by Princes, and great men with rich livings, and revencues: among whom King Kinewolp by name, in the yeare of our Lord 766. granted unto it very many places lying thereabout. For, in a Charter of his wee read thus, *I Kinewolp, King of the West-Saxons, for the love of God, and (that which is not openly to be spoken) for some vexation of our enemies, those of the Cornish Nation, with the consent of my Bishops and Nobles, with most humbly give and consecrate some parcell of Land to Saint Andrew the Apostle, and servant of God, that is to say, as much as cometh to * Eleven Hides, neere to the River called Welwe, for the augmentation of that Manasterie, which standeth neere the great fountaine that they call Wiclea. This Charter have I set downe, both for the antiquitie, and because some have supposed, that the place tooke name of this River; verily, neere the Church there is a Spring, called*

Manentium. XI.

Saint Andrewes Well, the fairest, deepest, and most plentiful that I have seene, by and by making a swift Brooke. The Church it selfe all throughout is very beautifull, but the Frontispiece thereof, in the West end, is a most excellent and goodly piece of worke indeede, for it ariseth up still from the foot to the top all of imagerie, in curious and antike wise wrought of stone carved, and embowed right artificially, and the Cloisters adjoining very faire and spacious.

A gorgeous pallace of the Bishops, built in manner of a Castle, fortified with walles, and a moate standeth hard by, Southward; and on the other side faire houses of the Prebendaries. For, Seven and Twenty Prebends, with nineteene other petty Prebends, beside a Deane, a Chaunter, a Chancellour, and three Archdeacons belong to this Church. In the time of K. Edward the elder, a Bishops See was here placed. For, when the Pope had suspended him, because the Ecclesiasticall discipline and jurisdiction in these westerne parts of the Realme, began openly to decay, then he knowing himselfe to be a maintainer, and Nurse-father of the Church, ordained three new Bishopricks, to wit, of * Cridie, Cornwall, and this of Welles, where hee made Eadulph the first Bishop. But many yeares after, when Giso late Bishop there, Harold Earle of the West-Saxons, and of Kent (who gaped so greedily for the goods of the Church) so disquiereed and vexed him, that hee went within a little off quite abolishing the dignitie thereof. But King William the Conquerour, after hee had overthrowne Harold, stretched out his helping hand to the succour of banished Giso, and reliefe of his afflicted Church. At what time, (as witnesseth Doomesday booke) the Bishop held the whole towne in his owne hands, which paid tribute after the proportion of fiftie Hides. Afterwards in the raigne of Henry the First, Johannes de Villula, of Tours in France, being now elected Bishop, translated his See to Bathe, since which time the two Sees growing into one, the Bishop beareth the title of both; so that hee is called, The Bishop of Bathe and Welles. Whereupon the Monkes of Bathe, and Canons of Welles, entred into a great quarrell, and skuffled, as it were, each with the other about the choosing of their Bishops: Meane while, Savarnicus Bishop of Bathe, being also Abbat of Glastenbury, translated the See of Glastenbury and was called Bishop thereof: but when hee died, this title died with him: and the Monkes and Canons aforesaid, were at length brought to accord, by that Robert, who divided the Patrimoine of Welles Church into Prebends, instituting a Deane, Sub-deane, &c. Joceline also, the Bishop about the same time, repaired the Church with new buildings, and within remembrance of our Grand-fathers, Raulph of Shrewsburie, (so some call him) built a very fine Colledge for the Vicars and singing-men, fast by the North side of the Church, and walled in the Bishops Palace. But this rich Church, was dispoiled of many faire possessions in the time of King Edward the Sixth, when England felt all miseries which happen under a Child-King. As ye goe from the Palace to the market-place of the towne, Thomas Beckington the Bishop built a most beautifull gate: who also adjoynd thereto passing faire houses all of uniforme height neere the Market-place; in the midst whereof is to be seene a Market-place, supported with seven Columns or pillar without, arched over-head right daintily, which William Knight the Bishop, and Wolman the Deane founded for the use of people resorting thither to the Market. Thus much of the East-part of the towne: In the West-side thereof, I have seene the parish Church of Saint Cuthberts: next unto which standeth an Hospitall, founded by Nicolas Burwisch Bishop for foure and twentie poore people.

Out of those Mendip or Mine-hills, springeth the River Frome, which running East-ward, by Cole-pits, before it hath held on a long course that way, turneth North-ward, and serveth in stead of a bound confining this shire and Gloucestershire, and passeth hard under Farley, a Castle not long since of the Lord Hungerfords, scituate upon a Rocke, where Humfrey Bohun built sometime a Monkerie, not farre from Philips Norton, a greate Market-towne, which tooke the name of a Church, consecrate to Saint Philip.

A Lower than it, Selwood, whereof I spake erewhile, spreadeth long and large: a wood standing well and thicke of trees, whereof the country round about adjoyning was named (as Ethelward mine Author writeth, Selwoodshire: and a towne steepely seated thereby is yet called Frome Selwood, which gaineth very much by the trade of cloathing: From which, Westward, not full two miles, there sheweth it selfe, a Castle (little though it be) yet fine and trim consisting of foure round Turrets, which being built by the Delamars, and named thereupon Monney de la Mare, from them came by way of inheritance to the Powlets. And not farre from thence is Wisham, where King Henry the Third erected a Nunnerie, which afterward was the first house, and as it were, mother to the Carthusians or Charter-house Monks in England; as Hinton not far off neere Farley Castle was the second. And now by this time, Frome grown bigger by some rivelets issuing out of this wood, joyneth with the noble river Avon: which holding on a crooked course, runneth anone to that ancient Citie which of the hote Bathes Ptolomee called ῬΑΤΑΘΕΡΜΑ, that is, Hote waters: Antoninus, AQVAE SOLIS, that is, The waters of the Sunne: the Britaines Tr ennaint Twymyn and Caer Badon, the Saxons Bapancegryp, hat Bapan, and of the concourse thither of diseased people Akmanchester, that is, The Citie of sickely folke: Stephanus nameth it Badiza, we at this day Bath, and the Latinists commonly, Bathonia. Seated it is low in a plaine, and the same not great; environed round about with hills almost all of one height, out of which certaine rilles of fresh river waters continually descend into the Citie, to the great commoditie of the Citizens. Within the Citie it selfe there bubble & boile up three springs of hote water, of a blewish or sea-colour, sending up from them thin vapours, and a kind of a strong sent withall, by reason that the water is drilled, and strained through veins of Brimstone, and a clammy kind of earth called Bitumen. Which springs are very medicinable, and of great vertue to cure bodies over-charged, and benumbed (as it were) with corrupt humours: For, by their heat they procure sweat, and subdue the rebellious stubbornnesse of the said humours. Yet are not they wholesome at all houres: For, from eight of the clocke in the forenoone unto three after noone, they are in manner skalding hote, and doe D worke: and being thus troubled cast up from the bosome certaine filth: during which time they are shut: neither may any body goe into them; untill by their sluces they cleanse themselves, and rid away that filthinesse. Of these three, The Crosse Bath (so called of a crosse standing upright in old time in the midst of it) is of a very mild and temperate warmth: and hath twelve seates of stone about the brinke or border thereof, and is enclosed within a wall. The second, distant from this not fully 200. foot is much hotter: whereupon it is termed Hote Bathe: Adjoyning to these, is a Spittle or Lazar house, built by Reginald Bishop of Bath for the reliefe of poore diseased persons. And those two are in the midst of a Street on the West-side of the Citie. The third, which is the greatest, and after a sort in the very bosome and heart of the Citie, is called the Kings Bath, neere unto the Cathedrall Church, walled also round about, and fitted with 32. seates of arched worke: wherein men and women may sit apart, who when they enter in put upon their bodies linnen garments, and have their guides. Where the said Cathedrall Church now standeth, there was in ancient time, as the report goeth, a Temple consecrated to Minerva. Certes, Solinus Polyhistor speaking (no doubt) of these hote Bathes saith thus, In Britaine, there are hot springs very daintily adorned and kept for mens use: the patronesse of which fountaines is the Goddesse Minerva: in whose Temple the perpetuall fire never turneth ashes, and dead coales, but when the fire beginneth to die, it turnes into round masses of stone. Howbeit Athenans writeth, that all hote Bathes which naturally breake out of the bowels of the earth are sacred to Hercules. And in very deece, there is to be seene in the walles of this Citie an ancient Image (such as it is) of Hercules grasping in his hand a Snake, among other old monuments by the injurie of time now altogether defaced: But that we may not contend about this matter, let us grant (if it be so thought good) that Bathes were consecrated to Hercules, and Minerva, joyntly. For the Greeks doe write that Pallas first ministred water unto Hercules for to bath him, after ter he had atchieved his labours. For my purpose it shall suffice, if I be able to prove by the authoritie of Solinus (who writeth that Pallas was the Patronesse of these Bathes) this Citie to be the same which the Britans in their tongue called Caer Palladus, that is, The Citie of Pallas-water, or Vrbs Palladia Aqua, if a man turne it into Latine. For, the matter, the name, and signification doe most firly agree. The finding out of these Bathes our Fables attribute to the King of Britans Bleyden Cleyth, that is, Bleyden the Magician; but with what probability, that I leave to others. Plinie indeed affirmeth, that the Britans in old time used the practice of magick with so great ceremonies, that it seemed they taught it the Persians: yet dare I not ascribe these Bathes to any art magicall. Some of our writers, when their minds were busied in other matters, report Julius Caesar to have bene the first finder of them: But my opinion is, that later it was ere the Romans had knowledge of them, seeing Solinus is the first that hath made mention of them. The English-Saxons about the 44. yeare after their comming into Britaine, when they had broken league and covenant, and kindled againe the coales of war which had already bene quenched, besieged this Citie: But when the warlike Arthur came upon them, they tooke the hill named Mon Badonicus, where, when courageously a long while they had fought it out to the uttermost, a great number of them were slaine. This hill seemeth to be the very same, which now is called Bannesdowne, over a little village neere this Citie, which they call Bathstone, on which there are bankes, and a rampier as yet to be seene. Yet some there be, I know, who seeke for this hill in Yorkshire: But Gildas may bring them backe againe to this place: For, in a manuscript Copie within Cambridge-Librarie, where he writeth of the victorie of Aurelius Ambrose, thus we read: Untill that year wherein siege was laid to the hill of Badonicus, which is not farre from Severne mouth. But in case this may not perswade them, know they, that the vale which runneth here along the river Avon, is named in British Nant Badon, that is, The Vale of Badon: and where we should seeke for the hill Badonicus, but by the Vale Badonica, I cannot hitherto see. Neither durst the Saxons for a long time after, set upon this Citie, but left it for a great while to the Britans. Howbeit in the yeare of Christ 577. when Cowlin King of the West-Saxons, had defeated the Britans at Deorham, in Gloucestershire, being both straightly besieged, and also assaulted, it yielded at first: and within few yeares recovering some strength grew up to great dignity and therewith got a new name, Ackmancester, as I said: For, Osbrich in the yeare 676. founded a Nunnery there: and immediately after, when the Mercians had gotten it under them, King Offa built another Church, both which in the time of the Danish broiles were overthrowne. Out of the ruines of these two, arose afterwards the Church of S. Peter, in which Edgar surnamed the Peace-maker, being crowned, and sacred King, bestowed upon the Citie very many Immunities, the memorie of which thing the Citizens yearly with Solemne plaies doe yet celebrate. In Edward the Confessors time, (as we read in Domes-booke of England) it paid tribute according to 20. Hides, when as the Shire paid. There, the King had 64. Burgers, and 30. Burgers of others. But this prosperitie of theirs endured not long: for, soone after the Normans comming in, Robert Mowbray Nephew to the Bishop of Constance, who had raised no small Sedition against King William Rufus, sacked and burned it. Yet in short space it revived, and recovered it selfe, by meanes of John de Vikula of Tours in France, who being Bishop of Welles, for five hundred markes (as saith William of Malmesburie) purchased this Citie of King Henry the First, and translated his Episcopall chaire hither, retaining also the title of Bishop of Welles, and for his owne See built a new Church: which being not long since ready to fall, Oliver Bishop of Bathe began to found another hard by that old (a curious and stately piece of worke, I assure you) and almost finished the same: Which if he had performed indeed, it would no doubt have surpassed the most Cathedrall Churches of England. But the untimely death of so magnificent a Bishop, the iniquitie and troubles of the time, and the suppression of religious houses ensuing, with the late avarice of some, who have craftily conveyed the money collected throughout England for that use, another way (if it be true that is reported) have

A have envied it that glory. But neverthelesse this Citie hath flourished as well by clothing, as by reason of usuall concourse thither for health twice every yeare, yea and hath fortified it selfe with walles, wherein there are set certaine Antique Images and Roman Inscriptions for the prooffe of their antiquitie, which now by age are so eaten into, and worn, that they can hardly be read. And that nothing might be wanting to the state and dignitie of Bathe, some noble men it hath honoured with the title of Earle. For, we read, that Philibert of Chandew descended out of Bretaigne in France, was by King Henry the Seventh stiled with this honor. Afterwards, King Henrie the Eighth, in the 28. yeare of his reigne created John Boucher Lord Fitzwarin, Earle of Bathe. Who died shortly after, leaving by his wife the sister of H. Danbney Earle of Bridge-water, John second Earle of this familie, who by the daughter of George Lord Roos had John Lord Fitz-Warin, who deceased before his father, having by Fr. the daughter of S. Thomas Kitson of Hengrave William now third Earle of Bathe, who endeavoureth to beautifie and adorne his nobilitie of birth, with commendable studies of good letters. The longitude of this Citie is according to Geographers measure 20. degrees, and 16. minutes. But the Latitude 51. degrees, and 21. minutes. And now for a farwell, loe here Nechams verses, such as they bee, of these hot waters at Bathe, who lived 400. yeares since.

Bathonia thermas vix praefero Virgilianas;
Confecto profunt balnea nostra seni.
Profunt attritis, collis, invalidisque,
Et quorum morbis frigida causa subest.
Prævenit humanum stabilis natura laborem;
Servit natura legibus artis opus.
Igne suo succensa quibus data balnea fervent,
Aenea subter aquas vasa latere putant.
Errorem figmenta solent inducere passim.
Sed quid? sulphureum novimus esse locum.

D Our Bathes at Bath, with Virgils to compare,
For their effects, I dare almost be bold:
For feeble folke, and crasse good they are,
For bruised, consumed, far-spent, and very old:
For those likewise, whose sicknesse comes of cold.
Nature prevents the painfull skill of man;
Arts worke againe, helps nature what it can.
Men thinke these Baths of ours are made thus hot,
By reason of some secret force of fire,
Which under them as under brazen pot
Makes more or lesse, as reason doth require,
The waters boile, and walme to our desire:

E Such fancies vaine, use errors forth to bring,
But what? we know from Brimstone veins they spring.
Have heere also, if you list to read them, two ancient Inscriptions very lately digged up neere the Citie in Waldcot field, hard by the Kings high way side, which Robert Chambers, a studious lover of antiquities, hath translated into his garden: From whence I copied them out.

And Medusa's head with haire all Snakes.

Along the said river of Avon, which now is heere the bound between this shire and Gloucestershire, upon the banke Westward we have a sight of Cainham, so name of one Keina, a most devout and holy British virgine, who (as the credulous age before-time, perswaded many) transformed serpents into stones, because there be found there in Stone quarries, such strange workes of nature, when she is disposed to disport herselfe. For, I have seene a stone brought from hence resembling a serpent, winding round in manner of a wreath, the head whereof being somewhat unperfect bare up in the Circumference thereof, and the end of the taile tooke up the centre within.

A most of these are headlesse. In the fields neere adjoyning, and other places beside, is found Perceper, an hearbe peculiar unto England. Bitter it is in taste, and hath a biting sharpnesse withall: it never groweth above a span high, and commeth up all the yeare long of it selfe: small leavy flowers of a greenish hew it beares, without any stalke at all: Which herbe mightily, and speedily provoketh urine: and of it the distilled water serveth for great use, as P. Pena in his Animadversions or Commentaries of Plants hath noted.

Scarce five miles from this place, the river Avon passeth through the midst of Bristol. Bristol. In Welch-British, Caer oder, Nant Badon, that is, The Citie Oder, in the Vale of Badon. In the Catalogue of ancient Cities, Caer Brito: In Saxon Brighstrop, that is, Abright or shining place. But such as have called it Venta Belgarum, have deceived both themselves and others. This Citie standing partly in Somerset, and partly in Gloucestershire, is not to be reputed belonging either to this, or that, having Magistrates of the owne by it selfe, and being of it selfe entire, and a County incorporate. Scituate it is somewhat high betweene Avon and the little river Frome, sufficiently defended with rivers and fortifications together: For, environed it was sometime with a double wall. So faire to behold by reason of buildings as well publike as private, that it is fully correspondent to the name of Bright flow: With common Sewes or Sinks, (they call them Goutes) so made to run under the ground for the convenience, and washing away of all filth, that for cleanlinesse, and holiness a man would not desire more: whereupon there is no use heere of carts: so well furnished with all things necessaric for a mans life, so populous, and well inhabited withall, that next after London, and York, it may of all Cities in England justly challenge the chiefe place. For, the mutuall entercourse of trafficke, and the commodious haven, which admitteth in ships under saile into the very bosome of the Citie, hath drawne people of many countries thither. For the Avon, so often as the Moone declineth downward from the meridian point, and passeth by the opposite line unto it, so swelth with the tide from the Ocean, that it raiseth up the ships there riding, and lying in the oze 11. or 12. elles afloat in water. And the Citizens themselves are rich Merchants, and trafficke all over Europe, yea, and make Voyages at sea so farre as into the most remote parts of America. But, when, and by whom it was built, it is hard to say. Old it seemeth not to be, for as much as in all those spoiles, and sackages that the Danes made, there is no mention of it in our Historians. And verily mine opinion is, that it first grew up to some name, when the English-Saxons Empire was much declining, seeing that it is no where named before the yeare of our Lord 1063; when Harold (as Florentinus of Worcester writeth) embarked himselfe, and his armie, and put to sea from Bristol to Wales. In the first yeares of the Normans, Berton, a manor adjoyning, and Bristol paid unto the King (as we find in the booke of Dome(sday) 110. markes of silver, and the Burgers said, that Bishop G. hath 33. markes, and one marke of Gold. After this, Robert Bishop of Constance that plotted seditious practises against King William Rufus, chose it for the seate-towne of the whole warre, fortified it, being then but a small Citie, with that inner (wall as I take it) which at this day is in part standing. But a few yeares after, the circuit thereof was every way enlarged. For on the South, Radcliffe, wherein there stood some small houses under the Citie side, is by a stone bridge, with houses on each hand built upon it, more like a streete than a bridge, joyned to the Citie: enclosed within a wall, and the Inhabitants thereof enfranchised Citizens: yea & hospitals in every quarter thereof for the benefit of poore people, and faire Parish-Churches to the glorie of God were erected. The most beautifull of all which by farre, is S. Maries of Radcliffe without the walles, into which there is a stately ascent upon many staires: so large withall, so finely, and curiously wrought, with an arched roofover head of stone artificially embowed, a steeple also of an exceeding height, that all the Parish-Churches in England which hitherto I have seene, in my judgement it surpasseth many degrees. In it, William Cannings the founder, hath two faire monuments: upon the one lieth his image portraied in an Aldermans robe: For, five times he had bene Major of this Citie: upon the other,

other, his image likewise in sacerdotall habite; for that in this old age hee tooke the orders of priesthood, and was Deane of that colledge which himselfe instituted at Westburie. There is hard by, another Church also, which they call the Temple, the lantern or tower whereof when the bell rings shaketh to and fro, so as it hath cloven and divided it selfe from the rest of the building, and made such a chinke from the bottome to the top, as it gapeth the bredth of three fingers, and both shutteth and openeth whensoever the bell is rung. And heere I must not overpasse in silence S. Stephens Church, the tower steeple whereof being of a mightie heighth, one Shipward, alias Barstable, a Citizen and Merchant, within the memorie of our grandfathers, right sumptuously, and artificially built. From the East-side also & the North, augmented it was with a number of edifices, enclosed within a wall and fenced with the river Frome, which having runne by the wall side gently falleth into the Avon, and yieldeth a dainty harbour for ships, with a wharfe convenient for the shipping and unlading of Merchandise in and out, (they call it the Key.) Under which betweene the confluences of Avon and Frome, there is a plaine beset round about with trees, yielding a most pleasant walking place: South-east, where no rivers are to guard it, Robert the base sonne of King Henry the First, whom they commonly name Robert Rufus, and Confull of Gloucester, because he was Earle of Gloucester, built a large and strong Castle for the defence of this Citie, and of a pious and devout affection appointed every tenth stone to the building of a Chappell neere unto the Priory of S. James, which he likewise founded by the Citie side. This Robert had to wife Mabile the onely daughter and heire of Robert Fitz-Hamon, who held this towne by vassalage in Capite, of King William Conquerour. This Castle was scarcely built, when King Stephen besieged it, but with lost labour: for, he was compelled to raise his siege and depart: and a few yeares after, was imprisioned in the same, giving thereby a testimony and prooffe how uncertaine the chance of war is. Beyond the river Frome which hath a bridge over it, at Frome-gate there riseth an high hill, with a steepe and crooked ascent, so as it is painefull to goe up unto it: From whence ye have a most faire and goodly prospect to the Citie and haven underneath. This hill in the very top and pitch thereof, spreadeth presently into a large, greene and even plaine, which in the midst is shadowed with a double row and course of trees, and among them stands a pulpit of Stone, and a Chapell, wherein (by report) lich entered Jordan the companion of Augustine the Englishmens Apostle. Now it is converted to a Schoole, and on both sides (to say nothing of the neare and fine houses of private men) beautified it is with publike and stately buildings. Of the one side was a Collegiat Church called Gaunts, of the founder one Henry Gaunt Knight, who relinquishing the world, in this place betooke himselfe to the service of God: but now through the bounty of Thomas Carr a wealthy Citizen, converted to the keeping of Orphans: on the other side directly over against it stand two Churches dedicated to S. Augustine, the one (which is the lesse) a Parish Church: the other, that is greater, the Bishops Cathedrall Church, endowed with fixe Prebendaries, by King Henrie the Eighth: the greatest part whereof is now destroyed, where the Colledge-gate workmanly built carrieth in the front this Inscription.

REX HENRICVS II. ET DOMINVS ROBERTVS FILIVS HARDINGI FILII REGIS DACIÆ, HVIVS MONASTERII PRIMI FVNDATORES EXTITERVNT.

That is,

King Henry the Second, and Lord Robert the sonne of Harding, the King of Denmarks sonne, were the first founders of this Monasterie.

This

A This Robert, called by the Normans Fitz-Harding, descended of the bloud royall of Denmarke was an Alderman of Bristol, of King Henry the Second so entirely beloved, that by his meanes Maurice his sonne married the daughter of the Lord of Barkley. Whereby his posteritie, who flourished in great honor, are unto this day called Barons of Barkley; and some of them have bene buried in this Church.

Barons de Barkley.

From hence as Avon holdeth on his course, there are on each side very high cliffes by nature set there (as it were) of purpose, the one of them which on the East-side overlooketh the river beareth the name of S. Vincents rocke, so full of Diamonds, that a man may fill whole strikes or bushels of them. These are not so much set by, because they be so plentiful. For, in bright, and transparent colour they match the Indian Diamonds, if they passe them not: in hardnesse onely they are inferior to them; but in that nature her self hath framed them pointed with fixe cornerd or foure cornerd smooth sides; I thinke them therefore worthy to be had in greater admiration. The other rock also on the West-side is likewise full of Diamonds, which by the wonderfull skill and worke of nature, are enclosed as young ones within the bowels of hollow, and reddish flints: for, here is the earth of a red colour. When Avon hath left these rocks behind him, with full channell at length he disengorgeth himselfe into the Severn-sea.

C Then remaineth now to reckon up the Earles and Dukes of this County. The first Earle of Somerset, by tradition, was William de Mohun, or Moion, who may seeme to be the very same, whom Mauide the Emperesse in a charter whereby she created William de Mandevill Earle of Essex, taketh as a witnesse under this name, Comes. W. de Moion. Neither from that time meete we with any expresse and apparent mention of Earles of Somerset, unless it be in these letters Patents of King Henrie the Third, unto Peter de * Mawley, which, that I may draw out the judgement of others, I will heere set downe literally. Know ye, that we have received the homage of our well beloved Uncle William Earle of Salisbury for all the lands that he holdeth of us, & principally for the Earles, and Dukes of Somerset.

Patent. Anno primo Henrici. tertii. * De malo lacu.

* De Comitatu.

* County or Earledome of Somerset, which we have given unto him with all appurtenances for his homage and service, saving the royaltie to our selves: and therefore we will & command you, that ye see he have full seisine of the foresaid Earledome, and all the appurtenances thereto, and that ye entermeddle not in any thing from henceforth, as touching the County or Earledome aforesaid, &c. And commandement is given to all Earles, Barons, Knights, and Freeholders of the County of Somerset, that unto the same Earle they doe fealtie, and homage, saving their faith and allegiance unto their Sovereigne Lord the King, and that from henceforth they be insentive and answerable unto him as their Lord. Whether by these words in the Patent he was Earle of Somerset, as also of Deneshire (for, of the same William he wrote likewise in the very same words unto Robert de Courtney) I leave for other men to judge. Under this King Henry the third (as wee finde in a booke written in French, which pertaineth to the house of the Mohuns Knights) it is recorded,

E that Pope Innocentius in a solemne feast, ordained Reginald Mohun Earle de Esst, (that is, as the Author doth interpret it, Of Somerset) by delivering unto him a golden consecrated rose, and an yearly pension to be paid upon the high Altar of S. Pauls, in London. So that this Reginald may seeme to have bene not properly an Earle, but an Apostolicall Earle. For, so were they termed in those daies who had their creation from the Bishop of Rome, (like as they were called Earles Imperiall whom the Emperour invested) and such had power to institute Notaries and Scribes, to legitimate such as were base borne, &c. under certaine conditions. A long time after Iohn de Beaufort the base sonne of Iohn of Gaunt Duke of Lancaster by Katherine Swinesford, being made legitimate by King Richard the Second, together with his brethren and sister, with consent of the Parliament, was preferred to the honor of Earle of Somerset, and afterwards created Marquesse Dorset; but soone after deprived thereof by King Henrie the Fourth, having the title onely of the Earle of Somerset left unto him. The said Iohn had three sonnes, Henry Earle of Somerset, who died in his tender age; Iohn, created by King Henry the Fifth, the first Duke of Somerset, who had one sole daughter named Margaret, mother to King Henry the Seventh: and Edmund

Earle Apostolicall.

See Earles of Dorset.

Edmund who succeeded after his brother in the Dukedome: and having beene a certaine time Regent of France, being called home, and accused for the losse of Normandie, after hee had suffered much grievance at the peoples hands in that regard, was in that wofull war betweene the houses of Lancaster and Yorke slaine in the first battaile of S. Albans. Henric his sonne being placed in his roome, whiles hee served the times, siding one while with Yorke, and anotherwhile with Lancaster, in the battaile at Exham was by those of the houses of Yorke: taken prisoner, and with the losse of his head paid for his unconstant levitic. Edmund his brother succeeded him in his honor, who of this family was the last Duke of Somerset, and when the whole power of the Lancastrians was discomfited at Tewkesbury, was forcibly pulled out of the Church into which all embred with bloud he fled as into a Sanctuary, and then beheaded. Thus all the legitimate males of this family being dead and gone, first King Henry the Seventh honored with title Edmund his owne son a young child, who shortly departed this world: afterwards King Henry the Eighth, did the like for his base sonne, named Henry Fitz-Roy. And seeing he had no children, King Edward the Sixth, invested Sir Edward de Sancto Mauro, commonly, Seimor, with the same honour, who being most power-able, honorable, and loaden with titles, for thus went his stile, Duke of Somerset, Earle of Hertford, Vicount Beauchamp, Baron Seimor, Vncle to the King, Governour of the King, Protector of his Realmes, Dominions, and subjects, Lieutenant of the forces by land and sea, Lord high Treasurer, and Earle Marshall of England, Capitaine of the Isles Gernsey, and Iersey, &c. Was suddenly overwhelmed, as it were by a disport of fortune which never suffereth suddaine over-greatnesse to last long, and for a small crime, and that upon a nice point subtilly devised, and packed by his enemies, bereaved both of those dignities, and his life withall.

WVILSHIRE.

WVilshire, which also pertained to the BELOAR, called in the English-Saxon tongue, Wil-rettva, in Latine commly termed, Wiltonia, taking that denomination of Wilton, sometime the chiefe towne, like as it of the River Willy, is altogether a mediterranean or mid-land country. For, enclosed it is with Somersetshire on the West, Berkshire and Hampshire on the East; on the North, with Gloucestershire; and on the South, with Dorsetshire, and a part of Hampshire. A Region, which,

as it breedeth a number of warlike and hardy men, who in old time, with Cornwall and Deanshire together challenged by reason of their manhood, and martiall prowesse the prerogative in the English armie of that regiment, which should second the maine battell, (as saith Iohn of Sarisburie in his Polycraicon) so is it exceeding fertill, and plentifull of all things, yea, and for the varietie thereof, passing pleasant and delightful. The Northern and upper part, which they call, North-Wilshire, riseth up somewhat with delectable hils, attired in times past with large and great woods, (which now begin to grow thinne) and watered with cleare rivers. For, Isis the principall, and, as it were Prince of all the English Rivers; which afterwards taketh to him the name of Tamisis, that is, Thames, being now as yet but little and shallow, together with other Rivers of lesse name, which I will speake of in their proper places, water it plentifully. The South part with large grassie plaines, feedeth innumerable flocks of sheepe, having his Rivers, swelling Brookes, and rils of everliving fountains. The middest of this shire, which for the most part also, lieth even and plain, is divided overthwart from East to West, with a Dike of wonderfull worke, cast up for many miles together in length: The people dwelling there about, call it Wansdike, which upon an errour generall received, they talke, and tell to have beene made by the diuell upon a Wednesday. For in the Saxon tongue it is called, Wodenewic, that is to say, The Ditch of Wooden or Mercurie, and as it should seeme, of Wooden that false imagined God, and Father of the English-Saxons. But I have alwaies beene perswaded, that the Saxons made it, as a limit to divide the two Kingdomes of the Mercians, and West-Saxons asunder. For, this was the very place of battell betweene them, whiles they strove one with another, to enlarge their Dominions. And neere unto this Dike standeth, Wodensburg a little Village, where Ceanline, the most warlike King of the West-Saxons, in the yeare of grace 590. whiles hee defended his Marches, in a bloody fight, received such a foile and overthrow by the Britans and Englishmen, that he was forced to flie his countrey, and to end his daies in exile, a pitious and lamentable spectacle, even to his very enemies. And at this Dike, to say nothing of other accidents, Ina the West-Saxon, and Ceolred the Mercian, joyned battell, and departed the field on even hand: Like to this was that ditch, whereby King Offa kept the Britans off from his Mercians; called even at this day Offa's dike: others also are still to be seene, among the East-Angles in Cambridgeshire, and Suffolk, wherewith they limited their territory, and defended themselves from the inrodes and invasions of the Mercians.

In the North-part of Wilshire, which is watered with Isis, or the Thames, there is a towne called Creckelade by Marianus, by others Greekelade of Greecke Philosophers, as some are ready to beleve; who, as the historie of Oxford reporteth, began there an Universitie, which afterwards was translated to Oxford. West from that is Highworth highly seated, a well knowne Market, but South from Creckelade, I saw Lediard Tregoze, the seat of the Familie of Saint-Iohn, Knights: the which Margaret de Bello Campo, or Beauchamp, afterwards Duchesse of Somerset, gave to Oliver of Saint Iohn her second sonne. For, to her it came as an inheritance, by Patishul, Grandison, and and Tregeze, names of great honour. Wotton Basset bordeth hard upon this, having this primitive name from Wood, the addition doth prove, that it belonged to the Noble house of the Bassets. But in the latter fore-going age, it was (as I have heard say, the habitation of the Duke of Yorke, who made there a verie large Parke, for to enclose Deere in. From hence Breden wood, now Breden Forrest, stretched it selfe farre and wide, which in the year 905. by Ethelwald * Chyso, and the Danes that aided him, was laid waste, and the Inhabitants endured all calamities of warre.

On the West side whereof, the River Avon, above mentioned, gently runneth, which breaking forth almost in the North limit of this shire, keepeth his course southward, and (as Aethelward noteth,) was sometime the bound betwene the Kingdoms of the West-Saxons, and the Mercians: upon which many great battels from time to time were fought: while it is but small, he slideth under Malmesbury hill, and receiving another streame, well neare encloseth the place. A very proper towne this is, and hath a great name for clothing, which (as wee read in the Eulogie of Histories) Quintus Mulmutius, King of the Brittaines, built together with Lacock and Tetbury two Castles, and named it Caer Baldon, which being at length by heat of warres destroyed, out of the ruines thereof there arose, as writers record, a Castle which our Ancestors in their tongue, called, Ingelbope: at which time, the Saxon petie Kings had their royall palace at Caerdurberge, now Brokenbridge, a little village scarce a mile off. Neither verily was this towne for a long time knowne by any other name than Ingleborne, untill one Maidulph an Irish Scot, a man of great learning, and singular benesse of life, taking delight to a pleasant grove, that grew up heere under the hill, lived for a time a solitary Heremite there: and afterwards teaching a Schoole, and with his schollers betaking himselfe to a monasticall life, built him a little monastrie, or Cell. From this time, of that Maidulph, the towne began to bee called, Maidulphesburge for Ingleborne, termed by Beda, Maidulphi Urbis, that is, Maidulphesburge, and afterwards short, Malmesburies and in some of our Histories, and ancient Donations made unto this place, Meldunum, Malduburie, and Malduniburg. Among the Disciples of this Maidulph, flourished chiefly Aldeme, who being elected his successour, by the helpe of Eleutherius, Bishop of the West-Saxons, unto whom the place of right belonged, built there a very faire Monastrie, and was himselfe the last Abbat thereof: of whom also in a certaine manuscript, this towne is called Aldemesbirig. But this name soone perished, yet the memorie of the man continueth still: for canonized he was a Saint: and on his festivall day, there was heere kept a great Faire, at which usuall there is a band of armed men, appointed to keepe the peace among so many strangers resorting thither. And right worthy is he, that his memorie should remaine fresh for ever, in regard, not onely of his Holinesse, but of his learning also, as those times were. For the first, he was of the English nation, who wrote in Latine, and the first that taught Englishmen the way, how to make a Latine verse: the which in these verses, hee both promised of himselfe, and performed,

Aonio rediens deducam verberice Musas.*

I will be first, God lending life, that into country mine,
From Aon top at my returne, shall bring the Muses nine.

This Aldeme after his death, Athelstane that Noble Prince, chose to be his peculiar protector and tutelar Saint, and for that cause bestowed very great immunities upon this towne, and enriched the monastrie with a large and ample endowment. In which he made choise to bee buried, and his monument the Inhabitants shew to this day. After Athelstane, this Monastrie flourished long in continuall wealth, and among other famous Clerks, and great Scholars, brought forth William successour thereof Malmesburiensis, unto whom for his learned industry, the Histories of England both Civill, and Ecclesiasticall, are deeply indebted. The towne also maintained and upholden, as it were, by the meanes of the Monastrie, was likewise ified by Roger Bishop of Salisburie, who in the beginning of the warres betwene Henric of Anjou, and King Stephen strengthened it with walls, and a Castle, which being once besieged by King Henric the Second, defended it selfe. Moreover that magnificent Bishop, both here and at Salisburie built houses, for recit very large, for cost as sumptuous, and for shew right beautifull; so even and orderly were the stones couched, and laid together, that the joynts could not be seene, and the whole wall throughout seemed to be the one entire stone. But the Castle not many yeares after by K. Johns permission, was pulled downe to the use of the Monkes (for enlarging their monastrie) who encreased it still continually both in buildings, livings, and revenue, untill that fatall thunder-clap overthrew all the Monasteries of England. Then their lands, rents, and riches that had bene so many yeares in gathering, and heaping up together, which were (as our Forefathers reputed them) The vovues of the faithfull, the ransom, and redemption of sinnes, and the patrimony of poore people, were quite scattered: and the very Minister it selfe should have sped no better than the rest, but bene demolished, had not T. Stumpes a wealthy clothier, by much suit, but with a greater piece of money, redeemed and bought it for the townesmen his neighbours, by whom it was converted to a Parish-Church, and for a great part is yet standing at this day.

Aix.

From this Maidulphs Citie, or Malmesburie, as Avon runneth, it cometh to Dante-sey, that gave name unto the possessions thereof, worshipfull Knights of old time in this tract: from whom by the Easterlings, commonly called Stradlings, it came unto the family of the Danvers. Out of which, Henry Danvers, through the favor of King James, obtained of late the title and honour of Baron Danvers of Dantesey. Sixe miles from hence, Avon taketh unto him from the East, a Brooke, which runneth through Calne, an old little towne situate upon a stony ground, having in it a faire Church to commend it: at which place when great adoe there was betwene the Monkes, and Priests about single life, a frequent Provinciaall Councell, or Synod was holden in the year of our redemption, 977. But behold, while they were debating the matter, the Convocation house, wherein the States sat, by breaking of the maine timber-work, and falling asunder of the floore, fell suddenly downe, together with the Prelates, Nobles, and Gentlemen there assembled: with the fall whereof many were hurt, and more flaine outright: onely Dunstane, President of the said Councell, and held with the Monkes, escaped without harme: which miracle (for so that age took it) is thought wonderfully to have credited the profession of Monkerie, and weakened the cause of married Priests.

From hence Avon now growne greater, Chippenhams, in Saxon Cyppanham, of note at this day for the market there kept; whereof it tooke the name: For, Cyppan, in the Saxon tongue, is as much to say as to buy, and Cyppman, a buyer, like as with us, Cheapen, and Chapman: and among the Germans, Coppman. But in those daies, it was the Kings manour: and by King Elfred in his testament, bequeathed to a younger daughter of his. Nothing is there now worth the sight but the Church, built by the Barons Hungerford, as appeareth every where by their coats of Armes set up thereon. Directly over against this, but somewhat farther from the banke, lieth Colham, now a little village, but sometime King Etheldreds mansion house, and for that the Earles of Cornwall, were wont to retire themselves, and sojourn there, it was of good account: within view whereof, is Castilecombe, an old Castle, ennobled sometimes by the Lords of it, the Walters of Dunstavill, men of great renowne in their time: out of whose house, the Writthostles Earles of Southampton are descended, * Petronilla or Parnell daughter and sole heire of the last Walter, was wedded unto Robert de Montfort, and bare unto him William his Sonne, who sold this Castle, with the rest of his lands, and possessions unto Bartholomew Badilsmer: from whom (as I have heard) it passed to the Sceopes, who ever since have held it. But now returne we unto the river: upon which are seated, Leckham, the possession of the noble family of the Bainards, where pieces of Roman money have oftentimes bene found: and Lacocke, where the most godly and religious woman, Dame Elizabeth Countesse Countesse of Salisburie (being now a widow) built a Monasterie, (like as shee did another at Hemton) in the year 1232. to the honour of the blessed Virgin Marie, and Saint Bernard, in which her selfe devoutly dedicated, both her bodie and soule to the service of God.

Avon from hence shadowed with trees, holding on his course, not far from Bromham, an inhabitation (in times past) of the Baron Samond, or truly De Sancto Amand, Saint Amand, afterward of the Baintons from them: before hee admitteth to him, little rivelet from the East, that putteth forth his head neere unto the Castle De Pies, Devizes, or the Pies. Florentius of Worcester calleth it Divisio, and Neubergum, Divise. Heretofore a stately place, I assure you, very strong as well by naturall situation, as by mans hand, but through the injurie of time, now decayed and defaced. This Castle, that it might disgrace, and put downe all other Castles in England, Roger Bishop of Salisburie (whom from a poore masse-Priest, Fortune had exalted unto the highest authoritie next the King) at his excessive charges built. But Fortune (as one saith) hath set no man so high, but she threatneth to take from him as much, as she hath permitted him to have. For, King Stephen upon a displeasure, wrung from him both this Castle, and that also of Shirburne, together with all his wealth and riches, as great as it was, yea, and brought the silly old man so low in prison, with hunger, and what with other miseries, that betweene the feare of death, and the ments of this life, he had neither will to live, nor skill to die. At which time was handled, canvased, or rather tossed to and fro, this question, whether by the Canons and Decrees of Church, Bishops might hold Castles; or if this be by indulgence tolerated, whether they ought not in dangerous and suspected times, surrender them up to the Kings hands.

Avon having received this rivelet to beare him company, maketh away westward, and straight waies another brook from the South runneth into him, which hath given name to the house standing upon it, called likewise Barons Brooke, which as it afforded habitation in old time to John Pavely, Lord of Westburie Hundred, so afterwards it gave the title of Baron, to Robert Willoughby, because by the Chemies hee derived his pedigree from Paveley, what time as King Henrie the Seventh, advanced him to the rons dignitie, as being high in his favour, Steward of his house, and appointed (by report) for a while, Admirall. Whereupon he used the Helme of a ship for a scale to his ring, like as Pompey in times past, Governour of the Roman Navie, the stern or Prow thereof in his coines. But this family fading, as it were, and dying in the warie blade, quickly came to an end. For, he left a sonne Robert Lord Brooke, who after former wife, begat Edward his sonne that died before his father, leaving a daughter married to Sir Foulke Grevil, and of a second wife two daughters, by whom a great inheritance, and rich estate, conveyed to the Marquesse of Winchester, and Lord Montjoy.

Neere unto this, Eastward lieth Edindon, in old time Eathandune, where King Alfred in as memorable a battell as any time else, most fortunately vanquished the bold, insolent, and outrageous Danes, and drave them to this hard passe, that they sworne a set forme of oath, forthwith to depart out of England. In which place also William de Edindon, Bishop of Winchester, whom King Edward highly favoured, here bome and taking his name from hence, erected a Colledge, * Bonus hominibus, Bon homes, as they called them, that is, for good men. But at the little river aforesaid, somewhat higher, standeth upon a hill Trubridge, sometimes Trupabrig, that is, a sure and trusty bridge. But for what cause this name was set upon it, it is not for certaine knowne. In great name and prosperitie it is in these daies, by reason of clothing, and sheweth the remaines of a Castle, which belongeth to the Duchie of Lancaster, and sometime of the Earle of Salisburie. Avon thus increased by this rivelet, watereth Bradford, in the foregoing times Bradansford, (so named of a broad foard) situate upon the descent or fall of an hill, and built all of stone: where Kenilwalch King of the West-Britans, embred his sword with blood in civill warre against Cuthbert his neere kinsman. Here Avon biddeth Wil-shire farewell, and entreth closely into the Countie of Somerset, minding to visit the Bathes.

The West limit of the shire goeth down directly from hence southward, by Long-leat, the dwelling place of the Thins, (descended from the Bottewills) a very fair, neat, and elegant House in a foul soil, which although once or twice it hath been burnt, hath risen eftsoones more fair. Also, by Maiden Bradely, so called of one of the inheritrices of Anaflasse Bassett, a most noble personage in his time, who being herself a Maiden infected with the Leaproe, founded an house here for Maidens that were Leapers, and endowed the same with her own Patrimony and Livetide, like as her Father before time had thereabout erected a Priory: Likewise, by Stourton, the seat of the Lords Stourton, whom King Henry the Sixth raised to this dignity, after their estate had been much bettered in lands and revenues, by marriage with the Daughter and heir of the family, Le Moigne, or Monk, of Essex, and not of Mobum, as some hitherto have been fallly persuaded: and hereupon it is, that they have borne for their Crest, A Demi-Monk, with a whip in his hand. The place took his name of the River Stour, that under this town walmeth out of six fountaines: which the Stourtons Lords of the place, have brought into their shield fables.

By Maiden Bradely aforesaid, glideth Dever-rill, a pretty small Rill so called, for that, like as Anas in Spain, and Mole in Surry, (which took their names thereupon) it divideth (as it were) under the ground, and a mile off rising up here again hasteneth toward Verlucio, a most ancient town, whereof the Emperor Antonine maketh mention in his Itinerary: which having not quite lost the name, is called, Worminster, compounded of that old name, and the English Saxon word, Worm, which signifieth, a Monastery. In times past it enjoyed great immunities and freedoms: For as we read in the Book of King William the Great, Nec geldavit, nec bidata fuit: That is, It paid no Tribute, nor was rated by the Hide. Now onely for a round Corn-market, it is exceeding much frequented: For hardly a man would believe, what a mighty deal of Corn is weekly brought hither, and quickly sold: But for remnants of Roman Antiquities, I could discover none here, onely on the East-side are seen some Trenches upon the Hills, and on the West, a natural round and high copt Hill, called Clay-hill.

Hereby beginneth, North, South, and Eastward thorow the midst of the Shire, the Plains so wide and open, that hardly a man can see from one side to another, and do limit the Horizon; whereupon they are named, The PLAINS, they are but rarely inhabited, and had in late time a bad name, for Robberies there committed. On the South-side thereof, there run quietly two most still Rivers, Willey-bourn, which Afferius nameth Gnilou and Nadder, commonly called, Adder-bourn. Willey-bourn rising at Worminster, runneth near Heitebury, or Hegtrebury an antient mansion place of the Family of Hungerford; but in the Church which hath been Collegiate, there is seen but one defaced monument of them. The last Lord Hungerford, created by King Henry the Eighth, had his denomination of this place, but enjoyed that honour a short while, being condemned of a crime not to be uttered. Hence it hieth to Willey, a Village some few miles distant over against it: a very large warlike Fence or Hold, and the same fortified with a deep, and duple Ditch: The Neighbour-dwellers call it Tanesbury-Castle. And by the form and manner of making, a man might easily know it was a Roman Camp. There are who verily think it was Vespasians Camp, considering, that he being Lieutenant of the twentieth Legion, under Claudius the Emperour, subdued unto the Roman Empire, two Nations of this tract: and they suppose, that in the name Tanesbury, there remain some reliques still of Vespasians name. Opposite to this, on the other side of the Water, is a nother lesse Camp place singly ditched called, Dun-sbat, and about one mile and a half from Tanesbury, another likewise with a single Trench, named Woldsbury. I have noted the names, as the country people term them, that other may collect some matter thereby, more than I can: as for Nadder, that springeth out of the south limit of the shire, it creepeth with crooked windings, like an Adder, (whereof it may seem to have been so called) far from Wardour, a proper fine Castle, appertaining sometime to the Progeny, named Saint Martins. But (to say nothing of many owners between, and among them of the Lord Brook, who repaired it and dyed at it) now it belongeth to Mas Arundell, who being of late by King James, created Baron Arundell of Wardour, is worthy to be with praise remembered: For, that he being a young Gentleman, he of a pious and godly mind, undertaking a journey to serve in the wars against the Turks, two enemies of Christendom, for his singular prowess shewed in the winning of Strigonium in Hungary, deserved by honourable Charter, (from Rodolph the second of that name, Emperor) to be made a Count of the Empire, Tenour of which Patent, isthus: For that he had borne himself valiantly, manfully in the field, and in assaults of Cities and Castles, and shewing good proofe of valour in forcing of the water Tower, near Strigonium, took from the Turks, with his own hands their Banner, both himself, and all and every one of his children, heirs and issue, whatsoeuer of both Sexes descending from him lawfully, either born already, or that ever shall, from generation to generation be born, we have created, made, and named, Counts and Countesses, have endowed and adorned, and with the title, honor, and dignity of a Count Imperial, Over against it lieth Hack, a place at this day of small reckoning, but which in the time of King Edward the first, had his Lord Eustach de Hack, summoned among the Peers of the Realm for a Baron, unto the high Court of Parliament. And a few miles from thence is Hinden a quick Market, and known for nothing else that I could see.

At the meeting of these two rivers, Willey giveth his name to Wilton, a place well watered, and sometime the head town of the whole Shire, which thereof took the name. In ancient times it was called Ellandunum: for so we are informed by the testimony of old parchment records, which have in expresse terms Woolsthan-Paid Ellandunum, that is to say, of Wilton: and in another place, that he founded a little Monastery at Ellandunum, that is, at Wilton. By this name Ellan, I am partly induced to think, that this is the river Alan, which Ptolomee mentioneth in this Countie of the Country. At this town it was, that in the year of our redemption 821. Egbert King of the West-Saxons, obtained a victory against Beor Wulf of Mercia, but so mortall a battel it was to both parties, that the very river flowed commixt with the blood of those, who were allied in blood, and dislevered in factions. At this town also, the year of salvation 871. Ælfred joyning battle with the Danes, had the best hand at first, but immediately the alternative fortune of war coming about, he was put to the worst, and driven to retire. In the Saxons time it flourished with the multitude of numbers of Inhabitants, and K. Edgar, as our Chronicles bear witness, beautified it with a Nunnery, whereof he made his own daughter Edith, Prioresse. But the ancient Charter of Eadgar himself, bearing date An. 874, it appeareth certainly to be of more antiquity. For therein it was thus written. *The Monastery which by King Edward my great Grandfathers Grandfather, was founded in a well frequented and populous place, that by a known name is by the Inhabitants called Wilton. And in the life of King Edward the Confessor, we read thus, While S. Edward went in hand, with the building of the Monastery of S. Peter in Westminster, Editha his wife began at Wilton, (where she was brought up) a Monastery princely built of stone in lieu of the Church made of timber following the Kings good affection with the like devotion of her own. And albeit the Dane spoiled this town most grievously in the raging heat of hostility, yet it did not so greatly to decay, untill the Bishops of Salisbury turned another way, the common passage, that lay before through it, into the West countries. For then the little and little it fell to ruin, and is now, as it were a small Village, having nothing to boast of but a Major for their head Magistrate, and in it a passing fine house, the Earls of Pembroke, raised out of the ruins of the old religious house. But though all, it was over-topped, and shadowed first by SORBIODUNUM, and then by Salisbury, that is risen out of the ruin thereof. For so Antoninus in his Itinerary, calleth that which the Saxons afterwards named; Seapýrbyr 3, and the vulgar*

Latin

Latinists Sarum, Sarisburia, & Salisburialis. Moreover, the account taken by miles of distant places from it, and the tracts remaining of the name, testifie no less, if it should say never a word. For, who would ever make doubt, that Sareshbirig proceeded from Sorbi-dunum, by addition of the Saxon word, Byrrs, which signifieth, a Burg or town, in stead of Dunum, which the Brittaines and Gauls, both used to put into places seated on higher grounds, such as this Sorbi-dunum was? In so much (as I have been told by one right skilfull in the British tongue) that Sorbi-dunum, is by interpretation, as much, as The dry hill: a conjecture surely more probable that theirs, who with much ado have derived the name from one Saron in Berolus, or from the Emperor Severus, and have named it, forsooth, Soverna. For it mounted upon a high hill, and as our Historiographer of Malmesburie saith, In stead of the Citie, there was a Castle fenced with a wall of no small bignesse, indifferently well provided otherwise of necessaries, but so scant of water, that it is good chaffer there, sold at a wonderfull price. Whereupon these verses were made of old Sorbi-dunum, by one living in those daies.

What Dunum signifieth among the Brittaines and Gauls.

*Est tibi defectus lymphæ, sed copia cretæ,
Sevis tibi ventus, sed philomela flet.*

No water there, but chalker yee have at will:

The winds there found, but nightingales be still:

By the ruines yet remaining, it seemeth to have beene a strong place sufficiently fortified, and to have contained in circuit some halfe a mile. Kimia the Saxon, after he had wonne a most fortunate Victorie of the Britains, was the first of all the Saxons that forced it, in the year 553: and Canutus the Dane about the year 1003, by setting it on fire, did much harme unto it. But it revived, when by the authority of a Synode, and the ascent of William the Conqueror, Herman Bishop of Shirburne and Sunning, translated his See hither: whose next successor Osmond built a Cathedrall Church. And King William the Conquerour, after he had taken the survey of England summoned all the States of the Kingdom hither, to sweare unto him fealtie: at which time (as it stands upon record in Domesday booke) it payd after the rate of 50. hides. * Of the third penny of Salisbury the King hath xx. shillings. ad pensum, de Cremens, xx. libras ad pondus. Which I note therefore, because in our forefathers daies, like as among the old Romans, money was wont to be paid as well by the weight as tale, but not many yeares after, in the raigne of Richard the first, partly for the infolencie and mis-rule that the garison souldiers made there, against the Church-men, and in part for want of water, the Church-men first, and then the Inhabitants began to leave it, and planted themselves in a lower ground scarce a mile off, South-East from it, where there is a receit, as it were, of many rivelets, and where Avon and Nadder meet. Of this their removing Petrus * Blesensis in his Epistles maketh mention. For, thus of old Salisburie he wrote. *A place that was, open to the winds, barraine, dry, and desert: In it stood a towre, like that of Siloam, which oppressed the townes-men with the burthen of long servitude. And againe: The Church of Sarisburie was captive in that hill. Let us therefore in Gods name goe downe to the plaine cuntry, where the vallyes will yield store of wheat and other corne, where also the large fields are rich fat in pasture. And the Poet afore-said, in verse thus:*

*Quid Domini domus in castro? nisi federis arca
In templo Baalim; carcer uterque locus.*

What is Gods house in Castle pent, but like the Arke of blisse

In Baalims temple Captivate? Each place a prison is.

And the place whereunto they descended he thus describeth:

*Est in valle locus nemori venatibus apto
Contiguus, celebræ fructibus, uber aquis.
Tale Creatoris matri, natura creata Hospitium toto quasit orbe din.*

Neere to a Parke well stor'd of game, there lies in vale, a ground,
Where corne and fruits in plentie grow, where water-streames abound.

* Of Bloys. New Sarisburie.

Such lodging long throughout the world, when nature daughter deere,
Had for Creatours mother sought, at last she found it heere.

When they were now come downe, because they would begin first with the house of God, Richard Poore the Bishop, in a most delectable place, named before Canterbury field, began to found a most stately, and beautifull Minster. Which with an exceeding high spired steeple, and double crosse yles on both sides, carrying with it a venerable shew as well of sacred hilaritie as religious majestie, was with great cost finished forty yeares after: and in the yeare of our Lord 1258. dedicated even in the presence of King Henrie the third: Whereof the said old Poet hath these pretty verses:

Regis enim virtus templo spectabitur isto.

Presulis affectus, artificumq; fides.

For why? This Church a Prelats zeale sets forth unto the sight,

The workmens trusty faithfulness, a Princes power and might.

But much more elegantly the most learned Daniel Rogers, as concerning the said Church:

Mira canam, Soles quot continet annus in una

Tam numerosa, ferunt, ad, fenestra micat.

Marmoreasq; caput suas tot ab arte columnas,

Compressas hinc quot vagus annus habet.

Totq; patent porta, quot mensibus annus abundat,

Res mira, at vera res celebrata fide.

Wonders to tell: How many daies in one whole yeare there beene,

So many windows in one Church (men say) are to be scene.

So many pillars cast by Art, of marble there appeare,

As houres doe sit and flie away throughout the running yeare.

So many gates doe entry give, as monthes one yeare doe make,

A thing well knowne for truth though most it for a wonder take.

For, the windowes as they reckon them: answer just in number to the daies, pillars great and small, to the houres of a full yeare, and the gates to the monthes. A cloister it hath beside on the South side, for largeness and fine workmanship inferior to none: whereunto joyneth the Bishops palace, a very faire and goodly house: and on the other side a high bell towre and passing strong withall, be-ding by it selfe apart from the Minster. Moreover, in short time it grew to be in goods, and endowed with so great renewes, that it still maintained a Dean, Chauncer, a Chauncellor, a Treasurer, and three and thirty Prebendaries: of whom the Residents, as they terme them, have very goodly houses also adjoyning to the Church, and all these buildings stand within the close wall severed from the Church. As the Bishop was busied about erecting of Gods house, the Citizens likewise in their parts did their best to found the Citie, they established their civill government, derived rilles and servers of waters into every street, and cast a deepe ditch all along that side, on which it is not fenced with the running river, having obtained licence of Simon the Bishop thus to strengthen and fortifie the same. And in such sort grew this new Salisbury by little an little, out of the ruines of old Sorbiadunum, that by soone as they by the Kings warrant, had turned hither the high-way, that leadeth unto the West parts, it became the second Citie in all this tract, passing well inhabited and frequented, plentifull of all things, especially of fish, adorned with a very stately market place, wherein standeth their common Hall of timber worke, a very beautifull edifice. But nothing is there, whereof it may so much boast, as of John Iewell not long since Bishop there, a wonderfull great, and deepe Divine, a most stout and en-nest maintainer of our reformed religion against the adversaries by his learned books.
Old Sorbiadunum from thence forward decayed more and more, and in the reigne of King Henrie the Seventh, became utterly desolate, so as at this day, there remaineth neth onely a towre or two of the Castle, which notwithstanding a long time after the departure of the townsmen from thence, was the dwelling house of the Earles of Salisbury: and about which in King Edward the Thirds time, there arose a memorble controversie and suite. For, Robert Bishop of Salisbury stirred William Montacute Earle of Salisbury by vertue of a proceffe which our Lawyers terme Breve de Recto, that is, A writ of right, for this Castle: and hee made answer that hee would defend his right by combat. Whereupon, at a day appointed, the Bishop brought forth his champion to the railes or bars of the Lifts, clad in a white garment reaching downe to his mid-leg: upon which he had a mandilion or cassocke garnished with the Bishops Armes: at whose heeles followed a Knight carrying a staffe, and a page with a shield: Immediately after, the Earle brought in by the hand his owne champion also, arraigned in the like apparell, accompanied with two Knights bearing white flaves.

Now when these Champions were to enter the Lifts, commanded they were to withdraw themselves aside; that their weapons of both parts might be viewed, and they searched whether they had any Amulers or Enchantments about them. But all on a suddaine, unlooked for came the Kings precept, to reprove and defer the matter to a further day, that the King might loose thereby none of his right. Meane while, they grew to this composition: That the Earle for the summe of 2500. markes paid and received, should yield up all his title and interest in the Castle, to the Bishop and his successors for ever.

This Salisbury had long agoe Earles of that name, whose pedigree I will derive somewhat farther off and more truly out of the short reports of Lacock Historie. Wil- liam Conqueror of his bounry & liberalitie, assigned unto Gualter de Evereaux Earle of Rosmar in Normandie, faire lands and large possessions in this shire, which he left unto Edward named de Sarisburia a younger sonne borne in England: like as to Wal- ter his eldest sonne, other lands in Normandie, with the Title of Earle of Rosmar: whose issue within a while after was extinct. That Edward of Sarisburie aforesaid, flourished in the twentieth yeere of the Conquerours reigne, and is often times barely named, in the Indiciarie booke of England, without the title of Earle. His sonne Walter built a little monasterie at Bradenstocke, and there in his old age tooke him to the habit of a Canon, or Regular priest, after he had first begotten his sonne Pa- tricke (the first Earle of Salisbury) upon Sibil de Cadurcis: This Patricke, I say, the first Earle, in his returne from his pilgrimage at S. James of compostella in Spain in the yeere of our Lord 1169. being slaine by one Guy of Lusigniam, left William his sonne to succcede: who died in King Richard the first his time. His onely daughter Ela, through the favour of the said King Richard, was married to William Long Espee, surnamed so of a long sword that he did usually weare, a base sonne of King Henrie
the second, and her marriage honoured him with the title of Earle, and her owne coat of Armes be Azur: adorned with sixe Lions Cenx. This William had a sonne named likewise William Long-Espee, against whom King Henrie the Third conceiving great displeasure, for that without licence obtained, he was gone to serve in the holy land, taking the crosse (as they termed it upon him) took from him both the title of Earle and also the Castle of Salisbury. But he holding still his purpose went into Egypt with S. Lewis King of France, and neere unto Damiata which the Christians had wonne, carrying a brave and valorous minde, fighting manfully among the thickest troops of his enemies died an honorable and glorious death, a little before that holy King was unfortunately taken prisoner. His sonne named likewise William, lived without the title of Earle, and begat one onely daughter Margaret, who nevertheless being reputed Countesse of Salisbury, became the wife of Henry Lucy Earle of Lincoln, unto whom the bare one only daughter Alice wedded to Thomas Earle of Lancaster: Who being attainted, King Edward the Second seized upon those possessions, which he had granted and demised unto her husband: out of which King Edward the Third gave way unto William Montacute, Trowbrid, Winterbourne, Am- hurst, and other Lordships in these words: So fully and wholly as the Progenitours of Margaret Countesse of Salisbury at any time held the same. And even then, hee preferred the said William Montacute to be Earle of Salisbury, and by the cincture of a sword invested him in the said Earledome. This William became Lord of the Isle of Mann, and begat two sonnes, William who succeeded in his Fathers honour, and died without issue having unhappily slain his onely sonne while he trained him at Tilting: and John a Knight, who died before his brother, leaving behind him a sonne named John Earle of Salisbury, whom hee had by Margaret daughter and heire of Thomas Mont-Hermer; who being of an unconstant and changeable nature, and plotting the destruction of King Henrie the Fourth, was in the year of our Lord 1400. killed at Chichester, and attainted afterwards of high treason. Howbeit, his sonne Thomas was fully restored, a man worthy to be ranged with the bravest Captaines and Commanders, whether you respect paines taking in his affaires, industrie in action, or expedition in dispatch, who lying at the siege before Orleanse in France, was with a bullet levelled out of a great piece of Ordnance wounded in the year 1428. and thereof died. Alice his onely daughter, being wedded unto Richard Nevill, augmented his honour with the title of Earle of Salisbury, who siding with the house of Yorke, was in the battell fought at Wakefield, taken prisoner and beheaded: leaving to succcede him Richard his sonne, Earle of Warwick and Salisbury; who delighting in dangers and troubles enwrapped his native countrey within new broiles of Civill warre, wherein himselfe also left his life. The one of his daughters named Isabell was married unto George Duke of Clarence, brother to King Edward the Fourth, and shee bare him a sonne called Edward Earle of Warwick who being a very child and innocent, was by King Henrie the Seventh beheaded like as his sister Margaret, suffered the same death under King Henrie the Eighth. An usual policie and practise among suspicious Princes: For the securitie of their own person and their posteritie, by one occasion or other, that evermore are soone offered and quickly pickt, to make away or keepe under the next of their blood. Anne, the other daughter of Richard Nevill Earle of Warwick and Salisbury, became wife to Richard Duke of Gloucester, brother to King Edward the Fourth, and brought him a sonne, whom his uncle King Edward in the 17. of his reigne created Earle of Salisbury, and Richard his father usurping the kingdome made Prince of Wales. But hee parted this life in his tender yeares, about that time that his mother also died, without suspicion of poison. King Henry the Eighth afterward, about the fifth year of his raigne in a full Parliament restored and enabled in blood Margaret daughter to George Duke of Clarence to the name, stile, title, honour, and dignitie of Countesse of Salisbury, as sister and heire to Edward late Earle of Warwick and Salisbury. And about the 31. year of the said King, she was attainted in Parliament with divers others, and beheaded when she was 70. yeares old. Since which time that title of honour was discontinued untill in the year of our Lord 1603. our Sovereigne Lord King James honored therewith S. Robert Cecil second sonne of that Nestor of ours, William Cecil: upon whom for his singular wisdome, great employments in the affaires of State to the good of Prince and Countrey, he had bestowed the honorable titles of Baron Cecil of Essendon, and Vicount Cranburn. Thus much of the Earls of Salisbury.

Lower still, and not far from this Citie, is scituate upon Avon, Dunstons or Danton, a burrough (as they say) of great antiquitie, and well knowne by reason of the house therein of Beavois of Southampton, whom the people have enrolled in the number of their brave worthies for his valour commended so much in rhymet posteritie.

This Salisbury is environed round about with open fields and plaines, unlesse it be Eastward, where lieth hard unto it Clarindon, a very large and goodly parke, passing fit for the keeping and feeding of wild beafts, and adorned in times past with an house of the Kings. Of which parke, and of the twentie groves inclosed therein Master Michael Maschert Doctor of the Civill lawes, hath prettily verified in this wise.

Part. 2. Henr. 6.
1461.

A famous Park for Stag and hind, near Salisbury doth lie,
The name it hath of one fair down or hill, that mounts on high:
Within the same stand twenty groves enclosed with severall bound:
Of which, in compasse every one a mile contains in ground.

Famous is this Clarindon, for that here in the year 1164. was made a certain recognition and record of the customs and liberties of the Kings of England, before the Prelats, and Peers of the Kingdom, for the avoiding dissensions between the Clergy, Judges and Barons of the Realm, which were called The Constitutions of Clarindon. Of the which so many as the Pope approved have been set down in the Tomes of the Councils, the rest omitted; Albeit Thomas Becket then Archbishop of Canturburie, and the rest of the Bishops approved them all. Hereby is Ivy Church sometime a smal Priory, where, as a tradition runneth, in our grandfathers remembrance was found a grave, and therein a corps of twelve foot, and not far off a stock of wood hollowed, and the concave lined with lead with a Book therein of very thick parchment, all written with capital Roman letters. But it had lien so long that, when the leavs where touched, they fouldred to dust. S. Thomas Eliot who saw it, judged it to be an History. No doubt he that so carefully laid it up, hoped it should be found, and discover some things memorable to posterity.

Toward the North, about six miles from Salisbury, in this plain before named, is to be seen a huge and monstrous piece of work, such as Cicero termeth Insanabilem Substructionem. For, within the circuit of a Ditch, there are erected in manner of a Crown in three ranks or courses one within another certain mighty and unwrought stones, whereof some are 28. foot high, and seven foot broad, upon the heads of which, others like overthwart peeces do bear and rest crossewise, with a small tenets, and mortecis, so as the whole frame seemeth to hang: whereof we call it Stonehenge, like as our old Historians termed for the greatnesse Chorea Gigantum; The Giants Dance. The description, or draught whereof such as it is, because it could not so fitly be expressed in words, I have caused by the gravers help to be portraied here underneath, as it now standeth weather beaten and decayed.

- A. Stones called Corsestones, Weighing 12. tunne, carrying in height 24. foot; in breadth, 7. foot; in compasse, 16.
 B. Stones, named Cronetts, of 6. or 7. tunne weight.
 C. A place, where mens bones are digged up.

Our countrie-men reckon this for one of our wonders and miracles. And much they marvaile: from whence such huge stones were brought, considering that in all those quarters bordering thereupon, there is hardly to be found any common stone at all for building: as also by what meanes they were set up. For mine owne part, about these points I am not curiously to argue and dispute, but rather to lament with much griefe that the Authors of so notable a monument are thus buried in oblivion. Yet some there are, that thinke them to bee no naturall stones hewne out of the rocke, but artificially made of pure sand, and by some glewie and unctuous matter knit and incorporate together, like as those ancient Trophies or monuments of victorie which I have seene in Yorkshire. And what marvaile? Read we not, I pray you, in Plinie, that the sand or dust of * Puteoli being covered over with water, becommeth forthwith a very stone: that the cesterne in Rome of sand digged out of the ground, and the strongest kind of lime wrought together grow so hard, that they seeme stones indeed: and that Statues and images of marble chippings, and small grit grow together so compact and firme, that they are deemed entire and solid marble: The common saying is, that Ambrosius Aurelianus, or his brother Vther did reare them up by the art of Merlin that great * Mathematician, in memorie of those Brittaines who by the treachery of Saxons were there slaine at a parley. Whereupon Alexander Neckam, a Poet of no great antiquitie, in a poeticall fit, but with no speciall grace, and favour of Apollo, having his instructions out of Geffreys British historie, come out of these verses:

* Made Stones.

* Puzzote.

* Magician.
* Mathematici.

Nobilis est lapidum structura, Chorea Gigantum,

The Giants Daunce, a famous stone-work stands,
 Art did her best in bringing it to passe,
 Vaine prating fame, reports by Merlins hands
 In manner strange this worke effected was.

The stones (men say) in their land first did lie,
 * Whence * Cranes in flocks so many use to flie.
 From thence conveyed, as things of charie price,
 The Irish soile received them with joy.
 For why? their vertue in a wondrous wise,
 Oft cures the griefe that dorth sicke folke annoy,
 For, waters cast and sprinkled on these stones,
 Their vertue take, and heale the grieved ones.

Returning

Returning thence, where he by martiall might Had quell'd his foes in battell fiercely fought.

O worthy Wights, how many on that plaine,
Of you lie dead by Hengists treason slaine!

The Britans brave, that race of noble blood,
Entrap't by little heed and too much trust,
Were kild alas, in parley as they stood,

Through faithlesse fraud of enemies unjust.

But Eldol Earle his manhood excellent
Then shewed, to death who severie persons sent.

Others say, that the Britaines erected this for a stately Sepulchre of the same Ambrose in the very place where hee was slaine by his enemies sword: that hee might have of his countries cost such a piece of worke, and tombe set over him as should for ever be permanent, as the Alar of his vertue and manhood. True it is, that many bones have many times beene digged up heere, and the village lying now on one side, is called Ambresbury, that is to say, Ambrose his towne: where, certaine ancient Kings, by the report of the British Historie, lay interred. And the booke called Eulogium saith, that a Monasterie stood there of three hundred Monkes: which, King Gurmundus (I wot not what Pagan and Barbarian) spoiled and rifled. In that place afterward Alfritha King Edgar his wife, by repentance and some good deed, to expiate, and make satisfaction for murdering of King Edward her sonne in Law, built a stately Nunnerie, and endowed it with livings: In which Queene Eleanor King Henric the Thirds widdow, renouncing all royall pompe, and princely state, devoted her selfe unto God among other holy Nuns. The said Ambrose Aurelianus, who gave name unto the place, when the Romane Empire drew now to an end, tooke upon him the Imperiall purple Roabe in Britaine, (as saith Paulus Diaconus) succoured his decaying countrey, and the aide of that warlike Arthur repressed the violent rage of the enemies, overthrew puissant armies, consisting of the most courageous Nations of Germany, and at the last in a battell fought upon this Plaine, lost his life in the defence of his countrey. Now, seeing both Gildas, and Bede do write, that his Parents wore the purple Roabe, and were slaine, why may not I suppose him to be descended of that Constantine, who in the Fourth Consulship of Theodosius the younger, was elected Emperour heere in Britaine in hope of his luckie name, and afterwards slaine at Arles. I have heard that in the time of King Henric the Eighth, there was found neere this place a table of mettall, as it had beene tinne and lead commixt, inscribed with many letters, but in so strange a Character, that neither Sir Thomas Eliot, nor master Lilye Schoole-master of Pauls, could read it, and therefore neglected it. Had it beene preserved, somewhat happily might have beene discovered as concerning Stonehenge, which now lieth obscured.

Scarce foure miles from Ambresbury, (on this side Avon) there is a Warren of hares, commonly called Everlie Warren, where there is great increase of hares for Gentlemen in the countrey there dwelling, to disport themselves with game: yet not such store as that the neighbour Inhabitants should require the helpe of souldiers in their defence against them, as the men of the Iles Baleares sometime did, by Plinius relation: albeit, they did likewise much harme heere unto the Corne fields: and neere neighbour unto it is Lusgershall, where stood sometimes (as I read) the Castle of Geffrey Fitz-Peter, Lord chiefe Justice of England in his time, and Earle of Essex, a man of exceeding great wealth. Not much higher is Wolfsall, which was the house of the Noble Familie of Seimor, now Earle of Hertford, or of Saint Maur, to whom by marriage accrewed a great inheritance of the Essexmies in this tract, who bare argent three Demy-Lions Gules: and from the time of King Henric the Second, were by right of inheritance, the Bailiffs and Guardians of the Forrest of Savenac lying hard by, which is of great name for plenty of good game, and for a kind of Ferne there, that yieldeth a most pleasant savour. In remembrance whereof, their Hunters borne of a mightie bignesse, and tipped with silver,

More somewhat into the East, the River Cunetio, in the Saxon tongue Cynetan, commonly Kenet, ariseth neere unto a little Village of the same name, which some would have to be that Cynetio mentioned by Antoninus: but the distance of both sides gain-saith it. Heere Selburie a round hill mounteth up aloft, to a great height, which by the forme of the hill it selfe, and the outward setting of the earth beneath, may seeme to have beene cast up by mans hand. And many of that sort, round and with sharpe tops are to be seen in this tract: Burrowes they call them

Kenet River.

B and Barrowes, raised, happily in memoriall of Souldiers there slaine. For bones are found in them, and read I have, how an usuall thing it was with the Northerne nations, that every souldier remaining alive after a foughten field, should carry his head-piece full of earth toward the making of their fellowes tombes that were slaine. Although I am of opinion rather, that this of Selburie, was set there in stead of a limit, if not by the Romans, then certainly by the Saxons: Like as that fosse called Woden'sdike, considering that betwene the Mercians and the West-Saxons there was much bickering in this Shire many a time, about their Marches: and both * Boetius and the * Grammaticall Writers have made mention of such Mounts raised for bounds. Within one mile of Selburie, is Aiburie, an up-landish

C village built in an old Campe as it seemeth, but of no large compasse, for it is environed with a faire trench, and hath foure gappes as gates, in two of the which stand huge Stones as jambs, but so rude, that they seeme rather naturall than artificiall, of which sort, there are some other in the said village. This River Kenet runneth at the first Eastward, through certaine open fields, out of which there stand up aloft every where stones like rockes, and off them a little village there is, called, Rockley: among which there breaketh out sometimes at unawares water in manner of a streame or sudden Land-flood, reputed the messenger, as it were, and forerunner of adearth, and is by the rusticall people of the countrey, called Hunger-borne. From hence * Kenet holdeth on his course to a towne bearing his name, called of Antoninus

Rockley.

D Cynetio, and is placed from Verlucio twenty miles. At which distance just, from thence, that ancient towne called by a new name Marleborow, in old time Marlberge, standeth upon this river * Cunetio, now Kenet, stretching out East and West on the pendant of an hill. Whether this name Marleborow came in latter ages of Marga, which in our language we call Marle, and use in stead of dung to manure our grounds, I am not ready to affirme. Certes, it lieth neere a chaulkey hill, which our Ancestours before they borrowed this name Chaulke of the Latine word Calx, named Marle. But the Etymologie thereof, that Alexander Necham in his Booke of divine wisdom hath coined and drawne from Merlins Tombe (as appeareth by this Distichon of his making) is ridiculous.

* Famis vion-lu. * Kenet, Cunetio, a towne. Marleborow. * Kenet.

The fatall end of this towne Cunetio, and the name together, and the estate thereof with the ancient memorie also, from the coming in of the Saxons unto the Normans time, is utterly vanished and gone: for, in all this space betwene, our histories doe not so much as once name it. But in the age next ensuing, we read, that John * surnamed Sine terra, that is, Without Land, (who afterwards was King of England) had a Castle heere, which when hee revolted from his brother King Richard the First, Hubert Archbishop of Canterburie, tooke by force:

and which afterwards was most famous by reason of a Parliament there holden, wherein by a generall consent of the States of the Kingdome there assembled, a law passed for the appeasing of all tumults, commonly called, the Statute of M. arleborow. But now being daunted by time, there remaineth an heape of rammell and rubbish, witnessing the ruines thereof, and some few reliques of the walles remaine within the compasse of a drie ditch, and an Inne there is adjoining thereto, which in stead of the Castle, hath the signe of a Castle hanging out at it: The Inhabitants of the place, have nothing to make greater shew of, than in the Church of Presbut hard by, of a Christning Font, as it seemeth, of Touchstone, or of Obsidian stone, in which (by their report certaine Princes (I wot not who) were in times past baptized, and made Christians. Neither verily can I conceale that which I have read, that every Burger heere admitted, is by an old order and custome among them, to present unto the Major, a brace of hounds for the hare, a couple of white Capons, and a white Bull.

On the same River, and the same side thereof, is seated Ramsburie, a prettie village, having nothing now to commend it but pleasant meadowes about it, howsoever in old time famous it was for the Bishops See there, who had this Shire for their Diocese: but that seate being by Herman the Eighth Bishop, laid unto that of Shirburne, and at length (as I said before) translated to Salisburie, carried away with it all the name and reputation of this place, because at Ramesburie, there was never any Covent of Clerkes, nor ought for their maintenance. From the other side of the River more Eastward, Littlecot sheweth it selfe not long since a seate of the Darels, a place worthy to be remembered, for the late Lord thereof Sir Iohn Popham, who being the chiefe Iudge in the Kings Bench executed justice, (as I have said already) against malefactors, to his high praise and commendation. And heereby runneth the limit betweene this Shire, and Berkshire.

Thus farre forth have we taken a slight view and survey of Wilshire, which (as wee find in the Domesday booke, and worth the noting it is) paid unto the King tenne pounds for an Hawke, twentie shillings * for a strong Steed, for every one hundred shillings, and five ores: now what kind a piece of money, and of what kind that Ore was, I wot not; but out of a Register of Burton Monastrie, I have observed thus much, that twentie Ores, are worth two Markes of silver.

Earles of Wilshire.

This province can reckon out of divers and sundry houses, but few Earles, besides those of Salisburie, whom I have named before: for to omit Woolstun before the Normans Conquest, it had none to my knowledge, unto King Richard the Second his daies, who preferred William le Scrope to that one honour. But this mans good fortunes stood and fell together with his Prince. For, when the one was deposed, the other lost his head. After whom, within short time succeeded James Butler Earle of Ormund, advanced to that dignitie by King Henrie the Sixth. Howbeit, when the Lancastrians were downe the wind, and hee was attainted, his estate forfeited, and Iohn Stafford a younger sonne of Humfrey Duke of Buckingham, by the favour of King Edward the Fourth received this title, whose sonne Edward succeeded him, and died without issue. The same honour afterwards King Henrie the Eighth, bestowed upon Henrie Stafford of the same house of Buckingham, who having enjoyed it a little while, departed likewise, and left no children behind him. In the end, the favour of the said King brought it into the family of the Bullens: for Thomas Bullen Vicount Rochford, Sonne to one of the Daughters and coheires of Thomas Butler Earle of Ormund, hee created Earle of Wilshire: whose Daughter Anne, the King tooke to wife: A marriage this was to her selfe, and her brother unhappie and deadly, to her Parents wofull, but for all England right happy. For it brought forth to us

Queene Elizabeth.

Queene Elizabeth, a most gracious and excellent Prince, worthy of superlative praise praise, for her most wise and politique government of the Common-wealth, and for her heroicke vertues farre above that sexe. But when the said Thomas Bullen, overcome with the griefe and sorrow that hee tooke for the infortunate fall, and death of his children, he ended his daies without issue: this title lay still, untill that King Edward the Sixth, conferred it upon William Powlet Lord Saint Iohn, whom soone after hee made Marquesse of Winchester, and Lord Treasurer of England, in whose family it remaineth at this day.

HANTSHIRE.

HANTSHIRE.

Ext to Willshire is that Country which sometimes the Saxons called hantſcherchſſp, and is now commonly named Hantshire: of which, one part that beareth farther within the land, belonged, no doubt, to the Belge, the other which lieth upon the sea appertained, without question, to the Regni, an ancient people of Britaine. On the West it hath Dorsetshire, and Willshire, on the South the Ocean to bound it: on the East it joineth to Suffex, and Surrie, and on the North it bordereth upon Barkshire. A small prvince it is, fruitfull in corne, furnished in some places with pleasant woods standing thicke, and well growne; rich in plenteous pasture, and for all commodities of sermost wealthy, and happie. It is thought that it was with the first brought under subjection to the Romans. For, our Histories report, that Vespasian subdued it, and very probable reasons there are inducing us to beleeve the same. For, Dionysius witnesseth, that Plautius, and Vespasian, when they were sent by the Emperour Claudius against the Britaines, did give the attempt upon this Island, with an armed divided into three parts, least if they should have ventured to land in one place onely they might have bene driven backe from the shore. Suetonius also writeth, that in this expedition Vespasian fought thirtie battailes with the enemy, and subdued the Isle of Wight which lieth against this country, and two other right puissant nations within. For which his victories, as also for passing over the Ocean so safely. Valerius Flaccus speaketh unto Vespasian himselfe, as one more fortunate than Iulius Caesar, in this manner.

*Tuq, O Pelagi cui major aperti
Fama, Caledonius post quam tua Carbaso vexit
Oceanus, Phrygius prius indignatus Iulos.*

And thou for Seas discoverie whose fame did more appeare, Since that thy ships with sailes full spread in Northren Ocean were,
Which skorn'd before, of Phrygian line the Julii to beare.

And of the very same Vespasian, Appolinus Collatius Novariensis, the Poet versified thus:

Ille quidem nuper felici Marte Critannos Fuderat.

He verily of late by happy sight.
Had won the field, and Britains put to flight.

But how in this war Titus delivered Vespasian his father, when he was very streightly besieged by the Britans: and how at the same time likewise, an adder grasped him about, and yet never hurt him, (which he tooke as a lucky foretoken of his Empire) you may learne out of Dio and Forcatulus. I, for my part, (to come to my purpose) beginning at the West side of this province will make my preambulation along the sea-coast, and the rivers that runne into the Ocean, and after that survey the more in-land parts thereof.

Hard by the Westerne bounds the river Avon carrieth a still streame, and no sooner runneth into this shire, but it meeteth with the foard of Cerdicus, in old time Cerdicks-foard, afterward Cerdefoard, and now by contraction of the word, Chardfoard, so named of Cerdic that Warlike English-Saxon. For, heere the said Cerdic in a sea-battle so daunted the Britaines, that not onely he enlarged the bounds of his Empire, but also delivered an easie warre unto his posteritie: having before time in the year of our Salvation 508. after great conflicts in this tract, vanquished the most mightie King of the Britaines, Natanleod, called also Nazaleod by others, with many of his people. Of whose name likewise, a small region reaching unto this place was termed Natanleod, as we read in the Annales of the English Saxons: which I sought very curiously for, but hitherto could not find so much as any small signe or sample of that name: neither can I guesse who that Natanleod should be. But most certaine it is, that Aurelius Ambrose, at the very same time skirmished otherwhiles with the Saxons in this tract with alternative fortune: and those Chronicles of the English Saxons no where made mention of him; as who, (a thing that I have observed) being overmuch affectionate to themselves, reported onely their owne fortunate battailes, and victories, but never made words of their foiles and overthrowes. From thence the said river runneth on by Regnewood or Ringwood, called in the Domesday booke of England Rincewood. Which, that it was the same REGNUM, the chiefe towne of the Regni wherof Antoninus maketh mention, the account of the distance from other places, the remaines of the name and the very signification thereof doe plainly prove. For, Ring-wed by that Saxon addition seemeth to signifie the Wood of the Regni. A towne in ancient time of great fame, as may bee gathered by the Hundred adjoyning, which is named thereof: but now it is a well frequented mercate towne and no better: Aven being departed from hence, entertaineth the river Stoure comming downe out of Dorset shire, where betweene the meeting of these two streames, there standeth a pretty towne of trade and well peopled. At this day of a Church there dedicated unto Christ, named Christ-Church: but in old time Twinamburne, because it is situate betweene the two rivers, right in the same sense that Interamna in Italie hath his name. It was fortified in times past with a Castle, and beautified with an ancient Church of Prebendaries, which being built in the Saxons time and after repaired by Raulph Flammard Bishop of Durham (who was Deane there) in the raigne of William Rufus, and by Richard de Ripariis Earle of Devonshire (whom King Henry the First enfeoffed in this place) endowed also with great rents and revenues, continued in very great name untill the daies of King Henric the Eighth, and that fatall and finall houre of the Monasteries of England, Under this towne Stoure and Aven joyning together doe emprise themselves into the sea at one mouth, which Ptolomee called the mouth of the River Alaun; and rightly too: For I cannot resolve with my selfe to thinke, that that river properly was named Aven, considering this is a common name, and the Britaines by that terme, called all rivers. But I would take it, that some time it was called Alaun, because there remaine yet some reliques (as it were) of that name in the villages upon it; to wit, in Allington, Allingham, &c.

Christ-church.

Along the East banke of this river in this Shire, King William of Normandie pulled downe all the townes, villages, houses, and Churches farre and neere, cast out the poore Inhabitants, and when he had so done brought all within thirty miles compasse or there about into a Forrest and harbour for wild beasts, which the Englishmen in those daies termed Ytene, and we now call New Forrest. Of which Act of his, Gwalter Map who lived immediately after, wrote thus. The Conquerour tooke away land both from God and men, to dedicate the same unto wild beasts, and Dogs-games: in which space he threw downe sixe and thirtie Mother-Churches, and drove all the people thereto belonging quite away. And this did he, either that the Normans might have safer and more secure arrivall in England, (for it lieth over against Normandie) in case after that all his wars were thought ended, any new dangerous tempest should arise in this Island against him: or for the pleasure which he tooke in hunting: or else to scrape and rape money to himselfe by what meanes soever he could: For, being better affected and more favourable to beasts than to men, he imposed verie heaveie fines and penalties, yea and other more grievous punishments, upon those that should meddle with his game. But Gods just judgement not long after followed this so unreasonable and cruell act of the King. For, Richard his second sonne, and William Rufus King of England, another sonne of his, perished both in this Forrest: William by chance shot through with an arrow by Walter Tirell; the other blasted with a pestilent aire. Henric likewise his Grand-child by Robert his eldest sonne, whiles hee hotely pursued his game in this Chase was hanged amongst the boughes and so died: that wee may learne thereby. How even childrens children beare the punishment of their Fathers. There goe commonly abroad certaine verses, that Iohn White Bishop of Winchester made of this Forrest: Which although they falsly make William Rufus to have ordained the same, yet because they are well liked of many, I am likewise well content heere to set them downe.

*Templa adimit Divis, for a civibus, arva colonis
Rufus, & instituit Beaulensi in rure forestam:
Rex ceruini insequitur, Regem vindicta, Tirellus Non bene provisum transfixit acumine ferri.*

From God and Saint King Rus did Churches take,
From Citizens town-court, and mercate place,
From Farmer lands: New Forrest for to make,
In Beaulew tract, where whiles the King in chase
Pursues the Hart, just vengeance comes apace,
And King pursues. Tirrell him seeing not,
Unawares him slew with dint of arrow shot.

He calleth it Beaulwy tract, for that King Iohn built hard by, a pretty Monastery, for the pleasant situation called Beaulieu, which continued ever unto our Fathers memory, of great fame as being an unviolated sanctuary and a safe refuge for all that fled to it: in so much that in times past, our people heere thought it unlawfull, and a heinous offence by force to take from thence any persons whatsoever, were they thought never so wicked murderers or traitours: so that our Ancestors when they erected such Sanctuaries, or Temples (as they terme them) of Mercie, every where throughout England, seemed rather to have propoed unto themselves Romulus to imitate than Moses: who commanded that wilfull murderers should bee plucked from the Altar and put to death: and for them onely appointed Sanctuaries, wholly meere chance had killed any man.

But least the sea coast, for so long a tract as that Forrest is heere, should lie without defence all open and exposed to the enemy, King Henrie the Eighth began to strengthen it with forts, for, in that foreland or promontorie shooting farre into the sea: From whence we have the shortest cut into the Isle of Wight. hee built Hurst Castle, which commandeth sea ward every way. And more toward the East hee set up also another fortresse or blockhouse, they name it Calshot Castle for Calshot, to defend the entrie of Southampton Haven, as more inwardly on the other are the two Castles of S. Andrew, and Nesly. For, heere the shores retiring as it were themselves a great way backe into the land, and the Isle of Wight also; butting full upon it doe make a very good harbour, which Ptolomee calleth The mouth of the river Trisanton, (as I take it) for Traish Anton: that is, Anton Bay. For Ninnius an old writer giveth it almost the same name when he termeth it Trahannon mouth. As for the river running into it, at this day is called Test, it was in the foregoing age (as wee read in the Saints lives) named Terstan, and in old time Ant, or Anton: as the towne standing upon it, namely Ant port, Andover and Hanton in some sort doe testifie.

So farre am I of (pardon me) from thinking that it tooke the name of one Hammon Roman, (a name not used among Romans) who should be there slaine. And yet Goffrey of Monmouth telleth such a tale, and a Poet likewise his follower who prettily maketh these verses of Hammon.

*Ruit hic, illucque ruentem
Occupat Arviragus, ejusque in margine ripa
Amputat ense caput, nomen tenet inde perempti Hammonis Portus, longumque tenebit in avum.*

While Hammon rusheth here and there within the thickest ranke, Arviragus encountreth him, and on the rivers banke,
With sword in hand strikes off his head: the place of him thus slaine, Thence forth is named Hamons Haven, and long shall so remaine.

But upon this Haven standeth South-hampton, a little Citie, neere unto which on the North-east, there flourished in old time another of that name: which may seeme to be Antonine his CLAVSBNTVM, by the distance of it; as well on the one side from Ringwood, as from Venta on the other. And as Trisanton in the British language signifieth the Bay of Anton, so Clavsentum in the same tongue, is as much as the Haven of Entum. For, I have heard, that Clavdb among the Britans, is that which the Græcians call κλεινὸν, that is, a forced Haven made by digging and casting up the earth. Now, that this place was called Hanton, and Henton, no man needs to doubt, seeing in that booke wherein King William the first made a survey of all England, this whole shire is expressly named Hantsyre and in some places Hentsyre, and the very towne it selfe for the South situation of it, South hanton. What manner of towne that Clavsentum was, it is hard to say: but seated it was in that place, where the field is which now they call S. Maries; and reached even to the Haven: and may seeme also to have taken up the other banke or strand of the river: For, a little above at Bittern over against it, Francis Mills a right honest gentleman there dwelling, shewed unto me the rubbish, old broken walls, and trenches of an ancient castle, which carrieth halfe a mile in compasse, and at every tide is compassed for three parts of it with water a great breadth. The Romañe Emperors ancient coines now and then there digged up, doe so evidently prove the antiquity thereof, that if it were not the Castle of old Clavsentum, you would judge it to be one of those forts or fences which the Romans planted upon the South coast of the Ocean, to repress, as Gildas writeth, the piracies and depredations of the Saxons. When all became wasted, by the Danish warres, old Hanton also was left as a prey in the yeere of our Lord 980. to be sacked and rifled by them: and King William the Conqueror in his time had in it but fourescore men and no more in his demaine. But above 200. yeeres since when Edward the Third King of England and Philip Valois, buisted for the very Kingdom of France, it was fired by the French and burnt to the ground. Out of the ashes whereof, presently sprung the towne which now is to be seene, but situate in a more commodious place betweene two rivers: for number of houses and those faire built much renowned, for rich Inhabitants & concourse of merchants wealthy: fenced round about with a double ditch, strong wals, and turrets standing thicke betwene: and for defence of the Haven a right strong Castle it hath of square stone, upon a Mount cast up to a great height, built by King Richard the Second. And afterward King Henrie the Sixt granted to the Major, Balives and Burgeses that it should be a Countie by it selfe, with other liberties. Memorable is that of the most puissant Canutus King of England and of Denmarke, by which he in this place represented a flatterer who bare the King in hand that all things in the Realme were at his will and command. He commanded (saith Henrie of Huntingdon) that his chaire should be set on the shore, when the sea began to flow. And then in the presence of many, said he to the sea as it flowed. Thou art part of my Dominion, and the ground on which I sit is mine, neither was there ever any that durst disobey my commandement and went away free and unpunished. Wherefore, I charge thee, that thou come not upon my land, neither that thou wet the clothes or body of thy Lord. But the sea according to his usuall course flowing still, without any reverence of his person wet his feet. Then he retiring backe said. Let all the Inhabitants of the world know, that vaine and frivolous is the power of Kings, and that none is worthy the name of King, but hee, to whose command the heaven earth and sea by bond of an everlasting law are subject and obedient, and never after that time set hee the crowne upon his head, &c.

Of these two rivers, betweene which this South-anton standeth, that in the West now called Test, and in times past Anton, (as I suppose) springing out of the Forrest of Chate, goeth first to Andover, which in the Saxon language is Anoeapapan, that is, The passage or Ferry over And: where in the yeare of our salvation 893. Aethelred King of England, when the Danes harried and spoiled his Kingdom on every side, to the end that hee might at length refresh and cherish his weakened and wearied countries with sure and quiet peace, inserted into his owne familie by way of adoption Aulaf the Dane: which not withstanding soone after tooke small or none effect:

* Regesti.

For, this great honour done to the barbabrous Dane, could not reclaime and stay his minde, from rapine and spoyling still. From thence it runneth downe and reacheth from the East a brooke passing by Bullington, in whose parish is a place called Tibury hill, and containeth a square field by estimation of ten acres ditched about, in some places deeper than other, wherewith hath beene found tokens of Wells, and above which the ploughmen have found squared stones, and Roman coines, as they report, for the place I have not scene. This brooke entrench into Test neere Wormehill, whence Queene Aelfrith built a Monasterie to expiate and make satisfaction for that most foule and heinous fact, wherewith so wickedly she had charged her soule by making away King Edward her husbands son: as also to wash out the murdering of her former husband Aethelwold a most noble Earle, whom King Edgar trained forth hither a hunting, and then strake him through with a dart, because hee had deluded him in his love secrets, and by deceitfull and naughtie means prevented him and gotten for himself this same Aelfrith the most beautifull Lady that was in those daies. After this Test having taken into it a little river from Wallop, or more truly Well-hop, that is, by interpretation out of our forefathers ancient language, A pretty well in the side of a hill, whereof that right worshipfull familie of the Wallops of Knights degree dwelling by, tooke name: seeketh for BRIGE or BRAGE, an ancient towne likewise placed by Antonine nine miles from Sarbiadunum: at which distance betweene Salisbury and Winchester he findeth not farre from his banke, Broughton a small country towne: which if it were not that BRAGE, I verily believe it was then utterly destroyed when William of Normandie laid all even with the ground heere abouts to make that forest, before mentioned. Then goeth this river to see Rumsey, in Saxon speech Rum-reg. A nunnery founded by King Edgar, the large Church whereof yet standeth; out of the which Mary daughter of King Stephen being there Abbess, and his only daughter surviving, was conveyed secretly by Mathew of Alsace sonne to the Earle of Haders, and to him married. But after she had borne to him two daughters, was ordered by sentence of the Church to returne hither again according to her vow. Thence glideth this water straight into Anton Haven, at Arundinis Vadum, as Bede called it, and interpreteth it himselfe Reedford: but now of the bridge where the fount was named, for Redeford, Sedbridge: where, at the first springing up of the English Saxon Church, there flourished a Monasterie, the Abbat whereof Cymbresh, as Bede writeth, baptized the two brethren being very little ones of Arundanus the pettie King of Wight, even as they were ready to be put to death. For, when Cedwalla the Saxon set upon the Isle of Wight, these small children to save their lives fled to a little town called Ad lapidem, and hid themselves there, untill at length being betrayed, they were at Cedwalla's commandement killed. If you aske mee, what this little town Ad lapidem, should bee, I would say it were Stoneham, a small village next to Redbridge, which the very signification of the name may evidently prove for mee. The other river that runneth forth at the East-side of Southampton, may seeme to have beene called Alre: For, the mercate towne standing upon the banke thereof, not farre from ponds out of which it issueth, is called Alresford, that is, The fount of Alre. This towne, (to use the words of an old Record of Winchester): Kingdom the religious King instructed in the Sacraments of faith by the Bishop Birinus at the very beginning of Christian religion (in this tract,) with great devotion of heart gave unto the Church of God at Wema. In the year of grace 1220. Godfrey Lucy Bishop of Winchester made a new market place heere, and called it Novum forum, that is, New market, in regard haply of old Alresford adjoyning thereto. But this new aime continued not long with the people, who in the matter of speech carry the greatest stroke. Neere hereunto is Tichburne, which I must not omit, for that it hath given name to a worshipfull and ancient familie.

Upon the West banke of this river is situate the most famous Citie of the British Belgians, called by Ptolomee and Antoninus Venta Belgarum, by the Britaines of Wales even at this day, Caer Gwent: by the Saxons in old time Winvancea, &c. in Latine commonly Wintonia, and by us in these daies of Winchester. Yet there be some which affirme this to be Venta Simenorum, and do grace Bristow, with the name of Venta Belgarum. But that there were never any Simeni at all in this Island, I will prove when I come to the Iseni. In the meane season, though they should seeke all the townes that Antoninus placeth on every side in the way to, or from Venta Belgarum, as narrowly as Emmors paths, yet shall they find nothing for their purpose to make good this their assertion.

The Eymologie of this name Venta, some fetch from Ventus, that is, Wind, others from Vinum, that is, Wine, and some againe from Wina a Bishop: who all of them be farre wide, and should doe well to pray for better judgement. Yet like I rather the opinion of Leland: who hath derived it from the British word Guin or Guen, that is, White, so that Caer Guin should signifie as much, as the White Citie. And why not seeing the old Latines named these their Cities, Alba longa, and Alba regia, of whitenesse: yea, and the Grecians also had their Leuca, Leucas, and other nations also many places taking name of whitenesse. For, this Venta, like as the other two of the same name, to wit, Venta Silvrvm, and Venta Icenorum, are seated all three in a soile that standeth upon chalke, and a whitish clay.

A Citie it was no doubt, flourishing even in the Romans times, as in which the Emperours of Rome seeme to have had their sacred of houses weaving and embroidering peculiar to their owne persons, and uses: seeing among all the Ventas in Britaine, it was both the chiefe, and also nearest unto Italic. For, in the booke of Notitia, mention is made of the Procurator [Master or Governour] Cynegii VENTENSIS or BENTENSIS, in Britaine: where the onely flowre of Lawyers, James Cujacius readeth Cynacii, and in his Paratitles upon the Code interpreteth it, Sacrum texturinum, that is, The sacred workhouse or shop of embroidering and weaving. And right of his mind is Guidus Pascirolus, who writeth that those Gynacia were instituted for the weaving of the Princes, and souldiers garments, of Ship-sailes, of linnen sheetes, or covering, and such like cloaths, necessarie for the furniture of mansions. But Wolfangus Lazius was of opinion, that that the Procurator aforesaid, had the charge heere of the Emperours dogs. And to say truth, of all the dogs in Europe, ours beare the name; in so much, as Strabo witnesseth, our dogges served as souldiers, and the ancient Galles made speciall use of them even in their wars. And of all others, they were in most request both for those baitings in the Amphitheaters, and also in all other publique huntings among the Romans. For as the same Strabo writeth, they were improvisi made the curiositates, that is, of a generous kind and framed naturally for hunting. Whereupon Nemesianus wrote thus:

divisa Britannia mittit Veloces, nobisque orbis venatibus aptos.

Though Britaine from this world of ours doth lie secluded farre, Swift hounds it sends which for our game most fitly framed are.

Gratius also, of their price and excellencie, saith thus:

*Quod freta si Morinum dubio refluentia ponto
Veneris, atque ipsos libeat penetrare Britannos,
O quanta est merces, & quantum impendia supra?*

If that to Calice streights you goe,
Where tides uncertaine ebbe and flow.
And list to venture further more,
Crossing the seas to British shore:
What meede would come to quite your paines:
What overdeale befide, of gaines.

Yea and that very dog with us, which of the old name Agasus, we call yet at this day a Gafehound, those ancient Greekes both knew, and also had in great price. And this will Oppian in his first booke of his Cynegeticks tell you, in these Greeke verses.

A Gafe-hound.
Agasus, a British hound.

Which Bodine turned into Latine thes :

*Est enim catuli species indagine clara,
Corpus huic breve, magnifico sed corpore digna,
Picta Britannorum gens illos effera bello
Nutrit, Agasæosq; vocat, vilissima forma Corporis, ut credas parasitos esse latrantes.*

And may be Englished in this wise.

Stout hounds there are, and those of finders kind,
Of bodie small but doughtie for their deed:
The painted folke, fierce Britans as we find,
Them Gashounds call, for they with them doe breed.
In making, like house dogs, or at a word,
To lickercouseurs that craven at our bord.

Claudian also, touching our Mastives writeth in this sort :

Magna, taurorum fracturi colla Britanni.

And Britith mastives downe that puls,
Or breake the necks of sturdy bulls.

I have too far digressed about dogges, yet hope a favourable pardon.

In this Citie as our owne Historiographers doe report, in the time of the Romans, was that Conitans the Monke, who by his father Constantine was first elect Cafe, and afterwards Augustus : that Constantine I say, who upon hope of this name had assumed the Imperiall purple roabe, that is, usurped the Empire against Honorius. For long since, (as Zosimus recordeth speaking of those times) as well in villages as in Cities, there were great colledges peopled (as it were) with Monks, who before time flying the light lived scattering heere and there among mountaines, woods, and forests all solitary by themselves, whereof also they were so called. Now, of this Colledge wherein the said Conitans was, those old broken walles which are scene of that thickness and strength, at the West-gate of the Cathedral Church, may seeme to be the ruines and reliques. But this imperiall Monke taken out from hence suffered soone after condigne punishment, both for his fathers ambition and also for the contempt of his professed religion. During the Heptarchie of the Saxons, this Can albe it once or twice it suffered much calamity and miserie, yet it revived, and recovered againe : yea, and became the seat royall of the West-Saxons Kings, adorned with magnificent Churches, and a Bishops See : furnished likewise with six mint houses by King Aethelstane. In the Normans time also it flourished very much, and in it was erected an office for keeping of all publike records and evidences of the Realme. In which prosperous estate it continued a long time : but that once or twice it was defaced by misfortune of suddaine fires, and in the civill war betweene Stephen, and Maude about the Kingdome of England, sacked by the unruly and insolent fouldiers. Whereupon Necham our countriman who lived in that age, writeth thus :

*Guintoniam titulis claram, gazisque repletam
Noverunt veterum tempora prisca patrum.
Sed tam sacra fames auri, jam cecus habendi,
Vrbibus egregiis parcere nescit amor.*

Our ancestours knew Winchester sometimes a goodly Towne,
In treasure rich and plentifull, in name of great renowne :
But now, for hunger after gold our men lo greedy are ;
That even such Cities excellent, they know not how to spare.

But of these losses it recovered it selfe by the helpe of Edward the third, who here appointed the Mart for wooll and cloth, which we commonly call the Staple. What was the face and outward shew of this Citie in these foregoing times, a man can hardly tell, considering that, as the said Necham writeth :

*Flammis toties gens aliena dedit.
Hinc facies urbis toties mutata, dolorem Præstendit, casus nuntia vera sui.*

See before in the Emperours.

So many times a nation strange
Hath fir'd this towne, and made such change ;
That now her face and outward hue
Her griefe bewray's, and tels full true.

In these daies of ours it is indifferently well peopled and frequented, having water plentiful, by reason of the River turned and conveyed divers waies into it, lying somewhat in length from East to West, and containeth about a mile and a halfe in circuit within the walls : which open at fixe gates, and have every one of them their suburbs reaching forth without, a good way. On the South side of the West gate there mounteth up an old Castle, which oftentimes hath beene besieged, but most sore and straightly, above the rest what time as Mawd the Emperesse held it against King Stephen, and at length by a rumour given out that she was dead, and causing her selfe to be caried out in a coffin like a course deceived the enemy. As concerning that round table there, hanging up against the wall which the common sort useth to gaze upon with great admiration, as if it had beene King Arthurs table, I have nothing to say but this, That, as a man which vieweth it well may easily perceive, it is nothing so ancient as King Arthur. For, in latter times when for the exercise of armes and feates of warlike prowess, those runnings at tilt, and martiall joustings or torneaments, were much practised : they used such tables, least any contention or offence for priority of place should through ambition arise among Nobles and Knights assembled together. And this was a custome of great antiquitie, as it may seeme. For, the ancient Gaules, as Athenæus writeth, were wont to sit about round tables, and their Esquires stood at their backs, holding their shields. About the midst of the citie, but more inclining to the South, Kenelwalch. King of the West-Saxons after the subversion of that Colledge of Monkes which flourished in the Romans time, (as William of Malmesburie saith) First founded to the glory of God, the fairest Church that was in those daies ; in which very place, the posteritie afterwards in building of a Cathedral seat for the Bishop, although it were more stately than the first, yet followed just in the very same steps. In this See, there have sitten since Wina, whom the said Kenelwalch ordained the first Bishop there, Many Bishops some renowned for their wealth and honourable port, and some for holiness of life. But among other, Saint Swithin continueth yet of greatest fame, not so much for his sanctitie, as for the raine which usually falleth about the Feast of his translation in Iuly, by reason the Sunne then Cosmically with Præsepe and Aselli, noted by ancient writers to be rainie constellations, and not for his weeping, or other weeping Saints Margaret the Virgine, and Mary Magdalen, whose feasts are shortly after, as some superstitiously-credulous have believed.

This by the way, pardon me I pray you, for I digresse licentiously. Thus Bishops of Winchester have beene anciently by a certaine peculiar prerogative that they have, Chancellours to the Archbishop of Canterbury, and for long time now Prelates to the order of the Garter : and they have from time to time to their great cost reedified the Church, and by name, Edington and Walkelin, but Wickham especially : who built all the West part thereof downe from the quire, after a new kind of worke, I assure you, most sumptuously. In the midst of which building is to be scene his owne tombe of decent modestie betweene two pillars. And these Bishops have ever and anon consecrated it to new Patrons and Saints, as to Saint Amphibalus, Saint Peter, Saint Swithin, and last of all to the holy Trinitie : by which name it is knowne at this day. The English Saxons also, had this Church in great honour for the sepulture of certaine Saints and Kings there, (whose bones Richard Fox the Bishop gathered, and shringing them in certaine little gilded coffers placed them orderly with their severall Inscriptions in the top of that wall which encloseth the upper part of the quire) and they called it in times past Ealden Wýnþeser, that is, The old Minster, for difference from another more lately built, which was named Nepan Wýnþeser, that is, The new Minster ; which Elfred founded ; and for the building of houses of office belonging to the same purchase of the Bishop a plot of of ground; and for every foot of it paid him downe a marke after the publike weighe.

This monasterie as also that other the older, was built for married Priests, who afterwards, upon I know not what miracle of a Crosse that spoke, and disliked their marriage, were thrust out by Dunslane Archbishop of Canterbury, and Monkes put in their place. The walls of these two monasteries stood so neere and close together, that the voices of those that sung in the one troubled the chaunting of the other: whereupon there arose grudge and heart-burning betwene these Monkes, which afterwards brake out into open enmities: By occasion whereof, and because at the new monasterie there gathered and stood much water which from the Wellgate came downe thither along the current of the streets, and cast forth from it an unwholsome aire, the Minster Church two hundred yeares after the first foundation of it, was removed into the Suburbs of the citie on the North parr, which they call Hide. Where, by the permission of King Henry the First, the Monkes built a most stately and beautifull monasterie; which a few yeares after by the craftie practice of Henrie de Blois Bishoppe of Winchester (as the private historie of this place witnesseth) was pitiously burnt. In which fire, that Crosse also was consumed, which Canutus the Dane gave, and upon which, as old writings beare record, he bestowed as much as his owne yeares revenewes of all England came unto. The monasterie nevertheless was raised up againe, and grew by little and little to wonderfull greatnesse, as the very ruines thereof even at this day doe shew, until that generall subversion, and finall period of our monasteries. For then, was this monasterie demolished: and into that other of the holy Trinitie, which is the Cathedral Church, when the monkes were thrust out were brought in their stead, a Dozen, twelve Prebendaries, and there placed. At the East side of this Cathedral Church, standeth the Bishops palace, called Wolvesey: a right goodly thing, and sumptuous; which being towred and compassed almost round with the streame of a pretie river, reacheth even to the Citie walls: and in the South-suburbs, just over against the holdeth a faire Colledge: which William Wickham Bishop of this See, the great father and Patron (of all Englishmen) of good literature, and whose praise for ever to the worlds end will continue, built for a Schoole, and thereto dedicated it, in which, both for Church and Common-wealth there riseth a most plentiful increase of right learned men. For, in this Colledge, one warden, ten fellowes, two Schoole-masters, and threescore and ten schollers, with divers others are plentifully maintained. There have bene also in this Citie, other faire and goodly buildings, (for very many were here consecrated to religion) which I list not now to recount, for time and avarice hath made an end of them. Onely, that Nunnery, or monasterie of veiled Virgins, which Elfwida, the wife of King Elfred founded, I will not overlook: seeing it was a most famous thing as the remainder of it now doth shew: and for that, out of it King Henrie the First tooke to wife Mawde the daughter of Malcolm King of Scots, by whom the Royall blood of the ancient Kings of England became united to the Normans, and he therefore wonne much love of the English nation. For, his nephew hee was in the second degree of descent, unto Edmund Iron-side, by his sonne Edward the Banished. A woman, as adorned with all other vertues meet for a Queen, so especially inflamed with an incredible love of true pietie and godlinesse. Whereupon was this Tetrastich made in her commendation:

*Prospera non letam fecerit, nec aspera tristem: Aspera risu ei, prospera terror erant.
Non decor effecit fragilem, non sceptrum superbam,
Sola potens humilis, sola pudica decens.
No prosperous state did make her glad,
Nor adverse chances made her sad:
If fortune frown'd, she then did smile;
If fortune frown'd, she feared the while.
If beauty tempted, she yet said nay,
No pride she tooke in scepters sway:*

Concerning Sir Guy of Warwick, of whom there goe so many pretty tales, who in single fight overcame here that Danish giant and Goliath, Colbrand: and of Walbeof Earle of Huntingdon, that was here beheaded, where afterwards stood Saint Giles chappell: as also of that excellent Hospital of Saint Crosse there adjoining, founded by Henry of Blois brother to King Stephen, and Bishop of this City, and augmented by Henry Beauford Cardinall, I need not to speake: seeing every man may read of them in the common Chronicles.

As touching the Earles of Winchester, to say nothing of * Clyto the Saxon whom the Normans deprived of his ancient honour King John created Saier Quincy, Earle of Winchester, who used for his armes a military belt, they call it a Fesse, with a labell of seven as I have seene upon his seales. After him succeeded Roger his sonne, who bare, Gules, seven Masles voided, Or: but with him that honour vanished and went away, seeing he died without issue male. For, he married the eldest daughter and one of the coheires of Alan Lord of Galloway in Scotland by a former wife, in right of whom he was Constable of Scotland. He had by her three onely daughters, the first married to William de Ferraris Earle of Derbie, the second to Alan de la Zouch, the third to Comine Earle of Buchanan in Scotland. A long time after Hugh le Despencer, having that title bestowed upon him for terme of his life, by King Edward the second, whose minion he was, and only beloved, felt together with his sonne what is the consequence of Princes extraordinary favours: For both of them envied by most, were by the furious rage of the people put cruelly to shamefull death. And long it was after this, that through the bounty of King Edward the Fourth, Lewis of Bruges * a Netherland Lord of Gruthuse, Prince of Steinhuse, &c. Who had given him comfort and succour in the Netherlands, when hee was fled his native cuntry, received this honour with Armes resembling those of Roger Quincy, in these words, Azur a dix Masles D'or en orm d'un Canton de nostie propre Armes d'Engleterre, cest-à-dire, de Goul un Leopard passant d'or, armee d'azur.

Anno 12. E. 4.

All which, after King Edward's death, he yielded up into the hands of Henrie the seventh. But lately within our memorie King Edward the sixth, honoured Sir William Pawlet Lord Treasurer of England, Earle of Wilshire, and Lord Saint John of Basing, with a new title of Marquesse of Winchester. A man prudently pliable to times, raised not sodainly but by degrees in Court, excessive in vaste informous buildings; temperate in all other things, full of yeares, for he lived nintie seven years, and fruitfull in his generation, for he saw one hundred and three, issued from him by Elizabeth his wife, daughter to Sir William Capell Knight. And now his grand-child William enjoyeth the said honours: For the Geographical position of Winchester, it hath bene observed by former ages to be in longitude two and twenty degrees, and in latitude fiftie one.

From Winchester more Eastward the river Hamble at a great mouth emptieth it selfe into the Ocean. Beda calleth it Homelea, which, as he writeth, by the lands of the Inte entreth into Solente: for so termeth he that frith our narrow sea, that runneth betwene the Isle of Wight and the main land of Britain: in which the tides at set houres rushing in with great violence out of the Ocean at both ends, and so meeting one another in the midst, seemed so strange a matter to our men in old time, that they reckoned it among the wonders of Britaine. Whereof, read heere the very words of Beda. The two sides of the Ocean which about Britaine breake out of the vast Northern Ocean daily encounter and fight one against another, beyond the mouth of the river Homelea: and when they have ended their conflict, retorne backe, from whence they came and runne into the Ocean. Into this Frith that little river also sheddeth it selfe, which having his head neere Warnford, passeth betwene the Forrests of Waltham (where the Bishop of Winchester hath a goodly house), and of Bere, whereby is Wickham a mansion of that ancient family of Puedal, and then by Tichfield, sometime a little monasterie founded by Petre de Rapibus Bishop of Winchester * where the marriage

riage was solemnized betwene King Henry the sixth, and Margaret of Anjou; and now the principall seate of the Lord Writhelesles Earles of South-hampton. From thence forthwith, the shore with curving crookes draweth it selfe in, and the Island named Portsey maketh a great creeke, within the more inward nooke or corner whereof sometimes flourished Port-peris; (where, by report Vespasian landed) An haven towne which our Ancestours by a new name called Port-chester, not of Port the Saxon, but of the port or haven. For, Ptolomee tearmeth it Misus rapidus, that is, THE GREAT HAVEN, for the widenesse of it, like as that Portus Magnus also in Africk, as Plinie witnesseth. And verily there remaineth yet a great Castle which hath a faire and spacious prospect into the haven underneath. But when as the Ocean by with-drawing it selfe, tooke away, by little and little the commoditie of the haven, the Inhabitants flitted from thence into the Island Portsey adjoyning, which taketh in circuit much about fourteene miles, being at every full sea floated round about with salt-waters, out of which they boile salt, and by a bridge that hath a fortreffe adjoyning unto it, is united to the Continent. This Island Athelfleda King Eadgars wife had given to the New monasterie of Winchester. And in it at the very gullet, or mouth where the sea enteth in, our fore-fathers built a towne, and thereupon named it Portsmouth, that is, the mouth of the haven. A place alwaies in time of warre well frequented, otherwise little resort there is to it: as beeing more favourable, and better affected to Mars and Neptune, than to Mercurie, that is, to warre rather than to traffique. A Church it hath of the old building, and an Hospitall (Gods house they call it) founded by Peter de * Rupibus, Bishop of Winchester. Fortified it was with a wall made of timber and the same well covered over with thicke bankes of earth: fenced with a platforme also or mount of earth in times past on the North-east, nere to the gate: and two block-houses at the entry of the haven made of new hewen stone: Which being by King Edward the fourth begunne, King Henry the seventh as the Inhabitants report, did finish, and strengthened the towne with a garrison. But in our remembrance, QUEENE ELIZABETH at her great cost and charges so armed it (as one would say) with new fortifications, as that now there is nothing wanting, that a man would require in a most strong and fenced place. And of the garrison, souldiers some keepe watch and ward both night and day at the gates: others upon the towre of the Church, who by the ringing or sound of a bell give warning how many horse or foote are comming, and by putting forth a banner shew from what quarter they come.

From hence as the shore fetcheth a compasse and windeth from Portes-bridge, wee had the sight of Havant a little mercate towne, and hard by it, of Wablington, a goodly faire house belonging some-times to the Earles of Salisbury; but now to the family of the Cortons Knights. Before which, there lie two Islands, the one greater, named Haling, the other lesse, called Thorney, of thornes there growing: and both of them have their severall parish Church. In many places along this shore, of the sea-waters flowing up thither, is made salt of a palish or Greene colour: the which by a certaine artificious devise, they boyle untill it bee exceeding white. And of this sea, or Bay-salt, and not of ours made out of salt springs, is Saint Ambrose to bee understood, when hee writeth thus; Consider methose things which are usual with many very grace-full: namely, how water is turned into salt, of such hardnesse and soliditie, that often-times it is hewed with axes. This in the salts of Britaine is no wonder, as which carrying a shew of strong marble, doe shine and glitter againe with the whitenesse of the same metall, like unto snow, and bee holesome to the bodie, &c.

Farther within the land, the MEANVARI dwelt, whose countrey together with the Isle of Wight Edilwalch King of the South Saxons received in token of Adoption from Wlpher King of Mercians, Godfather unto him at the Font, when he was baptized. The habitations of these Meanuari, scarce changing the name, at this day is divided into three hundreds; to wit, Means-borow, East-mean, and West-mean: and amongst them there mounteth up an high Hill, environed in the top with a large rampier,

A rampier, and they call it old Winchester: at which, by report, there stood in old time a citie, but now neither top nor toe, as they say, remaineth of it: so as a man would quickly judge it to have beene a summer standing campe, and nothing else. Under this is Warnford seated where Adam de Portu a mightie man, in this tract and of great wealth in the reigne of William the first, reedified the Church a new, as a couple of rude verses set fast upon the wall doe plainly shew. Upon these, more high into the land, those SEGONTIACI, who yeilded themselves unto Julius Caesar, had their seate toward the North limite of this shire, in and about the hundred of Holeshot: wherein are to bee seene Mercate Aulun, which King Elfred bequeathed by his will unto the keeper of Leodre: also Basingstoke a mercate towne well frequented: upon the descent of an hill, on the North side whereof standeth solitarie a very faire Chappell consecrated unto the holy Ghost by William, the first Lord Sands, who was buried there. In the arched and embowed roofof whereof is to bee seene the holy history of the Bible painted most artificially, with lively portraicts, and images representing the Prophets, the Apostles, and the Disciples of Christ. Beneath this, Eastward lieth Basing, a towne very well knowne, by reason of the Lords bearing the name of it, to wit, Saint Iohn, the Poinings, and the Powlets. For, when Adam de Portu, Lord of Basing matched in marriage with the daughter and heire of Roger de Aurenall, whose wife was likewise daughter and heire to the right noble house of Saint Iohn, William his sonne, to doe honour unto that familie assumed to him the surname of Saint Iohn, and they who lineally descended from him have still retained the same. But when Edmund Saint Iohn departed out of this world without issue in King Edward the third his time, his sister Margaret, bettered the state of her husband Iohn, Saint Philibert, with the possessions of the Lord Saint Iohn: And when she was dead without children, Isabell the other sister wife unto Sir Luke Poinings, bare unto him Thomas, Lord of Basing, whose Neice Constance by his sonne Hugh, (unto whom this fell for her child's part of Inheritance) was wedded into the familie of the Powlets, and she was great Grandmother to that Sir William Powlet who being made Baron Saint Iohn of Basing by King Henrie the Eighth, and created by King Edward the Sixth first Earle of Wiltshire, and afterward Marquesse of Winchester, and withall was Lord Treasurer of England, having in a troublesome time runne through the highest honours, fulfilled the course of nature with the fatietie of this life, and that in great prosperitie, as a rare blessing among Courtiers) after he had built a most sumptuous house heere, for the spacious largenesse thereof admirable to the beholders, untill for the great and chargeable reparations his successors pulled downe a good part of it. But of him I have spoken before.

Nere unto this house, the Vine sheweth it selfe, a very faire place, and Mansion E-house of the Baron Sands, so named of the vines there, which wee have had in Britaine, since Probus the Emperours time, rather for shade than fruit. For, hee permitted the Britaines and others to have vines. The first of these Barons was Sir William Sands, whom King Henrie the Eighth advanced to that dignitie, being Lord Chamberlaine unto him, and having much amended his estate by marrying Margerie Bray, daughter and heire of Iohn Bray, and cousin to Sir Reinold Bray, a most worthy Knight of the Order of the Garter, and a right noble Banneret: whose Son Thomas Lord Sands, was Grandfather to William L. Sands that now liveth. Neighbouring hereunto is Odiam glorious in these daies for the Kings house there: and famous for that David the Second King of Scots, was there imprisoned: a Barrough corporate, belonging in times past to the Bishop of Winchester: the fortreffe whereof in the name of King Iohn, thirteene Englishmen for fifteene daies defended most valiantly, and made good against Lewis of France, who with his whole armie besieged and assaulted it very hotly.

A little above, among these Segontiaci, toward the North side of the countrey, sometimes stood VINDONVM, the chiefe citie of the Segontiaci, which casting off his owne name, hath taken the name of the Nation, like as Lutetia hath assumed unto it the name

name of the Pariſians there inhabiting; for, called it was by the Britaines Caer Segontis, that is to ſay, the Citie of the Segontiaci. And ſo Ninnius in his catalogue of cities named it: wee at this day called it Silceſter: and Higden ſeemeth to clepe it of the Britaines Britenden: that this was the ancient Vindonum, I am induced to thinke by reaſon of the diſtance of Vindonum in Antoninus, from Gallena, or Guallenford, and Venia or Wincheſter: and the rather, becauſe betwene this Vindonum and Venia, there is ſtill to bee ſcene a cauſey, or ſtreet-way. Ninnius recordeth, that it was built by Conſtantius the ſonne of Conſtantine the Great, and called ſometime Murimintum, haply, for Muri-vindum, that is, the wals of Vindon. For, this word Mur borrowed from the provincially language, the Britaines retained ſtill, and V. the conſonant, they change oftentimes in their ſpeech, and writing into M. And to uſe the verie words of Aſinnius, though they ſeeme ridiculous, the ſaid Conſtantius, ſowed upon the ſoile of this citie three ſeedes, that none ſhould be poore that dwelt therein at any time. Like as Dinocrates, when Alexandria in Egypt was a building, ſtrewed it with meale or flower (as Marcellinus writeth) all the circular lines of the draught, which being done by chance, was taken for a fore-token, that the citie ſhould abound with all manner of victuals. He reporteth alſo, that Conſtantius died here, and that his Sepulchre was to be ſcene at one of the gates, as the Inſcription ſheweth. But in theſe matters let Ninnius cleere his owne credit; for, ſtuffed hee hath that little booke with many a pretty lie. Yet this I may be bold to affirme, that it flouriſhed in great honour about that time: and I my ſelfe have lighted here upon very many peeces, of the coine of Conſtantine, the younger ſonne to Conſtantine the Great: which in their reverſe have the portraict of an houſe with this Inſcription PROVIDENTIA CAES. Now that this Conſtantius whom he maketh the builder of this Citie, died at Mopſueſtia in Cilicia, and was interred in Conſtantinople in the Sepulchre of his Anceſtors, is knowne for certaine, and confeſſed. Yet I will nor denie, but that hee might have in this citie a monument erected in honour and remembrance of him. For, many there were that had ſuch monuments built, about which the ſouldiers, were wont yearly to juſt, and keepe ſolemne turneaments in honour of the dead.

Sepulchres of honour.

When the declining Roman Empire haſtened to an end, and barbarous nations began every where to waſte and ſpoile the Provinces: their Armies heere in Britaine, fearing leaſt the flame of this fire, wherewith their next neighbours in France were conſumed, would catch hold of them, ſet up and created Emperours to themſelves: firſt Marcus, then Gratian, whom they ſoone ſlew: and laſt of all in the yeare after Chriſts birth 407, our Conſtantine for his names ſake, they forced, wild he, mild he, poſurper the Empire, and to put on the Imperiall Purple robe in the citie Caer Segontis, as both Ninnius, and Gervafe of Canterburie, do witneſſe. This Conſtantine putting to ſea out of Britaine, landed at * Bologne in France, and drew all the Roman armies even as farre as the Alpes to ſide and joyne with him in his warres. Hee ſtoutly defended Valentia in France, againſt the power of Honorius the Emperour: the River Rhene which long before had beene neglected, hee fortified with a garrifon. Upon the Alpes, where any paſſage was, hee built fortrefſes. In Spaine, under the conduct of his ſonne Conſtans, whom of a Monke he had declared Emperour, he warred fortunately: and afterwards having ſent his letters unto Honorius, and craved pardon for ſuffering the ſouldiers, to put upon him the purple perforce, whether hee would or no; he accepted at his hands the Imperiall inveſture, which hee freely gave him. Whereupon being puffed up with pride, after hee had paſſed the Alpes, his mind was wholly ſet upon a journey to Rome. But hearing that Alaricus the Gothe who had favoured his part was dead, hee returned to Arles, where hee ſetled his Imperiall ſeat, cauſed the Citie to be called Conſtantina, and commanded the courts and aſſemblies of ſeven Provinces, there to be holden. In the meane time Gerontius excited the ſouldiers againſt their Lord, and when he had treacherouſly ſlaine his ſonne Conſtans at Vienna in France, beſieged Conſtantine alſo himſelfe within Arles. But after that one Conſtantius ſent by Honorius with a great armie, made head againſt him, Gerontius killed himſelfe. And Conſtantine being now ſtreitly ly beſieged, and by reaſon of the unhappie ſucceſſe of his men paſt all hope, laid aſide the Purple and his great eſtate entred into the Church, became a Prielt: and ſtraight-waies when Arles was yeilded up, and hee tumbled into Italie, was himſelfe, together with his ſonne Julian (unto whom he had given the title of * Nobiliffimus) and his brother Sebaſtian, beheaded. Thus much briefly of theſe occurrents, (which before are diſcourſed more at large) out of Zozimus, Zofomenus, Nicephorus, Oroſius, and Olympiodorus, to the end that Veritas may triumph over their vanitie, who have beſprinkled this ſtory with moſt ridiculous and fooliſh lies of their owne deviſing.

* Heire apparant.
Julianus Nobiliſſimus.

Moreover, in this citie (our Hiſtoriographers write) that our warlike Arthur was inveſted and crowned King. But not long after it was razed quite, either in the Saxons warres, or when Adelwolp being offended with his brother King Edward, upon a malicious mind, together with the helpe of the Daniſh Rovers, waſted this countrey even to Baſingſtoke. And now remaineth nothing ſave the wals, which although they want their battlements, Gurtaine, and coppe, yet they ſeeme to have beene of a very great height. For, the earth is ſo growne up with the rubble, that I could ſcarce with ſtouping low paſſe through an old poſterne, which they call, Onions Hole. Theſe walles in ſome ſort continue whole, but that they be broken through in thoſe places where the gates were: and out of the very walles, I ſaw grow oakes of that bigneſſe, and thoſe ſeeming (as it were) bredde with the very ſtones, with ſuch huge roots claſping one another a great way, and ſpreading forth ſo mightie armes and boughes all abroad, that it would make the beholders to wonder thereat. Theſe walles take in compaſſe about two Italian miles. Whereupon haply the Saxons called this citie Selceſter, as one would ſay, The great Citie: for Sel may ſeeme to ſound with them as much as Great, ſeeing Aſſerius hath interpreted the Saxon word, Selwood, The Great wood. And before the walles Weſtward, where is a plaine, there lieth a banke of a great length, raiſed and caſt up for a defence and fortification. The ſcite of this old citie, containeth about foureſcore acres of ground within, which being a ſoile ploughed up and tilled, are divided into corne-fields; with a little grove in the Weſt ſide: but on the Eaſt, neere unto the gappe in the wall, there ſtandeth a Farne-houſe, and a pretty Church more lately built, in which, while I ſearched for ancient inſcriptions, I found nothing, but onely in the windowes certaine armes, to wit, in a ſield ſable, ſeven Fuſils argent in Bend, likewise in a ſield ſables, a Feſſe between two Cheverons, and in an Eſcutcheon Or, an Eagle diſplayed with two heads, gules. This laſt, I have heard ſay, was the coat of the Blewets, unto whom this land came, about the Conquerours time. The ſecond belonged unto the ancient houſe of the Bainards of Leckham: but the firſt to the Cufanz, by whom from the Blewets it deſcended hereditarily, to the ſaid Bainards. But in the raigne of William the Conquerour, it was the poſſeſſion of William de Ow, a Norman, who being accuſed of high treaſon, and deſirous to prove his innocencie by combat, was overcome in fight, and by commandement of King William Rufus, had his two eyes pluckt out of his head, and loſt both his generals. This is found by continuall obſervation (as I have learned of the Inhabitants of this place) that although the ground be fertile and fruitfull enough, yet in certaine places croſſing one another, the corne doth not thrive ſo well, but cometh up much thinner then elſe where, by which they ſuppoſe the ſtreets of the citie went in old time. There are heere daily digged up, bricks ſuch as wee call Britaine-bricks, and great ſtore of Roman coine which they terme Onions pennies. For, they dreame that this Onion was a Giant, and dwelt in this citie. There are digged up alſo many times inſcriptions, of which the unſkilfull rurall people envie us the having. Onely one was brought from hence to London, which was to be ſcene in the gardens of the right honourable Sir William Cecill, Lord Burghley, and high Treafurer of England, to wit:

Sel, what it is.

Armes of the Blewets, Bainards, and Cufantes.

That this Tombe was erected for that Victorina which was called Mater Caesarum, that is, The mother of the Campe, and who against Gallienus the Emperour, exiled in Gaule; and Britaine, the two Victorini, her sonne, and sonnes sonne, Posthumus like wife, Lollianus, Marius, and Fetricus, Caesars, I would not with others affirme. Yet have read, that two of the VICTORS, were in some place here in Britaine, and those at one and the selfe same time, the one Maximus the Emperour his soone, the other Præfectus Prætorio to the same Emperour, of whom Saint Ambrose maketh mention in his Epistles, but I dare avouch, that neither of these twaine reared this monument for his wife.

As one high way or street of the Romans went straight from hence Southward to Winchester, so there was another ran west-ward through Pamber Forrest, very full of trees, and other by-places now standing out of the way, hard by Litchfield, that is, the field of dead bodies, to the Forrest of Chine pleasant for coole shade of trees, & plentiful game: in which the Huters and Forresters themselves do wonder at the bank or ridge thereof, so evident to be seene, paved with stone, but broken here and there.

More toward the North, in the very edge and frontier of this Shire, we saw King-cleare, a market towne in these daies well frequented, the residence in times past of the Saxon Kings, by it Fremantle in a parke where King Iohn much haunted, the Sidmanton, the habitation of the King's Mills, Knights: and Burgh-Cleare situated on an high hill, in the top whereof a warlike rampire (such as our countrey men call Burgh) hath a trench taking a great compasse about it: from whence, there being faire and open prospect every way over the countrey lying underneath, there standeth a * Beacon, that by light burning fire the enemies comming, may be shewed to all the neighbour-Inhabitants round about. And verily such warches or signals as this, we terme in common speech Beacons, of the old word Beacnian, that is, to shew by a signe, and for these many hundred yeares, they have bene in right great request, and much used among us: in some places, by heaping up a deale of wood, in others by barriels full of pitch fastened to the top of a mast or pole in the highest places of the countrey, at which, by night some doe evermore watch: and in old time, there were set horsemen as posts in many places, whom our Ancestors called Hobblers, who in the day time should give notice of the enemies approach.

This shire, like as the rest which hitherto we have run over, belonged to the well-Saxon Kings: and when they had deposed Sigeber from his Kingdome, for his tyrannie, evill entreating and lewd managing of his province, this countrey, as Marianus writeth, was assigned unto him, least hee should seeme altogether a private person. Whom notwithstanding afterward, for his wicked deeds, they likewise expelled from hence: and so far was it off, that this afflicted state of a King moved any man to take pitie of him, that a Swine-herd in the end, slew him in the wood Anderida, where he had lurked, and hidden himselfe.

This Shire can reckon but very few Earles, besides those of Winchester which have already named. In the first time of the Normans, Bogo or Beavoise the English man, who fought against the Normans in the battell at Cardiff in Wales, is reputed to have bene Earle of South-hampton, a man for warlike prowesse much renowned, whom while the Monks laboured to set out with their fained fables, they have obscured his doughtie deeds in greater darknesse. From which time unto the daies of Henry the Eight, there was no Earle of South-hampton that I read of: but he created

A William Fitz-williams descended from the daughter of Marquesse Montacute, both Earle of South-hampton, and also Admirall of England, when he was now well stricken in yeares. Who dying straight after without issue; King Edward the Sixth, in the first year of his raigne conferred the said honour upon Thomas Wriothesley Lord Chancellor, whose grand-child Henric by his sonne Henric, enjoyeth the same at this day: and in the prime and flowre of his age hath by good literature and militarie experience strengthened his honorable parentage, that in riper yeares he might be more serviceable to his Prince and countrey.

VECTA INSVLA ISLE OF WIGHT.

O this Countie of South-hampton belongeth that Island which lieth out in length over against the midst of it South-ward, called by the Romans in times past VECTA, VECTIS, and VECTIS, by Ptolomee OTIKTHIZ, by Britaines Guith, by English-Saxons Wuit-land, and Wicp-Ea; (For, an Island they termed Ea) and by us in these daies, the Isle of Wight and the Whight; by so small a streight running betweene, anciently called Solent. It is severed from the maine land, that it may seeme to have bene conjoyned to it: whereof that British name of it Guith, which berokeneth a separation; as Ninnius saith, is thought to have bene given: even as Sicilie also being broken off (as it were) and cut from Italie got the name from Secundo the Latin word (which signifieth cutting) as the right learned Iulius Scaliger is of opinion. Whereupon, (under correction alwaies of the Iudicious Criticks) I would read in the sixth Quest. Naturall. of Seneca, thus; Ab Italia Siciliaresecta, that is, Sicilie cut from Italie: whereas it is commonly read there, rejecta. By this Vicinitie of scite, & Affinitie of name, we may well thinke, this Vecta to be that Ista, which as Diodorus Siculus writeth, seemed at every tide to be an Island, but when it was ebbe, the ancient Britaines were wont that way to carry tinne thither by carts, which should bee transported into France. But yet I would not deeme it to be that Mictis in Plinie, which likewise commeth very neere unto VECTA: For that in it there was plentie of tinne, but in this of ours there is not to my knowledge any veine at all of metall.

This Isle, betweene East and West in ovall forme, stretcheth out twentie miles in length, and spreadeth in the midst, where it is broadest twelve miles: having the one side turning to the North, and the other Southward. The ground (to say nothing of the sea exceeding full of fish) consisteth of soile very fruitfull, and is thankfull to the husbandman, in so much as it doth afford corne to be carried forth: breeding every where store of conies, hares, partridges and pheasants. One little forrest it hath likewise, and two parkes replenished with deere, for game and hunting pleasure. Through the midst thereof runs a long tract or chaine of hills, yeilding plentie of pasture, and forrage for sheepe. The wool of which, next unto that of Lemster and Cotswold, is esteemed best, and in speciall request with Clothiers, whereby there groweth to the Inhabitants much gaine and profit: The North part is all over greene with meddows, pastures, and woods: the South side lieth wholly in manner, bedecked bedecked with cornfields enclosed, where at each end the sea on the North doth so inbosome, encroach within it selfe, that it maketh almost two Islands: and verily so the Islanders call them: namely, Fresh-water Isle which looketh West, and Bimbrige Isle, Eastward. In Beda daies it was counted to containe a thousand and two hundred Hides: now it reckoneth upon 36. townes, villages and Castles: which for Ecclesiasticall jurisdiction belong to the Bishop of Winchester, and for civill government, to the Countie of South-hampton. The Inhabitants of this Isle were wont merily to make their boast, that their case was happier than all others, because they had neither hooded monks, nor cavilling Lawyers, nor yet crafty foxes.

Newport.

The places of greater name be these, Newport, the principall mercate towne of the whole Isle, called in times past Medena, and Novus Burgus de Meden, that is, The new Burgh of Meden: whereof the whole countrey is divided into East Meden and West Meden, an ordering as to their situation East or West either way. Caeres-brake an old Castle, so clepid and clipped short for White garesburg, is in the very heart and midst of the Isle, taking the name of Whitgar the Saxon, of whom more hereafter: and of late magnificently reedified by the meanes of the Captaine: unto which Castle there belonged very many Knights Fees, and above all other places it hath heere the glory for antiquitie: Brading, another mercate Towne, Newton and Tarmouth anciently called Eremue, which have their Majors, and send Burgeses to the Parliament. This Tarmouth and Sharpnose have Castles in them, which together with Worsleys fort or Blockehouse (so named of a worshipfull familie) defend the Sea-shore at the North-west. Just over against it, scarcely two miles off standeth Hurst a fortification of South-Hamptonshire, situate upon a little necke of land lying into the Sea: Quarr, where was founded a Nunnerie in the yeare of our Lord 1131: Gods-Hill, in which John Worsley erected a Schoole for the training up of young wits, West-Cove and East-Cove, that is now ruinous: both which, King Henry the Eighth built at the very-trie of New port: and concerning them Leland wrote in this wise:

Covae fulminee duae cornu scant Hac casum colit, ille Solis ortum Victam quæ Neoportus intrat altam,

Two Cowes full opposite there stand,
At West and East, in all mens sight:
Then flashen fire from either hand,
Where Newport, entreth Isle of Wight.

Also on the North-East side Sandham Castle, furnished as the rest, with great ordnance. Neither are there wanting for the defence of this Isle naturall fences. For, encircled it is with a continuall ridge and raunge as it were of craggy cliffs; there are under the waters likewise hidden stones: and every where there lie against it, banks and rockes perilous for failers: but the most dangerous of all the rest are the Needles, so called because they are so sharpe, and the Shingles; which stand forth against the West angle of the Isle: as also the Owers and Mixon that lie before the East. Besides these, The Brambles, which are Shelves and perilous for Sailers, in the North-coast. Moreover if there be any place that seemeth open and meete for a landing place, the same by an old order and custome among them is piled with strong stakes driven and pitched deepe into the ground.

The Inhabitants.

But verily this Isle is neither with these rockes, nor with these fortresses above said so well fenced, as with the very Inhabitants themselves, who naturally being most warlike, bold, and adventurous, are through the diligence and care of the Captaine of the Isle, confirmed so by continuall exercise in strength and militarie discipline, that they exactly know before hand, (what accidents of service soever may happen in warre) namely with their peeces to shoot point-blanke and not misse the mark, to keepe their ranks, to march orderly, and in ray, to cast their squadrons if need be close into a ring, or to display and spread the same at large, to take paines, to runne, and ride, to endure both Sunne and dust, and fully to performe whatsoever warlike

doth require. Of these souldiers thus trained the Isle it selfe is able to bring forth into the field 4000. and at the instant of all affaires appointed there bee three thousand more of most expert and practised servitours out of Hampshire, and two thousand beside out of Wilshire, to bee ever prest, and in readinesse for the defence of the Isle. And to the end that all hostile forces whatsoever might bee withstood more speedily, and with greater facilitie, the whole countrey is divided into eleven parts: and every of them hath their severall Centoner, as one would say, Centurion, their Vintons also, leaders as it were, of twenty, their great peeces of Ordnance, their Sentinels and warders. Who keepe watch and ward at the Beacons standing on the higher grounds: their Posts also, or runners, whom by an old name growne almost out of use, they terme still Hoblers, who presently give intelligence of all occurrents to the Captaine and Governour of the Isle.

The first that brought it in subjection to the Romans, was Vespasian, whiles he served as a private person under Claudius Caesar: For, thus writeth Suetonius of him. Under the Emperour Claudius, by speciall favour of Narcissus, he was sent into Germanie as Lieutenant of a Legion: and from thence being remooved into Britaine, he fought thirtie battailes with the enemy. Two most mightie nations, and above twentie townes, together with the Isle of Wight, lying next to the said Britaine hee subdued, under the conduct partly of A. Plautius a Consular Lieutenant, and in part of Claudius himselfe. For which service he received triumphall ornaments, and in short space two sacerdotall dignities, &c. At this Isle also, the navie of Allectus; after he had usurped the Imperiall dignitie in Britaine, lying in espiall and ambush, awaited the Romans comming against him, who notwithstanding by the happy meanes of a mist passed by their enemies undescried, gat to land, and set fire on their owne ships, that there might bee no refuge for them, to escape unto by flight. Lord Cerdic was the first English-Saxon that subdued it, and he granted it unto Stuffa, and Whitgar, who joyntly together slew well-near all the British Inhabitants (for few there were of them remaining) in Whitgaraburge a towne so called of his name, and now by contraction shortened into Caesbrake. After, Wolpher King of the Mercians reduced the Isle of Wight under his obedience, and assigned it over to Edelwalch King of the South-Saxons, together with the province of the Menwari, what time as hee became his Godfather, and answered for him at his Baptisme. Then, Ceadwalla King of the West-Saxons, when the said Edelwalch was slaine, and Arvandus the petty King of the Island made away, annexed to it the Dominion, and in a tragical, and lamentable massacre killed every mothers child almost of the inborne Inhabitants, and the fourth part of the Isle, to wit as much land as contained 300. Hides, hee gave unto Bishop Wilfrid. The first that instructed the Islanders in the knowledge of Christian religion. But these matters Beda will informe you best, writing as he doth, in these words.

After then that Ceadwalla had obtained the kingdome of the Gewissi, hee wonne also the Isle of Wight: which unto that time had beene wholly given to Idolatrie; and then endeavoured what he could to make a generall massacre and tragicall slaughter of all the native Inhabitants thereof, and in stead of them to plant there people of his owne province; binding himselfe with a vow, although he was not yet regenerate and become Christened, and in case he wonne the Isle, he would give unto God a fourth part both of it and also of the whole booty. Which vow he so paid, as that he offered this Isle, unto Wilfrid the Bishop (who being of his nation hapened then to come thither & be present to the use and glory of God. The measure of the same Island according to the English mens estimation is proportionable to one thousand and two hundred hides of land. Whereupon the Bishop had possession given him of so much Land as rose to three hundred Hides. But hee, commended that portion which hee received unto one of his Clarkes named Bernwin, and his sisters sonne he was, giving unto him a priest named Hildila, for to minister unto all that were desirous of salvation, the word and laver of life. Where I thinke it not good to passe over in silence, how, for the first fruits (as one would say) of those who of the same Isle were saved by their beleife, two young children brethren, of the Royall blood, to wit, the sonnes of Arvandus King of the Isle, were by the especiall favour of G O D crowned with martyrdom) For, when the enemies approached proached hard unto the Island; these children slept secretly out of the Isle, and were removed into the province next adjoining; where being brought to a place called Ad Lapidem, when they had committed themselves upon trust, to be hidden from the face of the King the was conquerour, betrayed they were and commanded to be killed. Which when a certaine Abbat and Priest named Cynbreth heard, who not farre from thence had his manastere in a place named Reodford, that is the Ford of reed, hee came unto the King, who then in those parts lay secretly at cure of those wounds which hee had received whilst hee fought in the Isle of Wight, and requested of him, that if there were no remedie but that the children must bee murdered, they might yet bee first taught the Sacraments of Christian faith before their death. The King granted his petition, and hee then having catechised them in the word of truth, and bathed them in the fount of salvation, assured them of their entrance into the everlasting Kingdome of heaven. And so within a while after, when the executioner, called instantly for them, they joyfully suffered that temporall death of the body, by which they made no doubt of their passe unto the eternall life of their soules. In this order and manner therefore after all the Provinces of Britaine had embraced the faith of Christ, the Isle of Wight also received the same: in which notwithstanding for the calamitie and trouble of forraigne subjection, no man tooke the degree of Ministerie, and See Episcopall before Daniell, who at this day is the Bishop of the West Saxons and the Geviss. Thus much Beda.

From this time forward our writers for a great while have not one word of Wight unto the yeare of our Lord, one thousand sixtie six, in which, Tostie King Haralds brother with certaine men of warre, and Rovers ships out of Flanders in hatred of his brother invaded it, and after he had compelled the Islanders to pay him tribute, departed. Some few yeares after, as we read in the old booke of Carew broke Priorie, which Master Robert Glover Somerset, shewed me, who carried as it were the Sunne light of ancient Genealogies and Pedigrees in his hand. Like as, faith this booke, William the Bastard conquered England, even so William Fitz. Osbern his Marechal and Earle of Hereford, conquered the Isle of Wight, and was the first Lord of Wight. Long after this, the Frenchmen in the yeare 1377. came suddenly at unawares under faile, invaded and spoiled it: and the same French in the yeare 1403. gave the like attempt, but in vaine: For valiantly they were driven from landing even as in our fathers daies, when the French Gallies set one or two small cottages on fire and went their way.

Church.

As touching the Lords of this Isle, after that William Fitz. Osbern was forthwith slaine in the warre of Flanders, and his sonne Roger outlawed and driven unto exile, it fell into the Kings hands: and Henric the First, King of England gave it unto Richard Ridvers (otherwise called Redvers and de Riparius) Earle of Deneshire, and with all, the Fee or Inheritance of the Towne Christ-Church. Where, like as at Carisbroke, that Richard built certaine Fortresses: but Baldwin his sonne, in the trouble some time of King Stephen, when there were in England so many Tyrants, as there were Lords of Forts and Castles, who tooke upon them every one to stampe money and challenged other rights of Regall Majestie, was by Stephen disseized and expelled from hence. Howbeit, his posteritie recovered their ancient right, whose Genealogie wee have already put downe when wee treated of the Earles of Deneshire.

But in the end, Isabell widow to William de Fortibus, Earle of Albemarle and Holderneshe, sister and heire of Baldwin the last Earle of Devonshire of that house, after much intreatie was overcome to make over by charter all her right and interest, and to settle it upon King Edward the First, with the Manours of Christ Church, and Fawkeshaul, &c. For foure thousand Markes.

Ever since which time, the Kings of England held the Isle, and Henry de Beauchamp Earle of Warwick was by King Henric the Sixth, unto whom hee was most deere, crowned King of Wight, and afterwards nominated, The first or principal Earle of all England. But together with him this new and unusuall title died and vanished quite. Afterwards Richard Widevile Earle Rivers was by King Edward the fourth stiled Lord of the Isle of Wight, & Sir Reginald Bray took it of King Henry the

Also, beside these Lords, this Isle had a noble Familie, named de Insula, or Lisle, out of which in the raigne of King Edward the Second, one was summoned unto the Parliament by the name of Sir John Lisle, of the Isle of Wight.

Cominus Attrebatensis.

In stratagemat.

*S in * France, so also in Britaine, next adjoyning with the Belgæ, are ATTREBATII, which name being altogether out of use, the place which they inhabited commonly called Barkshire. For, let this stand as granted, (seeing Cesar writeth the forrainers comming out of Gallia Belgica inhabited the sea coasts of Britaine and retained still the names of their countries) that these our ATTREBATII ATTREBATES of Gaule: who as Ptolomee recordeth, held the maritime part of Gaule, lying upon the river Sein, and namely, that my country, which after a sort lieth full opposite and over against our Attrebatii. It was not therefore without good cause, if Cesar wrote, that Cominus Attrebatensis was of great authority in these countries, namely among his owne countrymen; and that after hee was by Cesar vanquished, he fled hither: what time, as Frontinus writeth, whiles his ships were grounded upon a shelve, he commanded his sailes to be hoised up, and so appointed Cesar (who pursued him) of his purpose: who kenning a farre of, his full sailes, and supposing that with a good gale of forewind he sailed away, gave over further pursuit. Whence these Attrebatii were so called, it resteth doubtfull: For whereas some fetch the originall from Attrebat, which in the old Gauls tongue they would have to signifie a land of Bread, I neither approve nor disprove their opinion. Sufficient it may be for us, to have shewed from whence they came into Britaine; as for the derivation of their name, let others search into it.*

That countrie which we call Barkshire, the late Latine writers terme Bercheria, and was sometime by the English Saxons named Beppocrype. Which name Afferius Menevensis deriveth from a certaine wood called Berroc where grew good store of box: others from a naked, or bare oake (for so much the name Beroc it selfe importeth) unto which, the Inhabitants in dangers and troublesome times of the commonwealth were wont in old time to resort, there to consult about their publike affaires. The North part hereof the river Ist which afterwards is called Tamisis, that is, the Tamis, running with a winding channell full of reaches, but carrying a very gentle streame, doth pleasantly water it, and first severeth it from Oxfordshire, afterwards from Buckinghamshire. The South side, where it beareth toward Hantshire, the river Kenet cutteth through, untill it runnes into the Tamis. In the West, where it bordereth upon Wiltshire and carrieth the greatest breadth, as also in the middle part, rich it is of it selfe and full of commodities, yeelding corne in plenty; especially where it falleth lower to a valley: which I wote not from what shape of a white horse imagined to appeare in a whitish chalky hill, they terme, The vale of Whitehorse. As for the East part that confineth with Surrie, it groweth very barraine, or at least wise the soile is lesse fertile, as standing upon forrests and woods that take up a great ground in length and breadth.

In the West march thereof neere unto Ist, standeth Farendon, seated high: famous now, for a mercate there kept, but in times past, for a certaine Foit, which Robert Earle of Gloucester built against King Stephen, who notwithstanding wonne it with bloody assaults, and laid it so levell with the ground, that now it is not to be seen. But the plot of ground whereon it stood, as we finde in the Chronicle of Warley Abbey, King John in the yeere of our Lord 1202. prevented by divine inspiration granted with all the appurtenances to the building of an Abbey for the Cistercians order.

From hence the river having with a great turning compasse after much wrestling, gotten out towards the North, passeth a long hard by many villages of small reckoning till at length with a returne, and disporting it selfe with winding branches and divisions, hecommeth to Abbendon, a proper towne, and populous: called at first by the English Saxons Sheoverham, then Abbandune, no doubt, of the Abbey, rather then of one Abben I wote not what Irish Eremit, as some have written. A place this was (as we finde in an old booke of Abbandon) upon the plaine of an hill very faire and delectable to see too a little beyond the town, which now is called Suniggewelle, betweene two most pleasant rivelets, which enclosing within them the place it selfe (as it were a certaine nooke) yeeld a delightful sight to the beholders, and a meete succour to the Inhabitants. The very same was in times past called Sheoverham, a Citie famous, goodly to behold, full of riches, compassed about with most plentious fields, with greene meadows, spacious pastures, and stockes of cattell spinning forth milke abundantly. Heere was the Kings seat: hither resorted and assembled the people, when soever there was any treaty about the chiefe, and highest affaires of the Kingdom. But so soone as Cissa King of the West Saxons had built the Abbey, it beganne by little and little to lay downe the old name, and to be called Abbandon, and Abbingdon, that is, Abbey-towne.

This Abbey had not long flourished, when all of a sodaine in a tempestuous fury of the Danes it was subverted; Yet soone after it was reared againe through the bounty of King Edgar, and afterwards by the meanes, & travaile of the Norman Abbats grew by little and little to such magnificence, that among all the Abbaies of Britaine for riches, and stateliesse it would hardly give place to any. Which the very rubble and ruins at this day doe testifie. As for the towne, albeit along time it had a great stay of the Abbay, yet since the yeere of our saluation 1416. in which King Henrie the Fifth built Bridges over the River Isis or Ouse (as witnesseth a verse written in a window of Saint Helens Church there) and turned the Kings high way hither for to make a shorter passage, it beganne to bee frequented and traded so, that among all the townes of this shire, it goes for the chiefe, hath a Major in it, and maketh great gaine by the steeped barly sprouting and chitting againe, which the Greekes terme Byne and were Male: and besides, hath a Crosse, of singular workmanship in the mids of the mace place (which by report, in the reigne of King Henrie the sixth, the Brother of Saint Crosse instituted by him, did erect).

As Cissa founded this monasterie for Monkes, so Cissa out of an old booke I speake the sister of King Cedwalla built the Nunnerie at Helselowe neere the Tamis, where in selfe was Ladie Abbasse over the Virgins, who afterwards were translated to Wubam. And whiles the warre grew hote betwene Offa and Kinulph, when a Castle was there built, the Nunnies retired themselves out of the way. For, after that Kinulph was overtrowne, who ever lay under his jurisdiction from the towne of Wallengford in the South part, from the midstreete unto Essebury, and in the North side to the river Tamis. King Offa usurped and seized into his owne hands.

Neere unto it, Northwest lieth Lee, which by the daughter of a certaine worthie full Knight furnished thereupon, de Lee, fell to the familie of Befiles, and thence came to bee called Befiles Lee: and from that house in right of marriage, to Richard Feiplace: whose Progenitor Thomas brought some honor to his posterity by marrying with Beatrice the base daughter of John the first, King of Portugall, and widow to Gilbert Lord Talbot, of whom they are descended. But now, let us returne. Had by Abendon, Ocke a little river that runneth by the South side of the towne, (over which in times past Sir John of Saint Helens, Knight, built a bridge,) gently fallerh into * Isis: This Ocke springeth in that vale of Whitehorse scarce a mile or two from Kington-Lisle, in olde time the possession of Warin de Insula, or Lisle, a noble Baron. From whom when as Sir John Talbot the younger sonne of that renowned warrior, John Earle of Shrewsburie was defended by his mother, hee was created by King Henrie the Sixth Lord Lisle, like as Warin de Insula in times past in regard of the possession of this place, (as if that dignity were annexed thereto) and afterwards Vicount Lisle: by a Patent without any such regard. This title through the gracious favor of Kings flourished still in his posterity one after another successively. For, bricly to knit up their succession, When Sir Thomas Talbot sonne of the said John departed this life without issue, being deadly shot into the mouth with an arrow in a skirmish defending his possessions against the Lord Barkley. Sir Edward Grey who had married his sister, received the same at the hands of King Richard the third, and left it to John his sonne, and successor. Whose onely daughter and heire King Henrie the Eighth assured to Sir Charles Brandon, and thereupon created him Vicount Lisle. But when as shee died in tender yeeres before the marriage was solemnized, hee also relinquished that title. Which King Henrie afterward bestowed upon Sir Arthur Plantagenet base sonne to King Edward the fourth. Who had wedded Elizabeth sister to Sir John Grey Vicount Lisle, and widow of Edmund Dudley. And when hee deceased without heires male, the said King honoured therewith Sir John Dudley sonne of Edmund by the same Elizabeth Grey, who in the time of King Edward the sixth was created Duke of Northumberland, and afterward attainted by Queen Marie. His sonne Sir Ambrose Dudley being restored in blood, was by Queen Elizabeth on one and the selfe same day created Lord Lisle, and Earle of Warwick, who ended his life issuelesse. And now lately Sir Robert Sidney his sisters sonne was honoured with the stile of Vicount Lisle by King James, who had before created him (being Chamberlaine to the Queene his wife) Baron Sidney of Penshurst.

Then runneth the river Ocke aforesaid, betwene Pusey, which they that are ne-med de Pusey hold it yet by the horn from their ancestors, as given unto them in ancient time by K. Canutus the Dane, and the two Dencheworths the one and the other; where flourished for a long time two noble and auncient houses, to wit, de Hide at the one, and Feiplace at the other, which families may seeme to have sprung out of one and the same stocke, considering they both beare one and the same coat of armes. Then enteraineth Ocke a namelesse river, which issueth out of the same vale, at Wantage called in the English Saxon tongue Wanacing, where some time there was a Manour house of the Kings, and the place wherein Aelfred that most noble and renowned King was borne and bred, which at his death he bequeathed to Alfrith. Long time after, it became a mercate towne by the meanes and helpe of Sir Fulke Fitzwarin that most warlike Knight, upon whom Roger Bigod Mareschall of England had bestowed it for his martiall prowesse, and at this daie it acknowledgeth for Lords thereof the Bourchiers, Earles of Bath descended from the race of the Fitzwarins, of whose familie some were here buried.

Isa being departed once from Abendon, straight waies receiveth into it out of Oxfordshire, the river Tame (of which elsewhere) and now by a compound word being called Tamisis, first directeth his course to Sinodun an high hill, and fenced with a deepe trench, were stood, for certaine, in old time a fortresse of the Romanes: for, the ground being now broken up with the plough, yeeldeth otherwhiles to the ploughmea, store of Roman pieces of coine, as tokens of antiquitie. Under it at Brewell, there was a Castle, (if it were not that upon this hill) which King Henry the Second wonne by force, a little before that he made peace with King Stephen. From hence Tamis, holdeth on his way to the chiefe Citie in times past of the Attrebatians, which Antonius termeth, GALLIYA of Attrebats, Protonice GALLIYA, but both of them through the carelesse of the Scrivears name it wrong, for, GALLIENA: and they likewise in their Greeke copies have thrust upon us, Galena, for, Gallena, by transposition of letters. I have thought it was so named in the British tongue, as it were, Gual hen, that is, The old rampier or fort. Which name being still kept, and [Ford] added thereto, which is a shallow place in the river, the Englishmen in old time called it Guallenagapord, and Wallengapord, and we at this day, shorter Wallengford. In King Edward the Confessors time, it was counted a Burgh, and contained (as we find in that Booke wherein K. William the First, tooke the Survey of all England, two hundred, threescore, and sixteene Hages, that is to say, Houses, yielding nine pound and a Gable, and those that dwelt there, did the King service on horsebacke, or by water. Of those Hages, eight were destroyed for the Castle. In old time it was compassed about with walles, which, as men may see by their tract, tooke up a mile in circuit. It hath a Castle situate upon the river, very large (I assure you) and stately, so fortified in times past, that the hope in it, (as impregnable and invincible) made divers overbold and stout. For, when England burned (as a man may say) in a general flame of warres, we read, that it was by King Stephen belaid once or twice with sieges, but all in vaine. The greatnesse and magnificence thereof I much wondered at when I was young, and removed thither from Oxford (for a place it is now for the Students there of Christ Church, to retire unto) as having a double range of walles about it, and being compassed round likewise with a duple rampier and ditch: and in the midst of it, there standeth a tower to keepe, raised upon a mightie high mount: in the steepe ascent whereof by steps, we saw a Well of an exceeding depth. The Inhabitants are verily perswaded, that it was built by the Danes; but I should rather judge, that something was here erected by the Romans, and afterwards rased by Saxons, and Danes, what time as Sueno the Dane, ranging and roving this way spoiled, and harried the countrey. That it was at length reedified under King William the first, we know assuredly by Domesday booke, seeing that it yeeldeth record (as even now I noted) of eight Hages or Houses destroyed for the Castle. Yet William Gemetensis makes no mention of this Castle, when he writeth, that William of Normandie having defeated Harold, led his armie forthwith to this citie (so he termeth it) and after he had passed over the Tamis at the ford, pitched his tents heere before hee came came to London. At which time Wigod an Englishman was Lord of Wallengford, who had one onely daughter given in marriage to Robert D'Oyley, of whom he gat Mawd his sole heire, first wedded to Miles Crispin, and after his death, through the goodnesse and favour of K. Henrie the first, married unto Briant, called Fitz Count. Who being brought up in warlike feates, and taking part with Mawd the Emperesse, most manfully defended this Castle against King Stephen, who had raised a fort over against it at Craumesh: and he made it good, untill that peace so much wished of all England, was concluded in this place: and that most grievous dissention about the Crowne, betwene K. Stephen, and Henrie the Second ended. For, then the love of God tooke such place in the hearts of the said Briant, and his wife, that they call of this fraile and transitorie world, and devoted themselves in religious life unto Christ: so was this Honour of Wallengford escheated into the Kings hand. Which appeareth out of an old Inquisition in the Exchequer, by these words. To his most beloved Lords, the King our soveraigne Lord, his Iustices, and Barons of the Exchequer, the Constable of Wallengford sendeth greeting. Know ye, that I have made diligent enquiry by the Knights of my Bayliwicke, according to a commandement of my Lord the King, directed unto me by the Sheriffe: and of the Inquisition thus made, this is the summe. Wigod of Wallengford, held the honour of Wallengford in King Harolds time, and afterwards in the daies of King William the First: He had by his wife a certaine daughter whom he gave in marriage to Robert D'Oyley. This Robert begat of her a daughter, named Mawd, who was his heire. Miles Crispin espoused her, and had with her the honour aforesaid of Wallengford. After the decease of Miles, our soveraigne Lord King Henrie the first, bestowed the aforesaid Mawd upon Briant Fitz Count, who both tooke themselves to a religious life, and King Henrie the Second seized the honour into his hand, &c. Yet afterwards in the time of King Henrie the Third, it belonged to the Earles of Chester: and then to Richard King of the Romans, and Earle of Cornwall, who repaired it, and unto his sonne Edmund, who within the inner Court founded a Collegiate Chappell, who dying without issue, it fell againe to the Crowne, and was annexed to the Dukedome of Cornwall: since which time it hath by little and little decayed. And verily about the time when that most mortall Plague which followed the conjunction of Saturne and Mars in Capricorne, reigned hotely throughout all Europe, in the yeare of our Lord 1348. This towne was so dispeopled by reason of continuall mortaliitie there, that whereas before time it was passing well inhabited, and had twelve Churches in it, it can now now no more than one or two. But the cause of this desolation the Inhabitants lay rather upon the bridges of Abbindon and Dorchester, whereby London portway was cut from thence.

From hence Southward, the Tamis passeth most mildly betwene very rich and fertile fields on both sides, by Moules-ford: which K. Henrie the first gave unto Guilf Fitz-Walter, from whence the Noble family of the Carewes is descended. To this house, much lands, honour, and reputation accrewed, in Ireland by descent, and in England by matching in marriage with right noble families of the Mohuns, Dinkins, and others. Not farre from hence is Aldworth, where be certaine tombes and portraictures, bigger than the ordinary proportion of men: which thereupon the learned multitude keeps a wondering at, as if they had been Giants: whereas indeed, they were but of certaine Knights of the Family of la Beche, which heere had a Castle, and is thought in the raigne of King Edward the Third to have bene extinguished for default of issue male. And now at length, Tamis meeteth with Kenet, which River, as I said ere-while, watereth the South part of this shire, at his first entry when he hath left Wiltshire behind him, runneth under Hungerford, named in old time Wiglesford Charnam-fleet: a very small towne, and seated in a moist place; howbeit, it hath given name and title to the honorable family of the Barons of Hungerford, which was first raised to greatnesse by Walter Hungerford, who under King Henrie the Fifth, being Seneschall or Steward of the Kings house, was for his warlike prowesse liberally rewarded by the said king and infeofed in the Castle and Barony of Honmet in Normandie, To have and to hold unto him and his heires males by homage and fe-

A vice, to find the Kings and his heires at the Castle of Roan, one Launce with a Foxtaile hanging downe thereat: which pleasant conceit, I thought not a misse to insert here among serious matters. The same Walter in the raigne of Henrie the Sixth, being high Treasurer of England, and created withall Baron Hungerford, as well by his singular wisdom, as his marriage with Katherine Peverell (descended from the Moels, and Courtneys,) mightily augmented his state. His sonne Robert, who wedded the daughter and heire of the Lord Botereaux, enriched the same house verie much, Sir Robert likewise his sonne, who matched with Eleanor, the daughter and heire of William Molines whereupon he was summoned among the Barons of the Realme by the name of Lord Molines and during the civill warre betwene the two houses of Lancaster and Yorke, was beheaded at Newcastle, advanced the name not a little. His sonne Thomas, slaine at Salisbury, while his father was living, left his onely daughter named Marie, whom Edward Lord Hastings, tooke to wife with a great and rich inheritance. But Walter, brother to the said Thomas, begat Edward Hungerford, father of that Walter, whom King Henrie the Eighth created Baron Hungerford of Heitesbury, and condemned him afterwards for a crime not to be spoken of: howbeit, Queene Marie restored his children unto all his estate, save onely the name and title of Barons. Not farre from hence Southward is Widehay, the seat for a long time of the Baron * Saint Amand, whose inheritance Gerard Braybrooke caried upon in right of his wife, whose eldest Niece by his sonne Gerard, named Elizabeth, by her marriage brought the same unto William de Beauchamp, who being summoned to the Parliament by the name of William Beauchamp de Saint Amand, flourished among other Barons, like as his sonne Richard, who left no issue lawfully begotten.

Kenet keeping on his course downward from thence, betwene Hemsted Marshall, which sometimes was held by the rod of Marshallsee, and appertained to the Mareschals of England where S. Thomas Parry Treasurer of Queene Elizabeths household, built a very proper house, and Benham Valence in a Parke so called, because it belonged to William de Valencia Earle of Pembroch. But Queen Elizabeth gave it to John Baptista Castilion a Piemontese, of her privie chamber for faithfull service in her dangers. So the river passeth on to that old town Spine, wherof Antonine made mention: which retaining still the name is at this day called Spene: but now in steed of a towne it is a very little village standing scarce a mile off from Newbury a famous towne that arose and had beginning out of the ruins of it. For Newbury with us is as much to say, as the Newburgh, in respect no doubt, of that more ancient place of habitation which is quite decayed and gone, and hath left the name also in a peece of Newburie it selfe which is called Spinham Lands. And if nothing else, yet this verily might prove that Newburie sprang out of Spine, because the inhabitants of Newbury acknowledge the village Spene as their mother, although in comparison of Spene it be passing faire and goodly, as well for buildings as furniture: become rich also by clothing, and very well seated in a champian plaine, having the river Kenet to water it. This towne at the time that the Normans conquered England, fell to Ernulphe de Hesdin Earle of Perch: whose successor Thomas Earle of Perch, being slaine at the siege of Lincolne, the Bishop of Chalons his heire sold it unto William Marescall Earle of Pembroke, who also held the Manour of Hemsted hard by (whereof I have spoken) and his successors also Mareschals of England, untill that Roger Bigod for his obstinacie lost his honor and possessions both, which notwithstanding by intreaty he obtained againe for his life time.

Kenet passeth on hence and taketh into him Lamborn a little river, which at the head and spring thereof imparteth his name to a small mercate towne, that in old time by vertue of King Alfreds testament belonged unto his cousin Alfrink, and afterward to the Fitz Warens, who of King Henrie the Third obtained libertie of holding a mercate, but now appertaineth unto the Essexes, Knights: A familie that fetcheth their pedigree from William Essex Vnder-treasurer of England under

King Edward the Fourth, & from those who in times past carried the same surname, & flourished as men of very great fame in Essex. From thence he runneth under Dunnington, which others call Dunnington a little castle, but a fine and proper one, situate with a faire prospect upon the brow of a pretty hill full of groves, and which inwardly for the most part letteth in all the light. Built, they say, it was by Sir Richard de Abberbury Knight, who also under it founded for poore people a * Godehouse. Afterward, it was the residence of Chaucer, then of the De la Poles, and in our fathers daies of Charles Brandon Duke of Suffolke.

Reading.

Kenet having now finished a long course, by Aldermaston which King Henrie the First gave unto Robert Achard: From whose posterity by the Delamars it came at length in right of marriage to the Fosters a familie of Knights degree, falleth at the last into Tamis, presently after it hath with his winding branches compassed a great part of Reading. This towne Reading, called in the English Saxon tongue Rheabyge, of Rhea, that is, The River, or of the British word Redin, that signifieth Fearne, (which groweth heere in great plentie) excelleth at this day all other townes of this shire in faire streets, and goodly houses: for wealth also of the Townsmen, and their name in making of cloth, although it hath lost the greatest ornaments it had, to wit, a beautifull Church and a most ancient Castle. For this the Danes kept as their hold, (so Asterius writeth) when they made a rampier betweene Kenet and Tamis, and into this they retired themselves for safety when at Inglefield (a village neere unto it, which gave name to an ancient familie) they were by King Aethelwolve discomfited, and put to flight.

But King Henrie the Second so rased it (because it was a place of refuge for King Stephens followers) that nothing now remaineth of it but the bare name in the next streer. Nigh whereunto, King Henrie the First having plucked downe a little Nunnerie that Queene Alfrith had founded in former times, to make satisfaction for her wicked deeds, built for Monks a stately and sumptuous Abbey, and enriched it with great revenewes. Which Prince, to speake out of his very Charter of the foundation, Because three Abbaies in the Realme of England were in old time for their sinnes destroyed, to wit, Reading, Chelseie, and Leonminster, which a long time were held in Lay mens hands: by the advise of the Bishops, built a new Monastrie of Reading and gave unto it Reading, Chelseie, and Leonminster. In this Abbey was the founder himselfe King Henrie, buried with his wife both veiled and crowned for that shee had beene a Queene, and a professed Nunne, and with them their daughter Mawde, as witneseth the private Historie of this place, although some report, that she was enterr'd at Becc in Normandie. This Mawde as well as that Lacedemonian Ladie Lampido, whom Plinie maketh mention of, was a Kings daughter, a Kings wife, and a Kings mother: that is to say, daughter of this Henrie the First, King of England, wife of Henrie the Fourth, Emperour of Almaine, and mother to Henrie the Second, King of England. Concerning which matter have you here a Distichon engraven on her tombe, and the same verily in my judgment conceived in some gracious aspect of the Muses.

Hic jacet Henrici filia, sponsa parens.*

The daughter, wife, the mother eke, of Henrie, lieth heere;
Much blest by birth, by marriage more, but most by issue deere.

And well might she be counted greatest by her issue: For, Henrie the Second her sonne, as Iohn of Salisbury who lived in those daies wrote, was the best and most vertuous King of Britaine, the most fortunate Duke of Normandie and Aquitain: and as well for valiant exploits, as for excellent vertues highly renowned. How courageous, how magnificent, how wise and modest he was even from his tender yeeres, envy it selfe can neither conceale nor dissemble: seeing that his acts bee fresh and conspicuous: seeing also, that he hath extended forward and held on in a continued traine, the titles of his verum from the bounds of Britaine unto the marches of Spaine. And in another place of the same King, Henrie the Second the most mighty King that ever was of Britaine, sheweth

King Henry the second.

A his puissance about the river Garumna; and laying siege to Tolose, with fortunate successe terrified not onely those of Province as farre as to Rhose and the Alpes, but also by raising fortresses & subduing nations, he made the princes of Spaine and France to quake for feare, as if he had beene ever more at the point to set upon them all. I will, also if it please you, adjoyne heere to a word, or two concerning the same King, out of Giraldus Cambrensis. From the Pyrenean mountaines, saith hee, unto the Westerne bounds, and furthest limits of the North Ocean, This our Alexander of the West hath stretched forth his arme. As farre therefore as nature in these our parts hath enlarged the land, so farre hath hee marched with Victories. If the bounds of his expeditions were sought for, sooner would the globe of earth faile, than they end. For where there is a valiant and courageous minde, how soever earth and land faile, victories cannot faile: well may there bee wanting matter of triumph, but triumphs will never bee wanting. How great an addition to his glorious titles and triumphs was Ireland: with how great valour and praise-worthy promise pearced he through the very secrets and hidden places of the Ocean? But lo heere an old verse of his death, which briefly in one word containeth fully both all this, and also the renowne of his sonne King Richard the first.

Mira cano, Sol occubuit, nox nulla sequuta est.

A wonder great, the Sunne was set, and night there followed none.

For, so farre was King Richard his sonne from bringing darknesse with him, that with the beames of his victories atchieved in Cypres and Syria, he made our countrey of England most famous and renowned through the world. But these are things without our Element. Let us returne againe from persons to places. This Monastery wherein that noble King Henrie the first was buried is now converted to bee the Kings house, which hath adjoyning unto it a very goodly stable stored to the full with princelike and most generous steeds. But as touching this place, listen also to the Poet describing the Tamis as he passeth heereby.

King Richard the first.

*Hinc videt exiguum Chawfey, properatque videre Redingum nitidum, texendis nobile pannis.
Hoc docet Aelfredi nostri victricia signa, Begfegi cadem, calcata cadavera Dani:
Vique superfluo maduerunt sanguine campi.
Principis hic Zephro Cauroque parentibus ort
Cornipides crebris implent humilitibus auras,
Et gyros ducunt, gressus glomerantque superbos
Dum cupiunt nostri Martis servare lupatis.
Haccine sed pietas? heu dira piacula, primum
Neutrius Henricus situs hic, inglorius urna
Nunc jacet erectus, tumulum novus advena quarit
Frustra; nam regē tenues invidit arenas
Auri sacra fames, Regum metuenda sepulchris.*

E From hence he little Chawfey seeth, and hastneth for to see Faie Reading towne, a place of name, where Cloth's ywoven be.
This shewes our Aelfrids victorie, what time Begfeg was slaine;
With other Danes, whose carcasses lay trampled on the plaine;
And how the fields ydrenched were with blood upon them shed;
Where as the Prince in Stable now hath standing many a steede
Of noblest kind, that neigh and snort into the aire a lowd
Tracing the ring and keeping pace that stately is, and proud, Whiles they desire to learne with all in our warres for to serve,
F But where (alas) is piety? Such cursed deeds deserve Purged to be by sacrifice. A King of Normans race
Henry the first, entered heere, now turn'd out of his place,
An out cast lies dishonoured. Who seekes his tombe shall misse:
For Covetise envied that King the small mould which was his.
See see, how Princes monuments it ransacks where it is.

Scarce halfe a mile from Reading, betwixt most greene and flowring meadowes, the Kenet is coupled with the Tamis, who now runneth with a broader streame by a small village called Sunning, which a man would mervail to have beene the See of eight Bishops who had this shire & Wiltshire for their Diocesse (yet our Historians report as much) the same afterwards by Herman was translated to Sbirburne, and in the end to Salisbury, unto which Bishopricke this place still belongeth. Heereby falleth Ladden a small water into the Tamis, and not farre off standeth Laurents Waltham, where are to be seene the foote foundations of an old fort, and divers Romane coines often times digged up; and next to it Biltingsbere the inhabitation of Sir Henry Nevill issued from the Lords Abergevenny. From Sunning the Tamis passeth by Bisfleham, now called short, Bisham, at first a Lordship of the Knights Templars, then of the Montacutes, and amongst them, William the first Earle of Salisbury of his familie founded a Priory, wherein, some say, hee was buried. Certes his wife the daughter of the Lord Grandison was buried there, and in the Inscription of her tombe it was specified, that her father was descended out of Burgundie, cosin-german to the Emperour of Constantinople, the King of Hungary, and Duke of Bavaria, and brought into England by Edmund Earle of LANCASTER. Now is the possession of Sir Edward Hoby Knight, of me especially to be observed, whose singular kinnesse toward me the often consideration thereof shall keepe so fresh, that it shall never vanish out of my remembrance.

Tamis having now left Bisham behind it, fetcheth it selfe with a compasse about to a little towne named in the former ages Southe alington afterward Maiden-hill, and at this day Maidenhead, of the superstitious worshipping of I wote not what British Maidens-head, one of those eleven thousand Virgins, who as they returned from Rome into their country with Vrsula their leader, suffered as Martyrs at Colein in Germanie, under that scourge of God, Attila. Neither is this towne of any antiquity: for, no longer agoe then in our great Grandfathers daies, there was a Ferry in a place somewhat higher, at Babhams end. But after they had built heere a bridge of timber piles, it beganne to flourish with Innes, and goe beyond her mother Bray hard by, which notwithstanding is farre more ancient, as having given name to the whole Hundred. This parcell of the shire, I have beene of opinion that the BIBROCI, who yeelded themselves under Cesars protection, inhabited in times past: And why should I thinke otherwise? The reliques of them remaine yet most evidently in the name. For, BIBRACTE in France is now also drawn shorter into Bray: and not far from hence Cesar passed over the Tamis with his armie, as I will shew in due place, what time as the people of that small Canon put themselves to the devotion of Cesar. Certes, If a man should hunt for these Bibroci elsewhere, he should I beleve, hardly find them.

Within this Hundred of the * Bibroci, Windesore beareth a goodly shew: in the Saxon tongue, haply of the winding shore called Wynðlerþora for so it is named downe in the Charter of King Edward the Confessour, who in this forme of words made a grant unto the Monks of Westminster. To the praise of almighty God, I have granted as an endowment and a perpetuall Inheritance to the use and behoofe of those that serve the Lord, Windle shore with the appurtenances. And I have read nothing more ancient, concerning Windesore. But the Monks had not long held it in possession, when William of Normandie by making an exchange drew it backe to himselfe. For in this tenure goeth his Charter. With the consent and favour of the venerable Abbas of Westminster, I have made a composition for Windlefor to be the Kings possession, because that place seemed profitable and commodious by reason of water hard adjoining to it: and the wood fit for game, & many other particulars lying there meet & necessary for Kings: and a place very convenient to receive and entertaine the King: in lieu whereof I have granted to the Monks Wokendane and Ferings.

Surely a Princes seat cannot lightly have a more pleasant site, For, from an high hill that riseth with a gentle ascent, it enjoyeth a most delightfull prospect round about. Fore-right in the Front it overlooketh a vale lying out farre and wide, garnished

A garnished with corne-fields flourishing greene with meadowes, decked with groves on either side, and watered with the most mild and calme river Tamis. Behind it arise hills every where, neither rough nor over-high, attired, as it were with woods and even dedicated as one would say by nature to hunting game. With the pleasures of this place Princes were allured, very often to retire themselves hither: and heere was Edward the Third that most puissant King borneto conquer France: who heere built new out of the ground a most strong Castle in bignesse equall to a pretie Citie, fortified with ditches and bulwarks made of stone: and forthwith after he had subdued the French and Scots, held at one and the selfe same time John King of France, and David King of Scotland prisoners together in the same. This Castle is divided into courts: the inner more toward the East, containeth in it the Kings pallace, than which for the order and contriving, there can be no building more lightesome, nor more magnificent. On the north side, where it looketh downe to the river, Q. Elizabeth adjoyned a most pleasant Terrace, or open walking place. The utter base court hath at the very first entrance a most stately Church consecrated by King Edward the Third unto the blessed Virgine Marie and to Saint George of Cappadocia: but brought unto that sumptuous magnificence, which now we see it carrie, by King Edward the Fourth, and Sir Reginald Bray.

In this place, king Edward the third, for to adorne martiall prowesse, with honors, the guerdon of vertue, ordained that most noble order and society of Knights, whom (as some report) for his owne garter given forth as signall of a battaile that sped fortunately, hee called Knights of the Garter: who wear on their left legge somewhat under the knee a blew garter: carrying this Impresse wrought with golden letters in French; HENRY SOIT QUI MAL Y PENSE, and fasten the same with a buckle of gold as with the bond of a most inward society, in token of concord and unity, that there might bee among them a certaine consociation and communion of vertues. But others there be, that doe attribute it unto the garter of the Queent, or rather of Joan Countesse of Salisbury, a Lady of incomparable beauty, which fell from her as shee daunced, and the King tooke up from the floore: for, when a number of Nobles and Gentle men standing by laughed thereat, he made answer againe, that shortly it would come to passe that garter should be in high honour and estimation. This is the common and most received report: Neither need this seeme to be a base originall thereof, considering how, as one saith, Nobilitas sub amore jacet.

Nobility lies under love.

There be also, that would have the invention of this order to be much more ancient, fathring it upon King Richard the first, and are verily perswaded, that King Edward at length brought it into use againe: but how truly, I know not. Yet in the verie booke of the first Institution, which William Dethicke Garter, principall King of armes, a Gentleman most studious in all such things as concerne Honour, shewed unto me, thus we read. Richard cum contra Turcas & Agarenos, &c. that is, when K. Richard warred upon the Turkes and Saracens, Cypres and Acon, and was wearie of so long delay, whiles the siege continued long in wonderfull care & anxiety, as length upon a divine inspiration, by the coming in & apparition (as it was thought) of S. George, it came into his mind to draw upon the legs of certaine choise Knights of his a certaine Garter or tache of leather, such onely as he had then readie at hand, whereby they being distinguished, and put in minde of future glorie promised unto them, if they would the victorie, they might be stirred up, and provoked to performe their service bravely, and fight more valiantly: in imitation of the Romans, who had such varietie of Coronets, wherewith militarie men for divers and sundry causes, were rewarded accordingly: to the end that by these instigations (as it were) cowardise being shaken off, the valour of mind and courage of heart might arise and shew it selfe more resolute. But upon what occasion soever it beganne, the mightiest Princes of Christendome, reputed it amongst their greatest honour to be chosen and admitted into this companie: and since the first institution thereof, there have beene already received, and enrolled into this order, which consisteth of six and twentie Knights, two and twentie Kings, or thereabout, besides our Kings of England, who are named Sovereignes thereof: to speake nothing of Dukes, and others of most high calling, verie many. And here I am willing to set downe their names that were first chosen into this order, and be commonly called, the Founders of the Order: for, their renoune is not to be abolished, who in those daies for flow courage, and warlike prowesse, had few or no peeres, and were in that regard advanced to this honour.

On the left side of the Church, are the houses of the Custos, or Deane, and twelve Prebendaries. On the right side standeth an house, not unlike to the Græcians Py-tæum: wherein twelve aged militarie men, Gentlemen borne, are maintained: who wearing every day a red or skarlet kirtle, reaching down to there ankles, with aupper mantle of purple over it, are bound daily to be present at divine service, there to commend unto God in their prayers, the Knights of this Order. Betwixt the two Courts before said, there riseth up an high mount, on which is set a round tower, and hard by it ariseth another loftie tower, called Winchester tower, of William Wickham Bishop of Winchester, whom King Edward the Third made overseer of the works, when he built the Castle. Some report, that the said Wickham, after he had built and finished this Tower, in a certaine inner wall, engraved these words, This made Wickham: which maner of speech in the English tongue, that seldome maketh distinction of cases, carrieth such a doubtfull construction, that uncertaine it is, whether he made these buildings, or the buildings made him. Hereof information was given to the King by some privie back-biters for to worke him a displeasure; and that in such termes, as if Wickham did arrogantly challenge to himselfe all the honour of the building. Which when the King tooke in verie evill part, and sharply rebuked him for it: he made this answer, That he had not arrogated, and ascribed to himselfe the praise of so sumptuous, and princely an adifice, but accounted this building, and peere of wite to have bene the meanes of all his dignities and preferments: neither have I (quoth he) made this Castle, but this Castle hath made me, and from low estate raised me unto the Kings favour, unto wealth, and dignitie. Under the Castle toward the West and South, lieth the towne of good bigneffe and populous withall, which from the time of King Edward the Third began to flourish: and the other which standeth farther off, and is now called, Old Windsor, fell by little and little to decay. In which, (whiles William the First reigned, as we read in his booke) there were an hundred Hages, or houses, whereof two and twentie were quit from Gable, out of the rest there went thirtie haling. No other memorable thing is here to be found, but Eton, which is hereto adjoynd by a wooden bridge over the Tamis, and in it a faire Colledge, and a famous Schoole of good literature, founded and built by King Henrie the Sixth: wherein, besides the Provost, Eight fellowes, and the singing Choristers, there are three score Schollers, instructed in Grammar, and in due time perfected to the University of Cambridge.

Neither thinke much of your labour, to runne over these verses of Windsore, taken out of the Poem, entituled, The marriage of Tame and Isis, and penned certaine yeeres past: wherein father Tamisis endeavoureth to set forth, as well the dignity of the place, as the majestie of Queene Elizabeth, keeping her Court therein.

The reſt of * Barkſhire which lieth Southward from Windſor, is ſhadowed with woods, and thickets, commonly called, the Forreſt of Windleſor, in which the townes and villages ſtand but thinne (whereof Ockingham is of greateſt name, by reaſon of the bigneſſe thereof, and trade of clothing;) but very full it is of game in everie place. Now, for as much as we have oftentimes made mention, and ſhall ſtill, of the Forreſts: what a Forreſt is, and the reaſon of that name, if you deſire to know, (but ſee you laugh not thereat) take it heere out of the blacke booke of the Exchequer. A Forreſt is a ſafe harbor, and abiding place of deere or beaſts, not of any whatſoever, but of wilde, and ſuch as delight in woods: not in every place, but in ſome certaine and meet for that purpoſe, and hereupon a forreſt hath the name, as one would ſay, Fereſta, that is, a ſtation of wild beaſts. And incredible it is how much ground the kings of England have ſuffered every where to lie untilld, and ſet a part for to empale & encloſe ſuch deere, or, as they uſe to ſay, have afforeſted. Neither can I think, that any thing elſe was the cauſe thereof, but onely the overmuch delight in hunting, or to maintaine the Kings houſhold (although ſome attribute it to the infrequencie of the people to inhabit the country) ſeeing that ſince the Danes were heere, they for a long time afforeſted more and more, and for the maintenance, and keeping of ſuch places ordained moſt ſtraight lawes, and an overſeer, whom they cal, Protoforeſtarius, that is, Chiefe forreſter, or Maſter of the Forreſts, who ſhould heare cauſes belonging unto Forreſts, and puniſh either by death or loſſe of limb, whoſoever killed Deere within any parke or chaſe. But Iohn of Sarisburie ſhal in his own words tell you theſe things briefly out of his Polycraticon; that which you may marvell more at, to lay grins for birds, to ſet ſnares to allure them with nooze or pipe, or by any waies laying whatſoever to entrap or take them, is oftentimes by vertue of an Ediſt, made a crime, and either amerced with forfeiture of goods, or puniſhed with loſſe of limbe and life. You have heard that the fowles of the aire, and fiſhes of the ſea are common: But theſe ywis belong unto the King, which the Forreſt Law taketh hold of, and claimeth whereſoever they flie. With-hold thy hand, forbear and abſtaine leſt thou alſo bee puniſhed for treaſon, fall into the hunters hand as a prey. Husband-men are debarred their fallow fields whiles Deere have libertie to ſtray abroad, and that their paſture may bee augmented, the poore farmer is abridged, and cut ſhort of his grounds. What is ſowne, planted, or graſſed, they keepe from the husbandmen that bee tenants: both paſtorage from herdsmen, drovers and graziers, and Bee-hives they exclude from ſloury plots: yea, the very Bees themſelves are ſcarcely permitted to uſe their naturall libertie. Which courſes ſeeming too inhumane, were the occaſion otherwhiles of great troubles and uproares, ſo long, untill in the end by the riſing and revolt of the Barons, there was wreſted from King Henry the third, the Charter de Foreſta: wherein thoſe rigorous laws being made void he granted others more indifferent, whereunto they are bound even at this day, who dwell within compaſſe of the Forreſts. And from that time, two Juſtices were appointed for theſe cauſes, whereof the one overſeeth all Forreſts on this ſide the river Trent, the other, all the reſt beyond Trent as farre as Scotland, with great authoritie. Throughout all this Province or county (as wee find in the Survey booke of England,) The Taine or Kings Knight, holding of him as Lord, whenſoever he died, left unto the King for a reliefe all his armour, one horſe with a ſaddle, and another without a ſaddle. Gegufes.

THese Regions which hitherto we have travailed thorow, that is to say, of the Danmonij, Durotriges, Belgæ, and Attrebatij, what time as the Saxons bare Sovereigne rule in Britaine, fell to the Kingdome of the West-Saxons, which they in their language, called, Waj-ſ-beaxanpic, and themselves Geguſſir, of Cerdics Grandfather, who first erected this Kingdome. Whence they were termed Geſiſſi, and by others also Viſi-Saxones, from their West situation, like as the Westerne Gothes, are named Viſi-Gothi. These at the length in the best and flourishing time of the Empire, reduced the English Heptarchie into the Saxons Monarchie: which notwithstanding afterward, through the lither cowardise of their Kings, quickly aged, and soone vanished. So that herein, that may be verified which we daily see. The race or issue of the most valiant men, and noblest Families, like as the of-spring of plants, hath their springing up. their flowering and maturitie: and in the end begin to fade, and by little and little to die utterly.

REGNI

REGNI.

Ext unto the Attrebatii Eastward, called the people in Latine REGNI, by Ptolomee PHINOI, inhabited those Regions which we at this day, doe commonly terme Surry, and South-sex, with the Sea-coast of Hants-shire. As touching the Etymologie of this named, I will passe over my conceits in silence, because peradventure they would carry no more truth with them, than if I should thinke they were by Ptolomey, PHINOI, for that it was Regnum, that is, a Kingdome, and the Romans permitted the people thereof to remaine under a regall government. For, in this tract it was, that as Tacitus writeth, certaine Cities according to an old Custome of the people of Rome, were given to Cogidunus, a British King, that they might have even Kings also, as instruments to draw others into bondage and servitude. But this conjecture seemeth to my selfe not probable, and haply to others absurd, I utterly reject: and willingly embrace the Saxon original of these latter names: to wit, that South-sex, taketh denomination of the South-Saxons, and Suthrey of the South situation upon the River, for, no man may denie, that Suth-rey importeth so much, considering that Over-rey, in the old English tongue, signifieth, Over, or beyond the river.

SVTH-REY.

SVTH-REY, which Bede nameth Suthriona, commonly called Suthrey, and Surrey, and by the Saxons, of bordering South (upon the river, Suð-pea, for Suð, with them betokeneth the South, and pea a river or floud) from the West, boundeth partly upon Barkshire and Hantshire, from the South upon Suffex: and from the East on Kent: toward the North it is watered with the River Tamis, and by it divided from Middlesex.

A country it is not very large, yet wealthy enough, where it beareth upon Tamis, and lieth as a plaine and champion country: it yieldeth com meetely wel, and forrage abundantly, especially towards the South, where a continuall valley falling lowe by little and little, called in times past Holmesdale of the woods therein, runneth downe very pleasant to behold, by reason of the delectable variety of groves, fields, and meadows. On each side there be prety hills rising up a great way along in the country, parkes every where replenished with Deere, rivers also full of fish: whereby it affordeth for pleasure faire game of hunting, and as delightfome fishing. Likened it is by some unto a course freeze garment with a green guard, or to cloath of a great spinning and thin woven, with a greene list about it, for that the inner part is but baraine, the outward edge or skirt more fertill. In my perambulation through this shire, I will follow the Tamis and the rivers running into it as guides of my journey: so shall I be sure to omit no memorable thing, seeing that the places which are of greater marke and antiquitie doe all a-butte upon these rivers.

The Tamis (that we may follow his course with the streame, as it runneth downe) so soone as hee hath taken his leave of Barkshire passeth hard by Chertsey, which Beda calleth the Isle of Cerutus. Now scarce halfe an Island, unlesse it bee by waxes, waters: wherein, as in a place severed from all intercourse and commerce with men, Friethwald, as he calleth himselfe in the charter of the foundation, a perty Prince or Regent of the Province of Surrey, under Wolpber King of the Mercians, and Ethelwald Bishop of London in the first rising of the English primitive Church, founded a little monasterie, wherein for a time that most devout King Henry the sixth lay incarcerated, whom, being deposed from his Regal dignitie, the house of Yorke to establish their kingdome securely, deprived also of his life, and here without any honour, buried him. But King Henry the Seventh afterwards having translated his body to Windsor, and bestowed it in a new tombe, solemnized his funeralls after a princely manner, and so much admired his Godly and holy vertues (for, hee was the lively patterne of Christian piety and patience) that he dealt with Pope Julius, to have him made a Saint. But the reason why this tooke no effect was the Popes covetousnesse, who demanded too great a summe of money for a Kings Canonization, as they terme it, so that hee might seeme ready to grant those kind of honours not for the Princes holinesse sake, but for gold. A little beneath this, the river Wey runneth into Tamis, which flowing forth out of Hantshire, so soone as it is come into Suthrey visiteth Feornham, commonly termed Farnham, so named of much fence growing in that place: which Ethelwald King of the West Saxons to use his owne words Gave unto the Bishop and * Congregation of Winchester Church. Here, about the year of our Lord 893. King Elfred with a small power put to flight the Danes as they spoiled and harried the country: and afterwards when King Stephen, had granted leave to as many as sided with him to build Castles, Henry of Blou brother to King Stephen erected a spacious Castle upon an hill that overtopped the towne: which being a place of refuge for rebellious and seditious persons, King Henry the Third cast it downe: howbeit the Bishops of Winchester, unto whom it belonged built it up againe. And not farre from hence, at Waverley,

REGNORVAL

A William Giffard Bishop of Winchester founded an Abbey for Monkes of the Cistercian order commonly called, White Monkes. Which Abbey being a grand child as they termed it from Cisterce in Burgundy, was so fruitfull here in England that it was mother to the Abbeies of Gerondon, Ford, Tame, Cumb, and grandmother to Bordesley, Bidlesden, Bruner, Bindon, and Dunkewell. For so religious orders were wont to keepe in pedegree manner the propagation of their Orders, as a deduction of Colonies out of them. From thence, Wey holding on his course by Godelming, which King Elfred bequeathed unto Ethelwald his brothers sonne, not farre from the Manour of Cateshull, which Hamon of Gatton held to bee the Mareshall of harlors when the King came into those parts: not farre from Loseley, where wee saw a large faire house belonging to the family of the Mores, knights, within a parke; it cometh to Guilford, in the Saxon tongue Gulde-foppo, and in some copies, written Gegldford. A mercate towne it is now well frequented, and full of faire Innes, but in old time it was a royall mansion of the English Saxon Kings, which also that noble Ethelwald held as a legacie from his Uncle by the fathers side. The King hath now thereby a decaying house, and not farre from the river are to be scene the broken walles of an old large Castle. But in the midst of the towne there is a Church, the west end whereof made of arched worke, and embowed over head seemeth to bee very ancient. Heere, as it is to bee scene in William the first his booke, the King had seventy five Hages, that is, houses, wherein remained one hundred seventy and five men. But for nothing it is so famous, as for the treacherie, and crueltie of Goodwin Earle of Kent, who in the yeare of Christ 1036. When Elfrid King Etheldreds son, and heire apparent to the Crowne of England came out of Normandie to claime his right, entertained him with faithfull promise of safety, but forthwith hardly entreated him contrary to his word: For, sodainly in the dead of the night, hee surprised and put to death in this place fixe hundred Normans, who had accompanied the young Prince, by tithing them, as our Writers report. Neither slew hee every tenth man of them drawne by lot according to the old militarie custome, but even as hee had killed nine, he let the tenth man goe by: and even these tenth men thus reserved

D hee went over againe, and most cruelly retithed them. As for Elfred himselfe hee delivered him into the hands of Harold the Dane, who after hee had pulled both eies out of his head, over-layed him with irons, and kept him in close prison, even unto his dying day.

Pater Nominatum.

Where Caesar crossed the Tamis.

Wey beeing passed from hence with a long course Northward, sheweth nothing memorable besides Sutton, the residence of the Westons an ancient family of Knights degree bettered by an heire of T. Camel, Oking, where King Henry the seventh repaired and enlarged the Manour house beeing the inheritance of the Lady Margaret Countesse of Richmont his mother, who lived there in her later time, Newark sometime a small Priory invironed with divided streames: Pyriford, where in our remembrance Edward Earle of Lincolne Lord Clinton, and Admirall of England built him an house; and Ockham hard by, where that great Philosopher and father of the Nominals William de Ockham was borne and whereof hee tooke that name: as of the next village Ripley, G. de Ripley a ringleader of our Alchimists, and a mysticall impostor. But where this Wey is discharged into Tamis at a double mouth, Orelands a proper house of the Kings offereth it selfe to bee scene within a parke: neere unto which, Caesar passed over Tamis into the borders of Cassivelaunus. For, this was the onely place where a man might in times past goe over the Tamis on foote and that hardly too, which the Britaines themselves improvidently bewraied unto Caesar. For, on the other side of the river, there was a great power of the Britaines well appointed and in readinesse: and the very banke it selfe was fenced with sharpe stakes fastned affront against the enemye, and others of the same fort pitched downe in the channell, stucke covered with the river. The tokens whereof, saith Beda, Are scene this day, and it seemeth to the beholders that every one of them carrying the thicknesse of a mans thigh and covered over with lead, stucke unmoveable, as being driven hard into the bottome of the river. But the Romans catted the river with such force, when the water reached up to their verie chinnes, that the Britaines could not abide their violence, but left the banke and betooke themselves to flight. In this thing, I cannot bee deceived, considering that the river here is scarce fixe foote deepe, the place at this day of those stakes is called Coway-stakes, and Cæsar maketh the borders of Cassivelaunus where hee setteth downe his passage over the river to be about fourescore Italian miles from the sea which beateh upon the East-coast of Kent, where he landed: and at the very same distance is this passage of ours.

Within some few miles from thence the river Mole, having from the South side passed through the whole country, hasteneth to joyne with the Tamis; but at length being letted by overthwart hills, maketh himselfe a way under the ground in manner of mouldwarpe, like unto that famous river Anas in Spaine: whereof it may seeme it tooke name, seeing that creature living within the ground, is called also in English a Mole. But upon this river, there is not any thing of note, save onely a good way off from the spring and head of it, and neere unto an old port way of the Romans making which men call Stanystreet there stands the towne Aske, commonly Ockley: so-named of Okes where Ethelwolph the sonne of Egbert, who having bene professed in the holy Orders and releafed by the Popes authority, when hee had possession of his fathers kingdome by right of inheritance, joyed battaile with the Danes, fought with good successe, and slew all the valiant men amongst them: Yet did hee little, or no good to his native country, the Danes evermore renewing their forces still as they were overthrowne, like unto that serpent Hydra. A little from the fountaines where this river springeth, standeth Gatton which now is scarce a small village, though in times past it hath bene a famous towne. To prove the antiquitie thereof, it sheweth Roman coines degged forth of the ground, and fendeth unto the Parliament two Burgeses. Lower than it, is seated Rhie-gat, (which if a man interpret according to our ancient language, is as much as the Rivers course), in a vale running out farre into the East, called Holmesdale; the Inhabitants whereof, for that once or twice they vanquished the Danes as they wasted the country, are wont in their owne praise to chaunge this Rhythme.

The vale of Holmesdall, Never wonne, ne never shall.

This Rhie-gate carrying a greater shew for largenesse than faire buildings, hath on the South-side a Parke thicke sette with faire groves, wherein the right Noble Charles, Earle of Nottingham, Baron of Effingham, and Lord Admirall of England, hath a house, where the Earles of Warren and Southrey had founded a pretty Monasterie. On the East-side, standeth a Castle mounted aloft, now forlorne and for age ready to fall; built by the same Earles and of the vale wherein it standeth, commonly called Holmecastle: under which I saw a wonderfull vault carried under the ground of arch-work over head, hollowed with great labour out of a loft grinde and crombling stone, such as the whole hill standeth of. These Earles of Warren, as wee finde in the Offices or inquisitions held it in chiefe of the King * in their Baronic, * from the conquest of England. Hence runneth this river downe by Bathworth Castle, for which Sir Thomas Browne obtained of King Henry the Sixth the libertie of holding a Faire. For it is the habitation of the Brownes, Knights: one of which family since our grand-father can remember, when Sir Anthony Browne had married Lady Lucie the fourth daughter of John Nevil Marquess of Mont-gomery, Queene Mary honoured his sonnes sonne with the title of Vicomte Mont-gomery. Some few miles from hence Westward Effingham sheweth it selfe, the possession not long since of William Howard (son to that Noble Thomas Duke of Norfolk that triumphed over the Scots) who being created by Queene Mary Baron Howard of Effingham, &c made Lord High-Admirall of England, was first Lord Chamberlain unto Queene Elizabeth of most happy memorie, and then Lord privie Seale: whose sonne Charles now flourisheth, Lord great Admirall of England, whom in the year of our Lord 1597. the same Queene Elizabeth honoured also with the title of Earle of Nottingham, of whom more in my Annales, but now returne we to the river.

The Mole now being come as farre as Whitehill, whereon the Box tree groweth in great plenty, & the foote thereof hideth himselfe, or rather is swallowed up, and thereof the place is called the Swallow: but after a mile or two neere unto Letherbed bridge boyling up and breaking forth, taketh joy to spring out againe. So that the Inhabitants of this tract may boast as well as the Spaniards, that they have a bridge which feedeth many flocks of sheepe: For, this is a common by-word, most ripe in the Spaniards mouthes, as touching the place where their river Anas, now called Gadiana, hideth himselfe for ten miles together. Thus our Mole rising up a fresh hasteneth faire and softly by Stoke Dabernoun so named of the ancient possessors the Dabernouns gentlemen of great good note, afterward by inheritance from them the possession of the Lord Bray; and by Ascher sometimes a retrying place belonging to the Bishops of Winchester. And then very neare Molesey whereunto it giveth name, sheddeth himselfe into the Tamis.

After Tamis hath taken unto him the Mole, hee carrieth his streame Northwardly and runneth fast by Kingstone, called in times past Moreford, as some will have it; a very good mercate towne for the bigneffe, and well frequented; well knowne also in old time by reason of a Castle there belonging to the Clares Earles of Gloucester. Which towne had beginning from a little towne more ancient then it of the same name, standing upon a flat ground and subject to the inundation of Tamis. In which when England was almost ruined by the Danish warres, Athelstan, Edwin, and Ethelred were crowned Kings upon an open stage in the Market place, and of these Kings here crowned, it came to be named Kingstone, as one would say, The Kings Towne. Tamis now turning his course directly Northward, visiteth another place: which the Kings chose for themselves sometimes to sojourne at, which of the shining brightnesse they call shene: but now it is named Richmond, wherein, the most mighty Prince, King Edward the Third when he had lived sufficiently both to glory and nature, died, with sorrow that hee conceived for the death of that most valiant and Marriall prince his sonne, which sorrow pierced so deepe, and stucke so neere him and all England beside, that it farre exceeded all comfort. And verily at this time if ever else, England had a good cause to grieve: For, within one year after, it lost the true praise of military prowesse and of accomplished vertue: For, both of them by bearing their victorious armes throughout all France, struke so great a terrour where-soever they came, that as the father might most worthily with King Antiochus carrie the name of Thunder-bolt, so his sonne with Pyrrhus deserved to be named the Eagle. Heere also departed Anne wife to King Richard the Second, sister of the Emperour Wenzelau, and daughter to the Emperour Charles the fourth, who first taught English women the manner of sitting on horsebacke which now is used: whereas before time, they rode very unfeemly astride, like as men doe. Whose death also her passionate husband tooke so to the heart, that he altogether neglected the said house, and could not abide it.

Howbeit King Henry the Fifth readorned it with new buildings, and in Shene a pretty village hard by, he joynd thereto a little religious house of Carthusian Monks, which he called, The house of Iesu of Bethlems. But in the raigne of Henry the seventh, this Princely place was with a woefull sudden fire consumed almost to ashes; Howbeit rising up againe forthwith farre more beautifull and glorious as it were a Phoenix out of her owne ashes, by the means of the same King Henry: it tooke this new name Richmond, of the title hee bare, being Earle of Richmond, before he obtained the Crowne of England. Scarce had that Noble King Henry the Seventh finished this new worke, when in this place he yeilded unto nature, and ended his life; through whose care, vigilancy, policy, and forecasting wisdome for time to come, the State and common-weale of England hath to this day stood established and invincible. From hence likewise his sonnes daughter Queene Elizabeth a most gracious Ladie sinetic and foure yeares after, having lived fully to the contentment of nature, (For,

A Prince above her sex of manly courage, and high conceit, who lively resembled as well the royall qualities of her Grandfather, as she did his princely presence and countenance, the Worlds love, and joy of Britaine. And so farre was she, a woman though shee were, from degenerating and growing unlike her noble Progenitors in that continued course of their vertues, that if she surmounted them not, surely she equalled them to the full. Well, posteritie may one day hereafter be to thankfull as to yield heere a gracious credit (neither doe I heere by way of flatterie set a false colour and glosse upon the truth) that a Virgin for the space of fortie foure yeares, so ruled the royall Scepter, as that her subjects loved her, enemies feared her, and every one with admiration honored her, a thing in all foregoing ages of rare example. For, whose death England throughout, running all to teares, amid mones, and groines should have lien forlorne in most piteous case comfortlesse, had not presently upon her departure out of this world, the most mild and gracious King James (on whom as the true and undoubted heire to her Crowne all mens minds were set, and eies fixed with his sacred and bright beames shone unto us, and thereby put us into most comfortable hope of endlesse joy. Whom so long as we behold heere, wee beleeeve not that she is deceased. How farre the and floweth.

Why Tamis ebbeth and floweth so far within Land.

Thus farre swelleth the Tamis with the acceffe of the flowing tide of the sea, about lx. Italian miles by water from his mouth. Neither to my knowledge is there any other river in all Europe, that for so many miles within land feeleth the violence of the Ocean forcing and rushing in upon it, and so driving backe and with-holding his waters. to the exceeding great commodity of the inhabitants bordering thereupon. Whither this cometh by reason that from hence he hath in manner no crooked turnings and winding reaches, but with a more streight and direct channell carrieth his currant into the East, as being for the most part restrained, and kept in with higher banks, and dilating himselfe with a wider mouth than all other rivers, lyeth more expoid and open to the Ocean, which by that most swift whirling about of the coelestiall Spheres from East to West is forceably driven and carried that way (as sometimes I have beene of opinion) let Philosophers discusse, unto whom I willingly leave these matters and such like to handle. Yet some few verses as touching these places and this argument, have heere out of the Marriage betweene Tame and Isis, if haply they may content your taste:

*A dextra, nobis Richmondia, Shena vetustis
Celsa nitet, sapiens namque hanc Richmondia dici
Henricus voluit, sibi quod retulisset honorem Et titulos Comitū Richmondia jure paterno:
Hectoria Edwardi sed deslet funera nostri;
Proh dolor! hic illi regi mens libera cecidit
Corpore contempto, sedes aditura supernas.
Quem si non subito rapuissent ferrea fata,
Aut te Palesias rapuisset Gallia victor, Aut tibi Valesios.*

Then on the right hand Richmond stands, a faire and stately thing,
So cal'd of us, (but Shene of old) which name that prudent King
* Henry it gave, because to him it brought in fathers right
The Honor and the Scile, whereby, he Earle of Richmond hight.
But it of * Edward King (halas) our Hector, wailes the death,
Whose soule here freed from body which it scorn'd, with vitall breath,
Departed hence right willingly, in heaven to live for ay:
Whom had not cruell-fudden death untimely fetcht away,

* The seventh.

* The Third.

He would by sword have thee bereft, O France, of Valois line,
Or them of thee.

And after a few verses set betweene,

*Tamisis alternum sentit reditumque fugamque:
Huc refusus pelagi, quoties vaga Cynthia pronos
Occidit librat celi statione jugales.
Aut tenet oppositam varianti lumine plagam,
Pleuior increfcit celeremque recurrit in aestum:
Atque superbus ait, concedant flumina nobis,
Nulla per Europæ dotatas nomine terras
Flumina, tam longè sic certis legibus undas Alternas renouant, nisi fratres Scaldus, & Albis.*

Tamis heere by turnes alternative doth feele both ebbe, and flow
Of Sea, by course of wandering Moone that rules tide heere below.
As oft as the with each eight point of heaven above doth meete,
Or holds the points full opposit, as lights doe change and fleete.
He growes more full, and sooner hath recourse to flowing tide:
And then in pride of heart he saith. All rivers else beside Vaile unto me. No streame so farre through Europe keeps againe
His tide so just, unlesse the Scheld, and Elb my brethren twaine.

About foure miles from the Tamis within the Country, Nonefuch a retiring place of the Princes putteth downe, and surpasseth all other houses round about: which, the most magnificent Prince King Henry the Eighth, in a very healthfull place called Cuddington before, selected for his owne delight and ease, and built with so great sumptuousnesse and rare workmanship, that it aspireth to the very top of ostentation for shew; so as a man may thinke, that all the skill of Architecture is in this one piece of worke bestowed, and heaped up together. So many statues, and lively images there are in every place, so many wonders of absolute workmanship, and workes seeming to contend with Romane antiquities, that most worthily it may have, and maintaine still this name that it hath of [Nonefuch] according as Le-land hath written of it:

Hanc quia non habeant similem laudare Britanni Sapè solent, Nulliq; parem, cognomine dicunt.

The Britans oft are wont to praise this place, For that through all
The Realme they cannot shew the like, and Nonefuch they it call.

As for the very house selfe, so invironed it is about with Parkes full of Deere, E such daintie gardens and delicate orchards it hath, such groves adorned with curious Arbors, so pretty quarters, beds, and Alleys, such walkes so shadowed with trees, that Amenitie or Pleasantnesse it selfe may seeme to have chosen no other place but it: where she might dwell together with healthfulness. Yet Queene Mary made it over to Henry Fitz-Alan Earle of Arundell for other Lands: and he, when he had enlarged it with a Librarie passing well furnished, and other new buildings, passed over all his right when he died to the L. Lumley, who for his part spared no cost, that it might be truly answerable to the name: and from him now is it returned againe by compositions and conveiances to the Crowne. Neere hereunto (and worth the noting it is) there is a vaine of potters earth highly commended, and therefore the dearer sold, for the making of those crucibles and small vessels which Goldsmiths use in melting their gold.

Nor farre from hence the cleare rivelet Wandle in Latin * Vandalis, so full of the best Trouts, issueth forth from his head neare Cashalton and Wodcot where by a tuft of trees upon an hill-top there are to be seen manifest signes of a pretty towne, and diverse wells built of flint stones: Concerning the populoufnesse and wealth whereof the the neighbour Inhabitantes report very much: This in my conceit was that Cite which Ptolomee called Noviomagus, and the Emperour Antonine Noviomagus. Neither neede wee to seeke from else where prooffe hereof, but from the correspondence of distance. For as the old Itinerary noteth, it is ten miles from London, and twenty eight from Pagmarj now Maidston. Many a mile therefore were they out of the way that placed Noviomagus either at Buckingham, or at Guildford. This was a principall Cite of the Regni not knowne to Marinus Tyrinus a most ancient Geographer, whom Ptolomee taking upon him to censure, for that he had set Noviomagus of Britaine by Climate more North, and by account of miles more South than London.

Wandle while it is yet small receiveth his first increase by a rill springing at Croidon, in times past called Cradiden: which standeth under the hills is very well known, as well for the house of the Archbishops of Canterbury, unto whom it hath belonged now this long time; as for Char-coles which the townesmen make good chaffer of: The inhabitants report, that in old time there stood an house of the Kings in the West part of the towne neere unto Haling, where the husbandmen dig up otherwhiles rubble stone, which house the Archbishops having received it by gift from the King, transfused unto their owne neerer the river. And neere unto this, the right reverend father in God D. John Whitgift Archbishop of Canterbury of most praise worthy Memory in his pious affection founded and endowed with living a very faire Hospitall for the reliefe of poore people, and a schoole for the furtherance of learning. As for that sudden swelling water or Bourne which the common people report, to breake forth heere out of the ground, presaging, I wote not how, either dearth of corne, or the pestilence, may seeme not worthy once the naming, and yet the events sometime ensuing hath procured it credit. Neere unto this place stands Beddington, wherein is to be seene a very faire house beautified with a delightfull flow of right pleasant gardens and orchards, by Sir Francis Carew Knight: For, the ancient seat it is of the Carews, who being descended from the Carews of Atoulesful (of whom also are come the Carews of Devonshire) have for a long time flourished in this country: but especially since Sir James Carew matched in marriage with the daughter and one of the coheires of the Baron Hoo and Hastings. To digresse a litle from the river, Eastward from Croidon standeth Addington now the habitation of Sir Oliff Leigh wherby is to be seene the rubble of a Castle, of Sir Robert Aguilon from him of the Lords Bardolph, who held certaine lands here in fee by Scutancy to find in the Kings kitchen at the Coronation one to make a dainty dish which they called Mapigermoun, and Dilgerunt. What that was I leave to the skilfull in ancient Cookerie, and returne to the river. Wandle increased with Croidon water passing by Morden, divideth it selfe to water Merton, in the old English tongue Wespean, situate in a most fruitfull soile. A towne made famous in times past by the death of Kimulph King of the West Saxons who was by a Clito, that is, a Prince of the blood, slaine here in a small cottage of an harlot upon whom hee was enamoured, and Clito himself by K. Kimulphs followers immediately stabbed, suffered condigne punishment for his disloyall treachery. Now it sheweth onely the ruines of a Monastery, that K. Henry the First founded for blacke Chanons by the procurement of Gilbert High Sheriffe of Surry in the year 1127. which was famous for the Statute of Merton enacted here in the 21. of King Henrie the Third, and also for Water de Merton founder of Merton Colledge in Oxford borne and bred heere. Above Merton further from the river is seated Wibandune, now commonly Wimbledon: where, when once much prosperitie had hatched civill broiles among the English Saxons; after the British warres were now ceased; Eshelbert King of Kent struck up the first Alarme to vill warre against his owne country men: but Ceanlin King of the West Saxons discomfited him in this place with a mightie great slaughter and losse of his men having slaine his principall leaders Oslan and Kneben, of whom peradventure that corrochial rampier or fort which wee have heere seene of a round forme, is called Bensbury for Knebenburh.

But now, the greatest ornament of this place is that goodly house so beautifull for building, and so delectable for faire prospect and right pleasant gardens, which Sir Thomas Cecill Knight, sonne to that most prudent Counsellour of State Lord Burleigh, built in the year 1588. when the Spanish Armado made saile upon the coast of England.

Wandle now after a few miles entreth the Tamis, when it hath given name to Wandleworth, betwene Putney the native soile of Thomas Cromwell one of the flowing-stocks of fortune, and Batersey, sometimes in the Saxon tongue called Patpseja, and in latine Patricii Insula, that is, Patrickes Isle: and, which now wee seeke, an house of the Kings termed Kennington, whereunto the Kings of England in old time were wont to retire themselves, but now finde wee neither the name nor the rammell thereof. Then, is there Lambith or Lomehith, that is to say, a Lomy or clayish rode, or hith, famous in former times for the death of * Canutus the Hardie, King of England, who there amid his cups yielded up his vitall breath. For hee, being given wholly to banqueting and feasting, caused royall dinners foure times every day, (as Henry of Huntingdon, reporteth) to be served up for all his court, choosling rather to have his invited guests, to send away whole dishes untouched, than other commers unbidden to call for more viands to be upon his table. But now this place is of the greater name and more frequented by reason of the Archbishop of Canterburie his palace. For, Baldwine Archbishop of Canterbury about the year of Christ 1183. having made an exchange with the Bishop of Rochester, purchased a manour in this place wherein hee began to build a palace for himselfe and his successours: which they by little and little encreased. But when they went about to erect a collegiat Church heere also, good GOD, what posting was there to Rome with complaints and appeales, from the Monkes of Canterburie, how many fiery thunderbolts, menaces and censures were sent out from the Bishop of Rome against these Archbishops? For these Monkes were in bodily feare, least this would bee their utter undoing, and a prejudice unto them in the Elections of the Archbishops. Neither were these blustering stormes allaid, untill the said Church newly begonne was laid levell with the ground. Adjoyning hard to this, is the most famous mercate towne and place of trade, in all this shire which at this day they call, The Burrough of Southwarke, in Saxon speech Suthpeke, which is the Southworke or building; because it standeth South over against London, the Suburbs whereof it may seeme in some sort to bee: but so large it is and populous, that it gives place to few Cities of England, having bene as it were a corporation by it selfe, it had in our fathers daies Bayliffes, but in the reigne of King Edward the Sixth it was annexed to the Cite of London, and is at this day taken for a member as it were of it: and therefore, when wee are come to London, wee will speake more at large thereof.

Beneath this Burrough, the Tamis forsaketh Surry, the East bound whereof passeth in a manner directly downe from hence Southward, neere unto Lagham, which had their Parliamentarie Barons called Saint John de Lagham, in the reigne of Edward the First, whose Inheritance came at length by an heire generall to John Leddard: and some-what lower in the very angle well neere, where it bendeth to Southsex and Kent, stands Streborow Castle, the seate in ancient time of Lord Cobham, who of it were called, of Sterborow: where the issue proceeding from the bodies of John Cobham, Lord of Cobham and Cowling, and the daughter of Hugh Nevil, flourished a long time in glory and dignitie. For, Reginald Cobham in King Edward the thirds daies being created Knight of the Garter, was Admirall of the sea-coasts, from Tamis mouth West-ward. But Thomas the last male of that line wedded the Lady Anne, daughter to Humfrey the Duke of Buckingham, of whom he begat one onely daughter named Anne, married unto Edward Burgh, who derived his pedigree from the Percies, and Earles of Arhole: whose sonne Thomas made by King Henry the Eighth Baron Burgh, left a sonne behind him named William. And his sonne Thomas a great favourer of learning, and Lord Governour of Briell, Briell, Queene Elizabeth made Knight of the Garter, and Lord Deputy of Ireland, where hee honourably ended his life, pursuing the rebels. As touching Dame Eleanor Cobham descended out of this family, the wife of Humphrey Duke of Gloucester, whose reputation had a flawe, I referre you to the English Historie, if you please.

Earles of Surrey, who also are called Earles of Warren.

Now are wee to reckon up the Earles of this shire, William Rufus King of England made William de Warren, who had married his sister, the first Earle of Surrey: For in that Charter of his, by which hee founded the Priory of Lewis, thus wee read: Donavi, &c. that is, I have given and granted, &c. For the life and health of my Lord King William who brought mee into England, and for the health of my Lady Queen Mawd, my wives mother: and for the life and health of my Lord King William her sonne, after whose comming into England I made this charter, who also created me Earle of Surry, &c. whose sonne William succeeded and married the daughter of Hugh Earle of Vermandois, whereupon his posteritie (as some suppose) used the Armes of Vermandois, vz. Chequy Or and Azure. His sonne William dying in the Holy-land about the yeare 1148. had issue, a daughter onely, who adorned first William, King Stephen sonne, and afterward Hamelin the base sonne of Gefferey Plantagenet Earle of Anjou, both her husbands, with the same title. But whereas her former husband died without issue, William her sonne by Hamelin was Earle of Surry, whose posterie assuming unto them the name of Warrens bare the same title. This William espoused the eldest daughter, and a coheire of William Marescall Earle of Pembroch, the widow of Hugh Bigod, who bare unto him John, who slew Alan de la Zouch, in presence of the Judges of the Realme. This John, of Alice the daughter of Hugh le Brune, halfe sister by the mothers side of King Henry the third, begat William, who died before his father: and hee of Ioan Vere the Earle of Oxfords daughter begat John Posthumus, borne after his decease, and the last Earle of this house, who was styled, as I have seene in the circumscription of his seale, Earle of Warren, of Surry and of Strathern in Scotland, Lord of Bromfield and of Yale, and Count-palatine. But hee dying without lawfull issue in the twelfth yeare of Edward the thirds raigne, Alice his sister and heire wedded unto Edmund Earle of Arundell, by her marriage brought this honour of Surrey into the house of Arundells. For Richard their sonne who married in the house of Lancaster (after his father was wickedly beheaded for siding with his Sovereigne King Edward the Second, by the maligne envie of the Queene) was both Earle of Arundell and Surrey, and left both Kingdomes to Richard his sonne, who contrary-wife lost his head for siding against his Sovereigne King Richard the Second. But, Thomas his sonne, to repaire his fathers dishonour, lost his life for his Prince and country in France leaving his sisters his heires for the lands not entailed, who were married to Thomas Mowbray Duke of Norfolke, &c. to Sir Powland Lenthall, and Sir William Beauchampe, Lord of Abgeveny. After by the Mowbraies, the title of Surrey, came at length to the Howards. Howbeit, in the meane while after the execution of Richard Earle of Arundell, King Richard the Second bestowed the title of Duke of Surry upon Thomas Hil land Earle of Kent, which honour he enjoyed not long; For, while hee combined with others, by privie conspiracies to restore the same King Richard to his libertie and kingdom, the conspiracie was not carried so secretly, but contrary to his expectation brake forth and came to light: then fled hee, and by the people of Cirencester was intercepted and cut shorter by the head. After him Thomas Beaufort, Chancellour to the King, (if we give credit to Thomas Walsingham) bare this dignity. For, in the yeare of our Lord (as hee saith) 1410. The Lord Thomas Beaufort Earle of Surrey left this world. Now, let Walsingham in this point make good that which he writeth: for, in the Kings Records there is no such thing found, but onely this, that Thomas Beaufort about that time was made Lord Chancellour. But certaine it is, and that out of the Records of the Kingdom, that King Henry the Sixth, in the nine and twentie yeare of his raigne, created John Mowbray, the sonne of John Duke of Norfolke, Earle Warren and of Surry. And Earles of March in France.

And Richard second sonne of King Edward the Fourth having married the heire of Mowbray, received all the titles due to the Mowbraies by creation from his father. Afterward King Richard the Third, having dispatched the said Richard and by impious cruell meanes usurped the kingdom, that hee might by his benefits oblige unto him the house of the Howards, created in one, and the same day John Lord Howard, Duke of Norfolke as next cosin and heire to the Mowbraies and his sonne Thomas, Earle of Surrie: in whose offspring this honour hath ever since bene resplendent, and so continueth at this day.

SVSSEX.

Under suth-rey toward the South lieth stretched out in a great length Suth-sex, which also in times past the Regni inhabited in the Saxon tongue called Suð-sex, & at this day Suffex, which is as much to say, as the Region of the South Saxons, a word compounded of the site thereof Southward, and of the Saxons who in their Heptarchie placed here the second kingdome. It lieth upon the British Ocean all Southward with a streight shore (as it were) farre more in length than bredth: Howbeit it hath few harbours, by reason that the sea is dangerous for shelves, and therefore rough, and troublous, the shore also it selfe full of rocks, and the South-west wind doth tyrannize thereon, casting up beach infinitely. The sea coast of this countrie, hath greene hills on it mounting to a greater height, called the Downes, which because they stand upon a fat chalcie or kinde of marle yeeldeth corne abundantly.

The middle tract, garnished with medowes, pastures, corne-fields, and groves, maketh a very lovely shew. The hithermore and Northern side thereof, is loaded most pleasantly with woods, like as in times past the whole country throughout, which by reason of the woods was hardly passable. For, the wood Andradswald in the British language Coid Andred, taking the name of Anderida the City now, adjoining, tooke up in this quarter, a hundred and twentie miles in length, and thine in bredth; memorable for the death of Sigebert King of West Saxons, who being deposed from his royall throne, was in this place stabbed by a Swinheard, and so died. Many pretty rivers it hath, but such as springing out of the North-side of the shire forthwith take their course to the Ocean, and therefore not able to beare any weight of burden.

Full of iron mines it is in sundry places, where for the making and fining whereof, there bee furnaces on every side, and a huge deale of wood is yearly spent, to which purpose divers brookes in many places are brought to runne in one channell, and the dry medowes turned into pooles and waters, that they might bee of power sufficient to drive hammer milles, which beating upon the iron, resound all over the place adjoining. And yet the iron here wrought, is not in every place of like goodnesse, but generally more brittle than is the Spanish iron, whether it be by the nature, or timour and temper thereof. Howbeit, commodious enough to the iron Maisters who call much great ordnance thereof, and other things to their no small gain: Now whether it bee as gainfull and profitable to the common-wealth may bee doubted, but the age ensuing will bee better able to tell you. Neither want here glasse-houles, but the Glasse there made, by reason of the matter or making, I wot not whether, likewise nothing so pure and cleare, and therefore used of the common sort onely.

This whole region throughout, after the civill manner of partition is divided into sixe parts, which by a peculiar name they call Rapes, to wit, of Chichester, Arundell, Brembe, Levis, Pevensey and Hastings, every of which beside their hundreds, have a castle, river, and forrest of their owne. But for as much as the limits within which they are bounded bee not so well knowne unto mee, I am determined to take my way along the shore from West to East. For, the inner parts besprinkled with villages, have in manner nothing therein worth relation. In the very confines of Hantshire and this county, standeth Bosenham, commonly called Bosham, a place environed round about with woods and the sea together; where (as Bede saith) once the Scottish Monke had a verie small Cell, and in it, five or sixe religious men lived poorely, in service of the Lord, which many yeeres after was converted into a ring place of ease, for King Harold. tion, hee made out with a little barke into the maine sea, was with a contrary pirrie carried violently into Normandie, and there detained in hold, until he had by oth assured the Kingdome of England unto William of Normandie, after the death of King Edward the Confessor. Whereby he presently drew upon himselfe his owne ruine and upon England the danger of finall destruction. But, with what a crafty Ambassie or Acquivocation, that subtrill and captious catcher of syllables Goodwin Earle of Kent this Harolds father, caught this place, and how with a wily word-trap, hee deceived the Archbishop of Canterburie, Walter Mapæus, who lived not many yeares after shall out of his booke entituled Of Courtiers toies tell you in his owne verie words. *This Bofeam underneath Chichester, saith hee, Goodwin saw and had a minde to it: beeing accompanied therefore with a great traine of Gentlemen, hee comes smiling and jesting unto the Archbishop of Canterburie, whose towne then it was, My Lord, saith he, Give you mee * Bofeam? The Archbishop mervailing much what hee demanded by that question: I give you, answered, Bofeam. Then he forthwith, with that company of his Knights and Souldiours, fell downe, (as he had before taken order) at his feete, and kissing them with many thankes went backe to Bofeam, kept possession of it as Lord by strong hand, and having the Testimony of his friends and followers, praised in presence of the King the Archbishop as Donor thereof, and so held it peaceably. Afterwards as wee read in Testa Nevilli (which was an Inquisition of Lands made in King Johns time) King William, who attained to the conquest of England, gave this unto William Fitz Aucher and to his heires in fee farme paying out of it yearly into the Exchequer fortie pounds of silver tried and weighed; and after that William Marefcall held it as his inheritance. Chichester in the British tongue named Caercci, in the English Saxon language Cirran-cear-cep, in Latine Cicestria, lieth farther within, at the same nooke in a Champion plaine. A Cittie large enough, and walled about, built by Cissa a Saxon the second King of this Province and of him so named. For Cissan-Ceaſter is nothing els, but the Cittie of Cissa: whose father ælla, was the first Saxon that here erected a Kingdome. Yet was it before the conquest of small or no name, and knowne onely by a monasterie of Saint Peter and a little Nunnerie. But in the reigne of William the first, as wee read in the Domes-day-booke, there were in this, one hundred Hages, and this Cittie was in the hand of Earle Roger * and there are in the said * three-score Mansions houses more than had bene before. It paid fifteene pounds to the King, and ten to the Earle. After this, when during the reigne of the said William the first, a decree was enacted, that Bishops Sees should be translated out of small townes unto places of greater name and resort, it was graced with the Bishops residence which was before at Selfey, and beganne to flourish: not many yeares after Bishop Raulfe built there a Cathedrall church, which before hee had fully finished it, was sodainely by mishap of a feare fire burnt downe. Yet by his endeavour and the bounteous liberality of King Henrie the first, it was raised up againe, and now, beside a Bishop, it hath also a Deane, a Chaunter, a Chancellor, a Treasurer, two Archdeacons and thirty Prebendaries. And at the same time the verie Cittie it selfe beganne to flourish, and had growne indeede to a most wealthie estate, but that the haven is badde and somewhat to farre off, and in that regard not so commodious: which neverthelesse the Cittizens goe now in hand to make more convenient by digging of a new channell. It is walled about in a circular round forme. The Lavant a pretty riveret running hard by it, on the West and South sides. Foure gates it hath opening to the foure quarters of the world: from whence the streets lead directly and crosse themselves in the mids, where the market is kept, and where Bishop Robert Read, erected a faire stone market place, supported with pillars round about. As for the Castle that stood not farre from the North gate, it was in times past the habitation of the Earles of Arundell, who hereupon stiled themselves, Earles of Chichester: but afterwards it became converted into an house of the Franciscan Friers. All that space which lieth betweene the West and South gates, is taken up with the Cathedrall Church, the Bishops palace, and the Deanes and Prebendaries houses. All which about King Richard the*

First his time were burnt againe. And Seffride the second Bishop of that name reedified all anew. The Church it selfe truly is not great, but very faire and neat, having a spire steeple of stone, rising up passing high, and in the South Crosse like the Church, of the one side is artificially portraied, and depainted the historie of the Churches foundation, with the Images of the Kings of England: on the other, the Images of all the Bishops, as well of Selfey as of Chichester, at the charges of Robert Shirburne Bishop, who greatly adorned and beautified this Church, and every where for his Empresse, set these Mots CREDITE OPERIBVS, that is, TRUST ME ACCORDING TO THEIR DEEDS; and DILEXI DECOREM DOMVS TVAL DOMINE, that is, I HAVE LOVED (O LORD) THE BEAVTIE OF THY HOUSE. Neither hee onely adorned the Lords house, but repaired also the Bishops house. But that great high tower which standeth neere unto the west dore of the Church, was built by R. Riman, as the report goeth (when he was forbidden to erect a castle at Aplerham his habitation hard by) of those stones, which for that Castle he had provided afore. Neere the haven of Chichester is W. Witering, where, as the monuments of the Church testifie, Alla the first founder of the Kingdome of Suth-sex arrived. Selfey before said, is somewhat lower in the Saxon tongue, Seal-sey, that is to say, The Isle of Sea-calves, (for these in our language wee call Scales, which alwaies seeke to Islands, and to the shore, for to bring forth their young, but now it is most famous for good cockles, and full Lobsters. A place (as Beda saith) compassed round about with the Sea, but onely in the West side, where it hath an entrie into it by land, as brut as a slings cast. It was reckoned by Survey taken, to containe fourscore and seven Hides of Land, when Edilwalch King of this Province gave it to Wilfride Bishop of Yorke, whiles hee was in exile: who first preached Christ unto this people, and as he writeth, not only by baptisme saved from thraldome under the divell, two hundred and fiftie bond-men, but also by giving freedome, delivered them from the yoke of bondage under man. Afterwards K. Cedwalla, who vanquished Edilwalch, founded here a Minster, and beautified it with an Episcopall See, which by Stigand the two and twentieth Bishop, was translated to Chichester, where it now flourisheth, and doth acknowledge Cedwalla to bee the founder. In this Isle remaineth onely the dead carkeasse, as it were, of that ancient little citie, wherein those Bishops sat: and the same hidden quite with water at everie full sea, but at a low water, evident, and plaine to be seene.

Then maketh the shore way for a river, which out of Saint Leonards Fort stretcheth downe, first by Amberley, where William Read Bishop of Chichester, in the raigne of Edward the third, built a castle for his successours: and so from thence by Arundell, seated on the hanging of an hill, a place greater in name than deede, and yet is not that name of great antiquitie: for before Alfreds dayes, who bequeathed it by testament to Anthelme his brothers sonne, I have not read it, so much as once named. Unlesse perhaps I should thinke, that Portus Adurni, is corruptly so called, by transposition of letters, for Portus Arundi. The reason of this name is fetched neither from that fabulous horse of Sir Beavois of Southampton, nor of Charadum, a promontorie in Denmarke, as Goropius Becanus hath dreamed, but of the valley or dale, which lieth upon the river Arun, in case Arun bee the name of the river, as some have delivered, who thereupon named it in Latine, Arundina vallis, that is, Arundale. But all the fame it hath, is of the Castle, that flourished under the Saxon Empire, and which (as we read) presently upon the coming in of the Normans Roger Montgomery repaired, who thereupon was stiled, Earle of Arundell. For, a stately place it is, both by naturall situation, and also by mans hand verie strong. But his sonne Robert de Belismo, who succeeded his brother Hugh, being by King Henrie the first proscribed, lost that, and all his other dignitie. For, when he had perfidiously raised warre against the King, he chose this Castle for his surest hold, while the warre lasted, and fortified the place with many munitions, but speeded no better than traitours use to doe. For, the Kings forces environing it everie way, at the last wonne it. Whenas Robert now had forfeited his estate, and was banished, the King gave this castle, and all his Lands besides unto * Adeliza, daughter to Godfrey Barbarus of Lorraine, Duke of Lorraine and Brabant, for her Dowrie; whom he tooke to be his second wife. In whole commendation a certaine English man in that unlearned age, wrote these not unlearned verses.

Ipsa referre parans Musa, stupore riget.
Quid Diadema tibi, pulcherrima, quid tibi gemma?
Pallet gemma tibi, nec diadema nitet.
Deme tibi cultus, cultum natura ministrat:
Non exornari forma beata potest.
Ornamenta cave, nec quicquam luminis inde
Accipis, illa micant lumine clara tuo;
Non puduit modicas de magnis dicere laudes,
Nec pudeat Dominam te precor esse meam.*

When Muses mine thy beauties rare, (faire Adeliza Queene Of England) readie are to tell, they starke astonied beene. What booteth thee so beautifull, gold-crowne or pretious stone? Dimme is the Diademe to thee, the gemme hath beautie none. Away with trimme and gay attire; nature attireth thee, Thy lovely beautie naturall, can never better be. All Ornaments beware; from them no favour thou dost take; But they from thee their lustre have, thou dost them lightsome make. I shamed not on matters great to set small praises heere, Bath not, but deigne (I pray) to be my Sovereigne Ladie deere.

She, after the Kings death, matched in marriage with *William de * Albeney*, who taking part with Maud the Empresse against King Stephen, and defending this Castle against him, was in recompence of his good service, by the said Maud the Empresse and Ladie of Englishmen, (for this title she used) created Earle of Arundell: and her sonne King Henrie the Second gave the whole Rape of Arundell to that William: To hold of him by the service of fourescore and foure Knights fees, and one halfe. And to his sonne William, King Richard the first granted, in such words as these, The Castle of Arundell with the whole Honor of Arundell, and the Third penny of the Plee out of Sussex, whereof he is Earle. And when after the fifth Earle of this surname, the issue male failed, one of the sisters and heires of Hugh the fifth Earle was married to Sir Iohn Fitz-Alan, Lord of Clun, whose great graund sonne Richard, For that he stood seised of the Castle, Honour and Lordship of Arundell in his owne demesne as of Fee, in regard of this his possession of the same Castle, Honour and Seignorie, without any other consideration or Creation to be an Earle, was Earle of Arundell and the name, state and honor of the Earle of Arundell, &c. Peaceably he enjoyed: as appeareth by a definitive judgement given in Parliament, in the behalfe of Sir Iohn Fitz-Alan challenging the Castle and title of Arundell by force of an entaile against Iohn Mowbray, Duke of Norfolke the right Heire, in the neere degree. Whereby it was gathered, that the name, state and dignitie of Earle, was annexed to the Castle, Honour and Seignorie of Arundell, as it is to be seene in the Parliament Rolls of King Henry the Sixth, out of which I have copied forth these notes word for word. Of these Fitz-Alans, Edmund second Earle sonne to Richard married the heire of the Earle of Surry, and was beheaded through the malicious furie, of Queene Isabell not lawfully convicted, for that hee opposed himselfe in King Edward the Seconds behalfe against her wicked practices. His sonne Richard petitioned in Parliament to be restored to blood, lands, and goods, for that his father was put to death not tried by his Peeres according to the law and great Charter of England: nevertheless whereas the attainder of him was confirmed by Parliament, hee was forced to amend his petition, and upon the amendment thereof, hee was restored by the Kings meere grace. Richard his sonne, as his grandfather died for his Sovereigne, lost his life for banding against his Sovereigne, King Richard the Second. But Tho. his sonne more honourably ended his his life serving King Henrie the Fifth valerously in France, and leaving his heires generall; Sir Iohn of Arundell Lord Maltravers his next cofin, and being obtained of King Henrie the fixt the Earldome of Arundell, as we even now deduced, and also was by the said King for his good service created Duke of Towre. Of the succeeding Earles I find nothing memorable. Henrie Fitz Alan the seventh and last Earle of that surname lived in our daies, in great honor as you shall see. After whom leaving no issue male Philip Howard his daughters sonne succeeded, who not able to digest wrongs and hard measure offered unto him, by the cunning sleights of some envious persons, fell into the toile and net pitched for him, and being brought into extreame perill of his life, yeelded up his vitall breath in the Tower. But his sonne Thomas a most honorable young man, (in whom a forward spirit and fervent love of vertue and glorie, most befeeming his nobility, and the same tempered with true courtseie shineth very apparently) recovered his fathers dignities being restored by King Iames, and Parliament authoritie.

Besides the Castle and the Earles, Arundell hath nothing memorable. For the Colledge built by the Earles, which there flourished, because the revenue or living is alienated and gone, now falleth to decay. Howbeit, in the Church are some monuments of Earles there enterred, but one above the rest right beautifull, of Abasser, in which lieth in the mids of the Quire Earle Thomas, and Beatrice his wife daughter of Iohn King of Portugall. Neither must I overpasse this Inscription faire guilt, set up heere in the Honor of Henrie Fitz-Alan the last, Earle of this because some there be whom liketh it well.

As for the river Arun, which springing out of the North part of the Shire runneth heereby, it is encreased by many brooks falling into it from all sides, but the cheefe of them is that which passeth beside Cowdrey, a very goodly house of the Vicounts Montacute, which for building oweth much to the late Vicount, & formerly to Sir William Fitz-Williams, Earle of South-hampton. marriage the daughter and heire of Iohn Bohun unto Sir David Owen Knight, the sonne of Owen Theodor, with a rich inheritance. These Bohuns (to note so much by the way for the antiquity of a word now growne out of use) were by inheritance for a good while the Kings Spigurnells, that is, The Sealers of his writts, which office together with Serjeancie of the Kings chappell, Iohn de Bohun the sonne of Franco retained unto King Edward the First, as wee reade in an old Charter made, as touching that matter. Then this river leaveth about a mile off Petworth which together with one and twenty Knights fees William de Albeney Earle of Arundell, bestowed upon Ioscelin of Lovaine the Brabander, brother to Queene Adeleza, and the younger sonne of Godfrey Duke of Brabant, descended from the stocke of Charles the Great, what time as hee tooke to wife Agnes the onely daughter and heire of the Percies. Since which time, the posterity of that Iosceline, having assumed the name of Percie, (as I will els where shew) held it. A Familie, I assure you very ancient and right noble, which deriveth their pedigree from Charles the great more directly, and with a race of Ancestors lesse interrupted, than either the Dukes of Lorraine Or of Guise that so highly vaunt themselves thereupon. Iosceline aforesaid, as I have seene it in his Donations, used this title: Ioscelin of Lovain, brother to Queene Adeleza, and Castellan of Arundell. And here about the Familie of Dantry, Or De alu ripa hath bene of right worshipfull esteeme, as on the other side of the river the name of Goring at Burton, who were acknowledged founders of Hardham Or Hordham a Priory of blacke Canons, a little off. Where this Arun meeteth with another river of a deeper and bigger streame, which springeth neare Horscham an indifferent mercat, which some suppose to have taken name from Horsa the brother of Hengist, who were the first leaders of the English Saxons into this isle of Britaine. Thus Arun increased, with sundry creekings, by Arundell before mentioned, holdeth on his course to the sea.

As the shoare giveth backe from the mouth of Arun, inwardly is Michelgrove, that is, Great grove, the heire generall whereof so surnamed, was married to Ihon Shelley, whereby, with the profession of the law, and a marriage with one of the coheirs of Beknap the familie of Shelley was greatly enriched: Offington is not farre off well knowne by his ancient possessor the West's Barons de la Ware. This of the West's is noble and ancient Familie, whose state beeing bettered by marriage with the heire of * Cantlow of Hemston and Fitz-Reginald Fitz Herbert, was adorned also with the title of Baron, by the heire generall of the Lord de la Ware. Hard by, there is a son compassed about with a banke rudely cast up, wherewith the Inhabitants are persuaded that Caesar entrenched and fortified his camp: But Cisburie the name of the place, doth plainly shew and testifie, that it was the worke of Cissa: who beeing of the Saxons line the second King of this petty kingdome, after his father Aella, accompanied with his brother Cimen, and no small power of the Saxons, at this shoare arrived and landed at Cimenshore, a place so called of the said Cimen, which now hath lost the name: but that it was neere unto Wittering, the charter of the donation which King Cedwalla made unto the Church of Selfey, most evidently prooveth. Another fort likewise two miles from Cisburie is to be seene, which they use to call Chenburie.

As you goe forward, standeth neere unto the sea, Broodwater, the Baronie of the Lords of Camois, who from the time of King Edward the First, flourished unto the daies of King Henrie the Sixt, what time the inheritance came by heires generall unto the Lewknors & Radmilds. Out of this familie (a thing neither in that age, nor in ours ever heard of (or exampled before) Sir Iohn Camois the son of the Lord Raulph Camois, of his owne free-will (the verie words these be in effect, exemplified out of the Parliament Records) gave and demised his owne wife Margaret, daughter and heire of Iohn de Gaidesden unto Sir William Panell Knight, and unto the same William, gave granted, released and quit claimed all the goods and chattels, which she hath, or otherwise hereafter might have: and also whatsoever was in his hands of the foresaid Margaret's goods, and chattels with their appurtenances: so that neither he himselfe, nor any man else in his name, might

A make claime, or challenge any interest, nor ought for ever, in the foresaid Margaret from hence forth, or in the goods and chattels of the said Margaret: Which is as much, as in one word they said in old time, * Et omnia sua secum haberet, That she should have away with her all that was hers. By which graunt, when shee demanded her dowie in the Manour of Torpull which had been the possession of Sir Iohn Camois her first husband, theregrew a memorable suite and controversie in Law: but wherein shee was overthrowne and sentence pronounced. That she ought to have no dowie from thence: upon a Statute made against women absenting themselves from their husbands, &c.

B These matters, I assure you, it goes against my stomacke to relate, but yet I see, it was not for nought that Pope Gregorie long since wrote unto Lanfranke Archbishop of Canterburie, How hee heard say, there were some among the Scots that not onely forsooke, but also sold their wives, whereas in England they so gave and demised them.

Somewhat lower upon the shore appeareth Shoreham, in times past Scope-ham, which by little and little fell to bee but a village, at this day called Old Shoreham, and gave encrease to another towne of the same name, whereof the greater part also being drowned and made even with the sea is no more to be seene: and the commodiousness of the haven by reason of bankes and bars of sand cast up at the rivers mouth quite gone: whereas, in foregoing times it was wont to carrie ships with full saile as farre as to Brember, which is a good way from the sea. This Brember was a castle sometime of the Breoses: For, King William the first gave it unto William de Breose, from whom those Breoses are descended, who were Lords of Gower and Brecknock: and from them also, both in this Countie and in Leicestershire, are come the Families of the Shirleys, Knights. But now in stead of a Castle, there is nothing but an heape of rubble and ruines. A little from this Castle lieth Stening, a great mercate, and at certaine set daies much frequented, which in Alfred's will, unless I be deceived, is called Steningham, in latter times it had a Cell of Black Monkes wherein was enshrined S. Cudman an obscure Saint, and visited by pilgrims with oblations.

D That ancient place also, called PORTVS ADVINI, as it seemeth is scarce three miles from this mouth of the river: where, when the Saxons first troubled our sea with their piracies, the Band called Exploratorum under the Roman Emperours kept their Station; but now it should seeme to be choked, and stopped up with huge heapes of beach gathered together. For, that this was Ederington a pretie village, which the said Alfred granted unto his younger sonne, both the name remaining in part, and also certaine cottages adjoining now called Portslade, that is, The way to the Haven, doe after a sort perswade: to say nothing, how easily they might land E heere, the shore being so open and plaine. And for the same cause, our men in the reign of King Henrie the Eighth, did heere especially wait for the Frenchmens galleies all the while they hovered on our coasts and upon the sudden set one or two cottages on fire at Brightbelmsted, which our ancestours the Saxons termed Brightweal-mep-tun, the very next road or harbour thereunto.

Some few miles from hence, there dischargeth it selfe into the sea a certaine river, that hath no name, arising out of S. Leonards forrest neere unto Slaugham, the habitation of the Coverts, who in King Henrie the third his daies flourished in this quarter, with the degree of Knight-hood; thence by Cuckfield to Linfeld, where in former ages was a small Nunnery; and so by Malling some-time a Manour appurtenant to the Archbishops of Canterburie, to Lewis, which peradventure hath his name of pastures called by the English Saxons Lejpa. This for frequency of people and greatnesse is reputed one of the chiefe towns of the Countie: Seated it is upon a rising almost on every side: That it hath bene walled there are no apparant tokens. Southward it hath under it, as it were, a great suburb called South-over, another Westward, and beyond the river a third Eastward called Cliffe because it is under a chalkie cliffe. In the time of the English Saxon government, when King Ashelstan made a Law that money should not be coyned but in good townes, he appointed two two minters, or coyners for this place. In the reigne of King Edward the Confessor it paid fixe pounds and foure shillings * de Gablo et Thelouco. The King had there one hundred twenty seven Burgars. Their custome and manner was this, If the King minded to send his souldiers to sea, without them: of all them, whose lands soever they were collected twenty shillings, and all those had they that in their ships kept armour. Who sellen a horse within the Burgh giveth to the Provost one penny, and the buier, another. For an oxen cow one halfe penny, in what place so ever he buieth within the Rape. He that sheddeth blood maketh amends for seven shillings. Hee that committeth adulterie or a rape, for eight shillings and foure pence, and the woman as much. The King bath the Adulterer, The Arch-bishop, the woman: when the mint or money is made new: every minter giveth twentie shillings. Of all these payments two third parts went to the King, and one third part to the Earle. William de Warren the first Earle of Surrie built here a large Castle on the highest ground for most part with flint and chalke. In the bottom of the towne called Southover he founded to the honour and memory of Saint Pancrace a Priorie, and stored it with Cluniach Monkes, In regard of the holinesse, religion, and charitie which he found in the Monasterie of Clugni in Burgundie (for these be the words taken out of the very originall instrument of the foundation) Whiles going in pilgrimage together with his wife for religion, he turned in, and lodged there. But this is now turned into a dwelling house of the Earle of Dorset. Howbeit there remaine still in the towne fixe Churches; amongst which not farre from the Castle there standeth one little one all desolate, and beset with briars and brambles: in the walles whereof are ingraven in arched work certaine rude verses in an old and over-worne character: which implice thus much, the one Magnus descended from the bloud roiall of the Danes, who embraced a solitarie life, was there buried: But behold the verses themselves, imperfect though they be, and gaping as I may so say, with the very yawning joynts of the stones.

Which peradventure should be thus read.

About 346. yeeres since this place became famous for the mortall and bloudie battaile betweene K. Henrie the third, and the Barons: in which, the prosperous beginning of the fight on the kings side, was the overthrow of the kings forces. For, whiles prince Edward the kings son, breaking by force through certain of the Barons troupes, carelessly pursued the enemies over far, as making sure account of the victory: the Barons having reinforced themselves, giving a fresh charge, so discomfited, and put to flight the Kings armie, that they constrained the King to accept unequal conditions of peace, and to deliver his sonne Prince Edward with others into their hands. From Lewis the river, as it descendeth, so swelleth, that the bottom cannot containe it, and therefore maketh a large mere, and is fed more full with a brooker falling from Laughon, a seat of Pelham, a family of especial respect, by Gline that is in the British tongue, the vale, the habitation of Morleyes, whose antiquitie the name doth testify. And afterward, albeit it gathereth it selfe into a channell, yet often times it overfloweth the low lands about it to no small detriment. Not farre from the said mere, Furle sheweth it selfe a principall mansion of the Gages, who advanced their estate by the marriage of one of the heires of Saint Clare, Princes favour, and Court Offices.

The shore next openeth it selfe at Cuckmere, which yet affordeth no commodious haven, though it be fed with a fresh, which insulateth Michelham, where Gilbert de Aquila, founded a Priory for black Chanons. And then at East-bourn the shore ariseth into so high a Promontory, called of the beach Beachy-points, and Beau-cliffe (for the faire shew being interchangeably compounded with rowe, of chalke and flint) that it is esteemed the highestcliffe of all the South coast of England. As hitherto from Arundell, and beyond, the countrey along the coast: for a great breadth, mounteth up into high hilles, called the Downes, which for rich fertilitie giveth place to few valleys, and plaines: so now it falleth into such a low leuell and marsh, that the people think it hath been over-flowed by the sea. They call it Pevensey Marsh, of Pevensey the next towne adjoining, which lieth in the plaine somewhat within the land upon a small river, which often times overlaieth the lands adjacent. In the old English Saxon Language, it was walled, Peopenrea, in the Norman speech Pevensell, now commonly, Pemsey: It hath had a meane haven, and a faire large castle, in the ruinous walles whereof, remaine great bricks, such as the Britans used, which is some argument of the antiquitie thereof. It belonged in the Conquerours time to Robert Earle of Moriton, halfe brother by the mothers side to the Conquerour, and then had fiftie and six Burgeses. After the attainder of his Sonne William Earle of Moriton, it came to King Henrie the First, by Escheat. In the composition betweene Stephen, and King Henrie the second both towne, and castle with whatsoever Richard de Aquila, had of the Honor of Pevensey, which after his name, was called Honor de Aquila, and Baronia de Aquila, or of the Eagle, was assigned to William Sonne to K. Stephen. But he surrendred it with Normich into King Henrie the Seconds hand, in the yeere 1158, when he restored to him all such Lands as Stephen was seased of before hee usurped the crowne of England. After some yeeres King Henrie the third, over-favouring the forrainers granted the Honor de Aquila (which had fallen to the crowne by Escheat, for

for that Gilbert de Aquila had passed into Normandie, against the Kings good will to Peter Earle of Savoy the Queenes uncle. But he fearing the envie of the English against forrainers relinquished it to the King, and so at length it came to the Duchy of Lancaster. Inward from Pevenssey is seated Herst in a Parke among the woods, which name also it hath of the woody situation: For, the ancient English-men called a wood Hýpýr. This was immediately after the Normans entry into England the seat of certain noble gentlemen, who of that place were a good while named de Herst, untill William the sonne of Walleran de Herst, tooke unto him the name Monceaux, of the placehaply where he was borne, an usuall thing in that age: whereupon that name also was adnexed unto this place, which ever since was of the Lord, termed Herst Monceaux. From whose Posteritie by heire generall it descended hereditarily to the Fienes. These Fienes, called likewise Fenis, and Fienles, derive their pedigree from Ingelram de Fienes, who had wedded the heire of Pharumuse of Boloigne, of the houle of the Earles of Boloigne in France. About the time of King Edward the Second, Sir John Fienes married the heire of Monceaux, his sonne William married one of the heires of the Lord Say, his sonne likewise the heire of Batistford, whose sonne Sir Roger Fienes married the daughter of Holland, and in the first year of King Henrie the Sixt built of bricke the large, faire, uniforme, & convenient house heere Castle-like within a deepe moate. The said King Henrie the Sixt, Accepted, declared and reputed Sir Richard Fienis sonne of the said Sir Roger, to be Baron of Dacre. And the same tittle, King Edward the fourth chosen Arbitratour and Umpire betwene him & Sir Humphrey Dacre, awarded & confirmed to the said S. Richard Fienis, and to the heires of his bodie lawfully begotten; for that he had married Joane the cousin and next heire of Thomas Baron Dacre; and to have precedence before the Dacre of Gilestand heire male of the family. Since which time the heires lineally descending from him being enriched by one of the heires of the Lord Fitz-Hugh, have enjoyed the honor of Baron Dacre, untill that very lately George Fienis Lord Dacre sonne to the unfortunate Thomas Lord Dacre died without issue, whose only sifter and heire Margaret, Sampson Lennard Esquire a man both vertuous and courteous tooke to wife, and by her hath faire issue. In whose behalfe it was published, declared, and adjudged by the Lords Comissioners for Martiall causes, in the second year of the raigne of King Iames, with his privy, and assent Royall, That the said Margaret ought to beare, have, and enjoy the name, state, degree, tittle, stile, honor, place, and precedence of the Baronie of Dacre; to have and to hold to her, and the issue of her bodie in full and ample manner, as any of her ancestors enjoied the same. And that her children male, and shall have, take, and enjoy the place, and precedence respectively, as the children of her ancestors Barons Dacre have formerly had, and enjoyed.

Now to returne to the Sea-coast, about three miles from Pevenssey is Becker-hill a place much frequented by Saint Richard Bishop of Chichester, and where he died. Under this is Bulver-hith in an open shore, with a rooflesse Church, not so named of bulles hide which cut into thongs by William the Conquerour, reached to Batistford (as they fable) for it had that name before his comming. But heere he arrived with his whole fleete, landed his armie, and having cast a rampier before his campe, set fire on all his ships, that their onely hope might be in manhood, and their safety in victorie. And so after two daies marched to Hastings then to an hill neere Ne-feld now called Standard hill, because (as they say) he there pitched his Standard, and from thence two miles farther where in a plaine the Kingdome of England was put upon the hazard and chance of a bataille; and the English-Saxon Empire came to a full period and finall end. For there, King Harold in the yeere of our Lord 1066. the day before the Ides of October, albeit his forces were much weakened in a former fight with the Danes, and his soldiers wearied besides with a long journey from beyond Torke, encountered him in a place named Epston. When the Normans had sounded the Battaile, first the skirmish continued for a pretty while with shot of arrowes from both sides; then, setting foote to foote, as if they fought man to man, they maintained fight a longer time: But when the English men had most valiantly received

received their first violent on set, the Norman horsemen with full carriere put forward and gave an hot charge. But seeing they also could not breake the battaile, they retired for the nonce, and yet kept their ranks in good order. The Englishmen supposing them to flee, presently disfringed themselves, and in disfray preased hard upon the enemies: but they, all on a sudden bringing backe their companies charged them a fresh on every side with all their joynt forces thicke united together and so enclosing them round about, drove them backe with great slaughter: who not withstanding having gotten the higher ground withstood the Normans a long time, untill Harold himselfe was shot through with an arrow and fell downe dead: for then straightwaies they turned their backs and betooke themselves every man to flight. The Duke lofty, and haughty with this victory, and yet not unmindfull of God the giver thereof, erected in memoriall of this bataille an Abbey to the glory of God, and S. Martin, which he called de Bello, or Battaile Abbey, in that very place where Harold after many a wound and stab among the thickest of his enemies gave up the ghost, that the same might bee as it were an everlasting monument of the Normans victorie: and therein he offered his sword, and royall robe which he ware, the day of his Coronation. These the Monkes kept untill their suppression, as also a table of the Normans gentry which entred with the Conquerour; but so corruptly in later times, that they inserted therein the names of such as were their benefactors, and whosoever the favour of fortune or vertue had advanced to any eminencie in the subsequent ages. About this Abbey there grew afterwards a towne of the same name: or, (that I may use the words of the private History of this Abbey) As the Abbey encreased, there were built about the compasse of the same one hundred and fiftene houses of which the towne of Battell was made. Wherein there is a place called by a French word Sangue lac, of the blood there shed: which by nature of the ground seemeth after raine to wax red. Whence, William Newborough, wrote although untruly, thus: The place, in which there was a very great slaughter of the English men fighting for their countrey, if peradventure it be wet with any small shovre, sweateth forth very fresh blood indeed: as if the very evidence thereof did plainly declare that the voyce of so much Christian blood there shed doth still cry from the earth to the Lord. But to the said Abbey King William the Conquerour granted many and great privilegedges. And among other, to use the very words of the Charter. If any thiefe, murderer, or felon for feare of death fly and come to this Church, let him have no harme but be dismissed and sent away free from all punishment. Be it lawfull also for the Abbat of the same Church to deliver from the gallows any thiefe or robber wheresoever, if he chance to come by where such execution is in hand.

Henrie the first likewise, (that I may rehearse the words of his Charter) instituted a mercate to be there kept on the Lords day, free from all toll and tallage. But Sir Anthony Browne Lord Vicount Mount-acute, who not long since in that place built a goodly house, obtained of late by authoritie of Parliament, that this mercate should bee held upon another day. And as for the privilegedges of Sanctuary, in those more heinous and grievous crimes, they are here and every way els by Parliamentary authoritie quite abolished. For, they perceived well, that the feare of punishment being once removed, stout boldnesse, and a will to commit wickednesse grew still to greater head: and that hope of impunity was the greatest motive of ill-doing. Neither heere or in that quarter nere adjoining, saw I any thing worth relation but onely Ashburnham, that gave the name to a family of as great antiquity as any one in all this tract.

Hastings, which I spake of, called in the English Saxon tongue Harting-cea-vep, is situate somewhat higher upon the same shore. Some there bee that ridiculouslly derive this name from out of our tongue, from haste or quicknesse, forsooth; because as Matthew Paris, writeth William Conquerour at Hastings did set up hastily a fortresse of timber. But it may seeme to have taken this new name of Hastings a Danish Pirate, who wheresoever hee landed, with intent to spoile and raise booties, built oftentimes fortresses, as we read in Asserius Menevensis, of Boernstote castle built by him in Essex, as also of others at Appledor and Middleton in Kent. The tradition is that the old towne of Hastings is swallowed up of the sea. That which standeth now as I observed flourished long, inhabited with a warlike people and skilfull failers, well stored with barkes and craies and gained much by fishing, which is plentifull along the shore. But after that the peere made of timber was at length violently carried away by extreme rage of the sea, it hath decayed, and the fishing lesse used, by the reason of the dangerous landing, for they are enforced to worke their vessels to land by a Copall or Craine. In which respect for the bettering of the towne, Queene Elizabeth granted a contribution toward the making of a new harbour, which was begun, but the contribution was quickly converted into private purses, and the publike good neglected. Nevertheless both Court, the Countrey, and Citie of London is served with much fish from thence.

Ancens. Earles of Ew.

The whole Rape of Hastings and the Honour was holden by the Earles of Ew, (commonly called de Augi) in Normandie, descended from the base sonne of Richard the First Duke of Normandie; untill the daies of Alice the heire of the house, whom in the reigne of Henrie the Third, Ralph de Issodon in France tooke to wife, whose posteritie lost a faire patrimonie in England, for that, as our Lawyers spake in those daies, they were Ad fidem Regis Francie, that is, under the king of France his allegiance.

When King Henry the third had seized their lands into his hands, hee granted the Rape of Hastings first to Peter Earle of Savoy, then to Prince Edward his sonne, and after upon his surrender to John sonne to the Duke of little Britaine upon certaine exchanges of lands pertaining to the Honour of Richmond which Peter Earle of Savoy had made over for the use of the Prince. Long time after when the Duke of Brian had lost their lands in England for adhering to the French King. King Henrie the Fourth gave the Rape of Hastings with the Manour of Crowherst, Burgwalsh, &c. to Sir John Pelham the elder, upon whose loialtie, wisdom, and valour he much relied. Before we depart from Hastings, as it shall not bee offensive I hope, to remember that in the first daies of the Normans, there were in this shire great gentlemen furnished Hastings & de Hastings, of whom Mabew de Hastings held the Manour of Grenoble in his service, that he should find at this haven an oare, when the kings would crosse over the sea, so now the honourable house of the Hastings that are Earles of Huntingdon enjoy this title of Hastings. For King Edward the Fourth bestowed this title with certaine Royalties (as they terme them) upon Sir William Hastings his Chamberlaine. Who by Comineus commended, for that having received an yearly pension of Leone the eleventh the French King hee could not for any thing bee brought to give unto the French King an acquittance of his owne hand writing. I will in no case (saith hee) that my hand-writing, bee seene amongst the accounts of the French Kings Treasurie. But this man by diving so deepe into the friendship of Kings overwhelmed and drowned himselfe quite. For whiles hee spake his minde, and reasoned over frankly at a private consultation, with the Usurper King Richard the Third, all of a sodaine, and unlooked for, had hee was away, and without pleading for himselfe, presently made shorter by the head upon the next blocke. Neither is this to be passed over in silence that King Henrie the Sixth adorned Sir Thomas Hoo, a worthy knight, whom hee also chose into the order of the Garter, with the title of Baron Hoo, and Hastings: whose daughters and heires were married to Sir Gefferie Bollen, (from whence by the mothers side Queene Elizabeth was descended) to Roger Coplie, to John Carew, John Devenish.

26. Henry 6. Baron of Hoo and Hastings.

From thence the shore passing under Farley hill farre scene both by sea, and land whereon standeth a solitary Church full bleakly, and a beacon is hollowed with an in-winding Bay, and upon it standeth Winchelsey which was built in the time of King Edward the First, when a more ancient towne of the same name, in the Saxons tongue called Wincelyr-ea, was quite swallowed up with the rough and raging Ocean in the year of our Lord 1250. (what time the face of the earth both heere and also in the coast of Kent neere bordering, became much changed). The situation thereof I will set before your eyes in the very words of Th. Walsingham. Situate it is upon a high hill, very steepe on that side, which either looketh toward the sea, or overlooketh the roade where ships lie at anchor. Whence it is that the way leading from that part to the haven goeth not straight forward, least it should by an over sodaine and downe right descent, force those that goe downe to fall headlong, or them that goe up to creepe rather with their hands then to walke: but lying side-waies it windeth with curving turnes in and out, to one side and the other. At first, it was inclosed with a rampier, after-wards with strong wals: and scarce beganne it to flourish, when it was sacked by the French men and Spaniards, and by reason that the sea shrunke backe from it, began sodainly (as it were) to fade and loose the beauty: And now only beareth the countenance of a faire towne, and hath under it in the levell which the sea relinquished a Castle fortified by Henrie the Eighth, and large marshes defended from sea-rages with workes very chargeably: By the decay hereof and the benefit of the sea together. Rbie opposite unto it and as highly feared began to flourish, or rather to resplourish, For that in old time it flourished: and that William of Ipres Earle of Kent fortified it, Ipres Tower now the prison, and the immunities or priviledges that it had in common with the Cinque-ports may sufficiently shew. But by occasion of the Vicinity of Winchelsey or the shrinking backe of the sea, it lay for a good while in former ages unknowne: But when Winchelsey decayed, and King Edward the Third walled it where the clifles defended it not, it beganne to breath againe and revive: and in our fathers daies, the sea to make amends abundantly for the harmes it had done raised with an unusuall tempest, so rushed in, and insinuated it selfe in forme of a bay that it made a very commodious haven, which another tempest also in our daies did not a little helpe. Since which time it greatly resplourished with inhabitants, buildings, fishing and navigation: and at this day there is an usuall passage from hence into Normandie, yet now it beginneth to complaine that the sea abandoneth it (such is the variable, and interchangeable course of that element) and in part imputeth it, that the river Rother is not contained in his channell, and so looseth his force to carry away the sands and beach which the sea doth inbeate into the haven: Notwithstanding it hath many fishing vessels and serveth London, and the Court with variety of sea-fish.

Now whether it have the name of Rine a Norman word which signifieth a strond or Binke, I cannot easily say. But seeing that in Records it is very often called in Latine Ripa, and they who bring fish from hence be termed Ripiers, I incline rather this way, and would incline more, if the Frenchmen used this word for a strond or shore, as Plinius doth Ripa. These two townes, (neither may it seeme impertinent to note it) belonged to the Abbey of Fescampe in Normandie. But when King Henry the Third perceived that religious men intermingled secretly in matters of State, he gave them in exchange for these two, Chiltenham and Sclouer two Manors in Gloucester-shire, and other lands; adding for the reason, that the Abbat and Monkes might not lawfully fight with temporall armes against the enemies of the Crowne.

Into this haven the River Rother, or Risber sheddeth it selfe, which issuing forth at Risberam fieldes (for so the Englishmen in ancient times called the towne, which wee doe Rotherfield) passeth by Burgwash, in old time Burghesh, which had Lords so surnamed thereof: among whom was that Sir Bartholomew Burgwash, a mightie man in his time, who being approved in most weighty Ambassages, and warres in Aquitaine, for his wisdome, and valour deserved, to be created a Baron of the Realme, to be admitted into the Order of the Garter, at the very first institution even among the Founders thereof, and to bee made Constable of Devon Castle, and Warden of the Cinque-ports. And his sonne carrying the same fore-name, not degenerating from his father, lived in high honour and estimation; but here left behind him one daughter, and no more issue, married into the house of Le Despencer, of which there remaineth still a goodly offspring of Noble personages. Echingham next adjoyning, had also a Baron, named William de Echingham, in the time of King Edward the Second, whose ancestours were the hereditarie Seneschals of this Regne. And their inheritance in the end, by the heires females name to the Barons of Windsor, and to the Tirwhits. Then the Rother dividing his water into three channels, passeth under Roberts bridge, where Alured de S. Martin, in King Henrie the seconds daies founded a Monasterie: and so running beside Bodiam, a Castle belonging to the ancient Family of the Lewknors, built by the Dalegrigs, here falleth (as I said) into the Ocean. Now I have passed along the Sea coast of Suffex. And as for the mid-land part of the shire, I have nothing more to relate thereof, unless I should recount the woods, and Forrests, lying out faire in length and breadth, which are a remnant of the vast wood, Anderida. Among which, to begin at the West, those of greatest note are these, The Forrest of Arundell, Saint Leonards Forrest, Wood Forrest, and not farre off Ed Grensted anciently a parcell of the Barony of Eagle, and made a Mercate by King Henry the seventh. Ashdowne Forrest, under which standeth Buckhurst the habitation of the ancient house of the Sackvilles, out of which race Queene Elizabeth in our daies advanced Thomas Sackville her allie by the Bollens, a wise Gentleman, to be Baron of Buckhurst, took him into her Privie Councell, admitted him into the most honorable Order of the Garter, and made him Lord Treasurer of England: whom also of late, King James created Earle of Dorset. Waterdown Forrest, where I saw Eridge, a lodge of the Lord Abergervenny, and by it craggie rocks rising up so thicke, as though sporting nature had there purposed a sea. Here-by in the very confines of Kent, is Groomebridge habitation of the Walters, whose house there was built by Charles Duke of Orleans, father to King Lewis the 12. of France, when he being taken prisoner in the battaile at Agincourt, by Richard Waller of this place, was here a long time detained prisoner.

As touching the Earles; Suffex had five by the line of Albiny, who were likewise called Earles of Arundell; but had the third pennie of Suffex, as Earles then had. The first of them was William D' Albiny, the sonne of William Butler King Henrie the first, and Lord of Buckenham in Norfolk: who gave for his armes Gules, a Lion rampant, Or: and was called one while Earle of Arundell, and another while Earle of Chichester, for that in those places he kept his chiefe residence. This man, of Adeliz the daughter of Godfrey Barbatus Duke of Lorraine, and of Brabant, Queen Dowager, or Widow of King Henrie the first, begat William the second Earle of Suffex, and of Arundell, father to William the third Earle: unto whom Mabile the daughter, and one of the heires of the last Raulph Earle of Chester, bare William the fourth Earle, & Hugh the fifth, who both died without issue, and also foure daughters married unto Sir Robert Yatehall, Sir Iohn Fitz-Alan, Sir Roger de Somery, and Sir Robert de Mount-bault. After this, the title of Arundell budded forth againe, as I said before, in the Fitz-Alans: but that of Suffex lay hidden, and lost unto this our age: which hath scene five Rascliffes, descended of the most Noble house of the Fitz-walters, (that derived their pedigree from the Clares) bearing that honour, to wit, Robert created Earle of Suffex by King Henrie the Eight, who wedded Elizabeth daughter of Henry Stafford Earle of Buckingham, of whom he begat Henrie the second Earle: unto whom Elizabeth the daughter of Thomas Howard Duke of Norfolk, brought forth Thomas: who being Lord Chamberlaine to Queene Elizabeth, died without issue, a most worthy and honourable personage, in whose mind were seated joyntly both politike wisdome, and martiall prowesse, as England and Ireland acknowledged. Him succeeded Sir Henrie his brother, and after him Robert his onely sonne, now in his flower.

Thus farre of Suffex, which together with Suth-rey, was the habitation of the Regni, in the time of the Britaines, and afterwards the kingdom of the South-Saxons, called in the Saxon tongue, Suth-seaxan-ric, which in the two and thirty yeare after the Saxons comming, was begun by Ella, who, as Beda writeth, First among the Kings of the English Nation ruled all their Southern Provinces, which are severed by the River Humber, and the limits adjoyning thereto. The first Christian King was Edilwalch, baptized in the presence of Wulpher King of Mercia, his Godfather, and he in signe of adoption gave unto him two Provinces, namely, the Isle of Wight, and the Province of the Meanevari: But in the 306. yeare after the beginning of this Kingdome, when Aldinus the last King was slaine by Ina King of West-Saxons, it came wholly under the Dominion of the West-Saxons.

CANTIV M.

CANTIVM.

Ow am I come to Kent, which Countrey although master WILLIAM LAMBARD, a man right well endued with excellent learning, and as godly vertues, hath so lively depainted out in a full volume, that his painefull felicitie in that kind hath left little, or nothing for others, yet according to the project of this worke which I have taken in hand, I will runne it over also: and least any man should thinke, that as the Comickall Poet saith, I deale by way of close pilfering I willingly acknowledge him, (and deserve he doth no lesse) to have beene my foundation, and fountaine both of all (well-neere) that I shall say.

Time as yet hath not bereft this Region of the ancient name, but as it was called CANTIVM by Cesar, Strabo, Diodorus Siculus, Ptolomee, and others, so that Saxons named it, as Ninnius witnesseth, Cant-guap-lant, that is, The countrey of the people inhabiting Cantium, and we Kent. This name master Lambard deriveth from Caine, which among the Britaines, soundeth as much as a greene Bough, because in old time it was shadowed with woods. But it may be lawfull for mee to put in my conjecture; whereas Britaine heere runneth out with a mightie nooke, or corner into the East, and I have observed, that such a kind of nooke in Scotland, is called, Cantir; Again, that the Inhabitants of another Angle in that part of the Island, are by Ptolomee termed Cantæ, as also that the Cangani in Wales, were possessed of another corner, (to say nothing of the Cantabri, who likewise dwelt in an angle among the Celtiberians, who as they came from one originall, so likewise they were of the same language with our Britans) I would guesse, that the name was given by reason of the forme and scituation, and so much the rather, both for that our Frenchmen have used Canton for a Corner, and that (as it is probable) from the old Language of the Gauls: for it comes not from the Germane or Latine tongue, which together with that old tongue, be the mothers of this latter French tongue; and also because this Countrey by all the old Geographers is called Angulus. For it looketh full upon France with a huge Angle, compassed with the estuarie of Tamis, and with the Ocean sea, saving that Westward it hath Surrey, and southward Suffex to confine upon it.

KENT.

Carion, corruptly read in Diodorus Siculus.

Hereof cometh Canton in Heraldrie, for a corner; and the Helvetians countreys, were by the French called Cantons.

KENT.

The Region which we call Kent, extendeth it selfe in length, from West to East fifty miles, and from South to North 26. For situation, it is not uniforme as being more plaine toward the West, and full of shady woods; but higher Eastward, by reason of hills, mounting up with easie ascents. The Inhabitants distinguish it as it lyeth South-east-ward from the Tamis, into three plots or portions, they call them steps or degrees; the upper whereof, lying upon Tamis, they say is healthfull, but not so wealthy: the middle they account both healthfull, and plentiful: the lower they hold to bee wealthy, but not healthy: as which for a great part thereof is very moist, yet it bringeth forth ranke grasse in great plenty. Howbeit every where almost it is full of meadows, pastures, and cornefields: abounding wonderfully in apple-trees, and cherrie-trees also, which being brought out of Pontus into Italie, in the 608. yeare after the foundation of Rome, and in the 120. yeare after translated from thence into Britaine, prosper heere exceeding well, and take up many plots of land: the trees being planted after a direct manner one against another by square, most pleasant to behold. It hath villages and townes standing exceeding thicke, and well peopled, safe rodes, and free harbours for ships, with some veines of iron and marle: but the aire is somewhat thicke, and somewhere foggie, by reason of vapours rising out of the waters. At word, the revenues of the Inhabitants are greater both by the fertilitie of the soile, and also by the neighbourhood of a great citie, of a great river, and the maine sea. The same commendation of civilitie and courtesie which Cesar in old time gave the Inhabitants, is yet of right due unto them: that I may not speake of their warlike prowess, whereas a certaine Monke hath written, How the Kentishmen so farre excelled, that when our armies are ready to joyne battaile, they of all Englishmen, are worthily placed in the Front, as being reputed the most valiant and resolute souldiers. Which, Iohn of Salisbury, verifieth also in his Polycraticon. For good desert (saith he) of that notable victorie, which Kent shewed so puissantly, and patiently against the Danes, it retaineth still unto this daies in all battailes the honour of the first and fore-ward, yea, and of the first conflict with the enemy. In praise of whom William of Malmesbury hath likewise written thus, The country people and towne dwellers of Kent, above all other Englishmen retaineth still the respect of their ancient worthinesse. And as they are more forward, and readier to give honour, and entertainment to others, so they be more slow to take revenge upon others.

Cesar (to speake briefly by way of Preface, before I come to describe the particular places) when he first attempted the conquest of our Island; arrived at this country; but being by the Kentish Britans, kept from landing, obtained the shore not without a fierce encounter. When he made afterward his second voyage hither, here likewise hee landed his armie: and the Britaines with their horsemen and wagons encountered them courageously, but being soone by the Romans repulsed, they withdrew themselves into the woods. After this they skirmished sharply with the Roman Cavalry in their march, yet so, as the Romans had every way the upper hand. Also, within a while after, they charged the Romans againe, and most resolutely brake through the midst of them, and having slaine Laberius Durus, Marshall of the field retired safe: and the morrow after set upon the Foragers, and victualers of the campe, &c. which I have briefly related before out of Cesar's owne Commentaries. At which time, Cynoborix, Carvilius, Taximagulus, and Seconax were great Commanders of Kent (whom he, because he would be thought to have vanquished Kings, termeth Kings) whereas indeed they were but Lords of the countrey, or Noble men of the better mark.

After the Roman Empire was heere established, it was counted under the jurisdiction of the President of Britannia Prima. But the Sea coast which they termed LITTVS SAXONICVM, that is, The Saxon shore, like as the opposite shore unto it, from the River Rhene to Xantaigne in France, had a Ruler over it from Dioclesians time whom Marcellinus calleth Tractus maritimi Comitum, that is, The Count or Lieutenant of the Maritime tract: the booke of Notices, stileth him: The honourable, Earle or Lieutenant of the Saxon shore along Britaine, whose office was with garrisons set upon the shore in places convenient, to repress the depredations, and robberies of Barbarians, but of Saxons especially, who grievously infected Britaine. And hee was under the dispose of the Right honourable Generall of the Footemen, whom they called Præsentaliu, who besides the Garrisons lying at the Havens, assigned unto him for the defence thereof at all affaires, Victores Iuniores Britannicianos Primanos Iuniores, and Secundanos Seniores, (these are the names of certaine bands or Companies) this hee had for his under Officers to it, Principem ex officio Magistrum præsentaliu a parte peditum, Numerarios duos, Commentariensem, Cornicularium, Adjutorem, Subadjutam, Regerendarium, Exceptores singulares, &c. Neither doubt I, but that our Ancestors imitated this custome of the Romans, when they placed over this coast a Governour or Portreve, whom now they use to call Warden of the Cinque Ports, because as the Comes or Earle of the Saxon shore afore said was Governour of nine Ports, so he is of five.

But when the Romans were departed quite out of Britaine, Portigern, who bare soveraigne rule in the greatest part of Britaine, placed over Kent a Guorog, that is to say, a Vice Roy, or Freed man under him, and unwitting to him, hee forthwith freely granted this region, as Ninnius and William of Malmesbury write, unto Hengist the Saxon, for his daughter Rowens sake: upon whom hee was exceedingly enamoured. Hence it came, that the first Saxon Kingdome erected in Britaine in the yeare of our Lord 456. was called by them Cant-papapie, that is, The Kingdome of the Kentishmen, which after three hundred and twenty yeares, when Baldred their last King was subdued, fell to bee under the Dominion of the West Saxons, to whom it continued subject untill the Normans Conquest: For then, if we may beleieve Thomas Spot the Monke, (for none of the more ancient Writers have recorded it) the Yeomanrie of Kent at Svanes-comb (a village this is where (they say) Suene the Dane (sometime pitched his campe) carrying before them in their hands every one a great greene bough representing a farre of a moving wood, yeilded themselves unto William the Conquerour upon this condition that they might retaine their ancient customes unviolated, and especially that which they call Garvelkind, that is, Give all kinne, by which they are not so bound by Copyhold, customarie tenures, or Tenant-right, as in other parts of England, but in manner every man is a free-holder, and hath some part of his owne to live upon. For lands of this nature are equally divided among the male children, or if there be no sonnes, among the daughters. By vertue of this also, they are at full age and enter upon their inheritance when they come to be fifteene yeares old: and lawfull it is for them to alienate and make it over to any one, either by gift or by sale, without the Lords consent. By this likewise, the sonne though their parents were condemned for theft, succcede them neverthelesse in such kind of Lands, &c. which I leave to Lawyers. So that, it is truely though not purely written in Latine in an old book thus: The County of Kent avoucheth, that this County ought by right to be free from such kind of grievance: for it saith, that this County was never conquered, as the residue of England was, but by concluding of a peace subjected themselves to the dominion of the Conquerour, retaining to themselves all their liberties, immunities, and customes, which they had, and used before time. After this, William the Conquerour, that hee might more firmly assure to himselfe Kent, which is the very key of England, placed a Constable over Dover Castle, and according to the ancient order of the Romans made him also Lord Warden of the Cinque Ports. And these bee they, Hastings, Dover, Hith, Rumney and Sandwich, unto which, Winchelsey, and Rie are joyned as principall ports, and other small townes as Members. Which because they are bound to serve in the warres by sea, enjoy many great immunities: as who are free from payment of Subsidies, and from Wardship of their children as touching the bodie, neither are they sued in any court, but within their owne townes; and of the inhabitants therein, therein, such as they call Barons, at the Coronation of Kings and Queenes support the Canopies over them, yea and have a table by themselves that day spread and furnished on the Kings right hand, &c. And the Lord Warden himselfe, who is alwaies one of the Nobilitie of most approved trust, hath within his jurisdiction the authoritie of a Chancellour and Admirall in very many cases, and enjoyeth other rights besides. But now returne we to the places.

The Northside of this Country, Tamis the soveraigne of all Rivers in Britaine runneth hard by, as I have said before, which having held on his course past Sarum, forthwith being with a winding reach almost retired into himselfe, doth there admit into his channell into the first limit of this shire Ravensburne a small water, and of short course, which riseth in Keston heath hard under the pitching of an ancient campe, strange for the height of double rampiers, and depth of double ditches of all that I have seene: doubtlesse the worke of many Labouring hands. Of what civitie it was I could not discover for that the greatest part thereof is now severall, and overgrowne with a thicker, but verily great it was, as may bee gathered by the which is apparent. We may probably conjecture that it was a Roman Campe, but I might seeme to rove; if I should thinke it that Campe which Julius Caesar pitched, when the Britans gave him the last battaile with their whole forces, and then having bad successe retired themselves, and gave him leave to march to the Tamis side. And yet certes Keston the name of the place seemeth to retaine a parcell of Caesars name for so the Britaines called him, and not Caesar, as wee doe. As for the other small intrenchment not farre off by W. Wickham, it was cast in fresh memory when old Sir Christopher Heydon a man then of great command in these parts, trained the country people. This water having passed by Bromeley a Mansion house of the Bishops of Rocheſter, when it hath gathered strength, the depth of his ford giveth name to Depe-ford: a most famous Ship-docke, where the Kings ships are built, and such as be decayed, repaired: there also is a goodly Store-house and a Colledge (as it were) or incorporation ordained for the use of the navie. The place was sometime called West-Greenwich, and at the conquest of England fell to Cislebert Mammot for his share, whose Grand-child Walkelin, defended Dover Castle against King Stephen, and left behind him one onely daughter living, who when her brother was dead, by her marriage brought a rich inheritance called the Honor of Mammot to the family of the Saies.

From hence the Tamis goeth to Green-wich, that is, the Greene Creeke, for the creek of a river in the old English tongue was called Wic, a place in times past famous for the Danish Fleet that lay there often at Rode, and for the Danes crucified shewed unto Ealpheg Archbishop of Canterbury, whom in the yeare of our Lord a thousand and twelve, they cruelly executed with most exquisite torments. Whole death together with the cause thereof Ditmarus Merſepurgius, who about the same time lived, hath thus in the eighth booke of his Chronicles described. I understand (saith he) by the relation of Sewald, a pitifull deede, and therefore memorable: namely, That the perfidious crew of * Northman souldiours under Thurkil as yet their Captaine, who that excellent prelate, Archbishop of the Citie of Canterburie named Ealpheg with them, and them after their wicked manner imprisoned and bound, yea and put him to endure summe of money, and for the obtaining thereof did set downe a time betwene, that if in the space he could not by some acceptable ransom escape this momentary death, hee might yet in the meane while purge himselfe with many a groane, to be offered as a lively sacrifice unto the Lord. But when all the time & space appointed were come & gone, this greedy gulf of Pagan called forth the servant of the Lord, & in threatening wise demands this tribute promised unto them to be speedily and out of hand paid. Then he, as a meeke Lamb, Here am I, quoth he, ready to undergoe even for the love of Christ whatsoever ye presume now to doe against me, that I may deserve to become an example of his servants. And nothing am I troubled at this day. And whereas I seeme unto you a lyer, it is not mine owne will but great neede and power that hath done it. This body of mine, which in this exile I have loved overmuch, I present as culpable unto you, and I know it is in your power to doe with it, what yee intend: but my sinfull soule that regardeth not you, I humbly commend to the Creator of all things. As hee was thus speaking, the whole rabble of these prophane wretches hemmed him round about and gathered together divers and sundry weapons to kill him. Which when their leader Thurkill saw a farre off, he came quickly running and crying, Doe not so in any wise I beseech you: and heere, with my whole heart I deliver unto you all my gold and silver and whatsoever I have heere, or can by any means come by, save my ship onely, that yee would not sinne against the Lords anointed. But this unbridled anger of his mates, harder than yron and flint was nothing mollified with so gentle words and faire language of his, but became pacified by shedding his innocent blood, which presently they altogether confounded and bleanded with Ox-heads, stones as thicke as haile, and bullets hurled at him. And to the memorie of this Saint Ealpheg is the Parish Church heere consecrated. But now is the place of very great name, by reason of the Kings house, which Humfrey Duke of Gloceſter built and named Placence; which also King Henrie the Seventh most sumptuously enlarged: who adjoynd thereto a little house of observant Friars, and finished that towre famous in Spanish fables, which the said Duke of Gloceſter begun, on an high hill, from whence there is a most faire, and pleasant prospect open to the river winding in and out, and almost redoubling it selfe, the greene meddowes and marshes underlying, the Citie of London, and the Countrie round about. Which being now enlarged and beautified by the L. Henrie Howard Earle of Northampton, Lord Privie Seale, &c. cannot but acknowledge him a well deserving benefactor. But the greatest ornament by far that graced this Green-wich, was our late Queene Elizabeth, who heere most happily borne to see the light by the resplendent brightnesse of her royall vertue enlightened all England. But as touching Green-wich have heere these verses of Leland the Antiquarian Poet:

Ecce ut jam niteat locus petitus
Tanquam ſyderea domus cathedra.
Quæ fastigia picta? quæ fenestra?
Quæ turres vel ad astra se efferentes?
Quæ porro viridaria, ac perennes
Fontes? Flora sinum occupat venusta Fundens delicias nitentis horti.
Rerum commodus æſtimator ille,
Ripa qui variis modis amœna,
Nomen contulit eleganter aptum.

How glittereth now this place of great request,
Like to the ſeat of heavenly welkin hie?
With gallant tops, with windowes of the beſt.
What towres that reach even to the ſtarry ſkie:
What Orchards greene, what ſprings ay-running by.
Faيرة Flora heere that in this creeke doth dwell,
Beſtowes on it the flowers of garden gay;
To judge no doubt of things he knew full well,
Who gave this banke thus pleaſant every way,
So fit a name, as did the thing bewray.

Nothing elſe have I here to note (but that, for I would not have the remembrance of well deſerving benefactors to miſcarry) William Lambard a godly good Gentleman built an Almehouſe here for the ſuſtentation of poore perſons which hee named The Colledge of Queene Elizabeths poore people, and as the prying adventures of our religion then obſerved, was the firſt Proteſtant that built an Hoſpitaſſ. At the backe of this, as ye turne out ſcarce three miles off, ſtandeth Eltham, a retreating place likewiſe of the Kings, but unholyſomly by reaſon of the moate. Anthony Becke Biſhop of Durham, and Patriarch of Ieruſalem built this in a manner new, and gave unto Queene Eleanor wiſe to King Edward the Firſt, after hee had craſti-ly ly conveyed unto himselfe the inheritance of the Vesces, unto whom this place fore belonged. For that Bishop, whom the last Baron of Vescy had made his for trust, of all his inheritance to the use of William Vesey his little base sonne, did not so faithfully, as he should with this orphan and ward of his, but spoiled him Almwick Castle, this, and other faire lands.

Beneath Greenwich, the Thames having broken downe his bankes, hath by inundation surrounded and overwhelmed many acres of land. For the innings whereof divers have as it were strugled with the waters now many yeares; and yet with great workes, and charges cannot overmaster the violence of the tides, which the Chanons of Liefnes adjoining kept sound and sweete land in their times. This Abbey was founded 1179. by Lord Richard Lucie chiefe Iustice of England, and by him dedicated to God and the memorie of Thomas of Canterbury, whom hee so admired for his piety, while other condemned him for perversitie against his Prince, as hee became here a devoured Chanon to him. Heere in the marshes groweth plentifully the hearbe Cochlearia, called by our Countrey men Scurvy-grasse, which some Physicians would have to be the same which Plinie calleth Britannica, by which name I have already made mention thereof: but heere what Plinie saith. In Germany, when Germanicus Caesar had removed his campe forward beyond Rhene, in the morning traile there was one fountaine and no more, of fresh water, whereof if a man dranke, within two yeares his teeth would fall out of his head and the joynts in his knees become soft and feeble. Those diseases the Physicians termed Stomacace and Sceleterybe. For in this hereof, there was found an hearbe called Britannica, holseome not onely for the fumes and maladies of the mouth but also against the Squintie and stinging of serpents, &c. They of * Frisia, what way our campe lay, shewed it unto our souldiours. And I marvelle should bee the cause of that name, unlesse peradventure they that confine upon the Ocean, dedicated the name thereof to Britaine, as lying so nere unto it. But that most learned Adrian Junius in his booke named Nomenclator, bringeth another reason of the name whom you may have recourse unto if you please: For, this word Britannica hath here diverted me a side from my course.

From thence the Thames being contained within his bankes meeteth with the river Darent, which falling downe out of Suthrey runneth with a soft streame not far from Seven-oke (so called as men say of seven exceeding great Oakes now cut downe) which commendeth Sir William Sevenok an Alderman of London, who being foundling and brought up here; and therefore so named, built heere in grateful remembrance an Hospital and a schoole. On the East side of it standeth Knoll so called for that it is seated upon a hill, which Thomas Bouchier Archbishop of Canterbury purchasing of Sir William Fienes, Lord Say and Scale, adorned with a faire house and now lately Thomas Earle of Dorset Lord Treasurer hath fourbished and beautified the old worke with new chargeable additaments. Darent then passeth by Ottanforpe, now Otford, a place famous in former ages for an overthrow and slaughter of the Danes which happened there in the yeare 1016. and lately by reason of the Kings house, which William Warham Archbishop of Canterbury built for himselfe and his successours so sumptuously, that for to avoid envie, Cranmer who next succeeded him was constrained to exchange it with King Henrie the Eighth. Somewhat lower hard by Darent standeth Lullingstone, where there was sometime a Castle the seat of a family of the same name, but now of Sir Percival Hart, descended from one of the coheires of the Lord Bray. Then Darent giveth name unto Dartford, commonly Dartford a great mercat towne well frequented, and well walled, where King Edward the Third built a Nunnery, which King Henry the Eighth converted into a house for himselfe and his successours: Heere the river Crey, anciently called Creacan interminglith it selfe with Darent, when in his short course hath imparted his name to five townes which hee watereth, as Saint Mary Cray, Pauls Cray, Votes Cray, North Cray, and Crey-ford, in former ages Creacanford, which Hengist the Saxon the eighth yeare after his arrivall, joynded battaile with the Brittaines, and after he had slaine their capitaines, brought them under with so great

laughter, that afterwards hee never stood in feare of them, but established his kingdom quietly in Kent.

From the river Darent or Dart unto the mouth of Medway, the Thames seeth nothing above him but little townes pleasantly seated, which to passe over in silence were no prejudice either of their fame or any thing els. Yet amongst them is Swanscombe (of which I have heretofore spoken) of honorable memorie among the Kentish men, for obtaining their continuance of their ancient franchises, afterward it was well knowne by the Monteuses, men of great Nobility the owners thereof who had there Barony here-about. And by it Gravef-end so called (as Master Lambert is my author) as the Gravef-end; that is, the limit of the Gerewe or Reve. A towne as well knowne as any other in England, for the usuall passage by water betweene it and London, since the Abbat of Grace by the tower of London, to which it appertained, obtained of King Richard the second that the inhabitants of it and Milton onely, should transport passengers from thence to London. King Henrie the Eighth when he fortified the sea coast, raised two Platforms or Block-houses here, and two other opposite on Essex side. Beyond Gravef-end is Shorn held anciently by Sir Roger Northwood by service to carry with other the kings tenants a white ensigne fortie daies at his owne charges when the King warred in Scotland. Somewhat more within the land, lieth Cobham, the habitation for a long time of the Barons of Cobham; of whom John Cobham the last of that name, founded a Colledge here and a castle at Cowling: who left one onely daughter wife to Sir John de la Pole Knight: Shee likewise bare but one daughter, though married in her time to many husbands. But by Sir Reginald Braibroke onely had shee issue. As for her husband Sir John Old Castle, whiles hee endeavoured to bring in innovation in religion, was both hanged, and burnt. Joane her onely daughter by Sir Reginald Braybrooke, was wedded unto Thomas Broke of Somersetshire, from whom six Lord Cobhams have lineally descended, and flourished in honorable reputation untill our time. From Gravef-end a little country called Ho, lying as a demy Island between the rivers Thames and Medway stretcheth it selfe into the East, and is for situation but unholsome. At the entry hereof is Cowling Castle built by John Lord Cobham in a moorish ground, and Cliffe a good bigge towne, so called of a cliffe upon which it standeth. But whether it bee that Clives at Ho, so famous in the tender age and infancie of our English Church, by reason of a Synode there holden I dare not as others doe, affirme: considering, that in regard of the site it is a place inconvenient for such an assembly; and besides that Clives at Hoo seemeth to have beene within the Kingdom of the Mercians. As for the river Medweg, now called Medway, and in the British tongue, (unlesse I misse of the truth,) Vaga, whereunto afterward was added Med, hath his spring head in the wood Anderida which is termed the Weald, that is a Wood-land country; and taketh up the South-part of this region farre and wide. At first, whiles it carrieth but a slender streame it receiveth the Eden by Penshurst the seat anciently (as it seemeth by the name) of Sir Stephen de Penberst who also was called de Penshester a famous Warden of the Cinque ports; but now the house of the Sidneys who derive their race from William de Sidney Chamberlaine to King Henrie the second: out of which came Sir Henrie Sidney that renowned Lord deputy of Ireland, who of the daughter of John Dudley Duke of Northumberland, and Earle of Warwicke, begat Philip and Robert. This Robert, James our soveraigne King, made him honorable, first by the title of Baron Sidney of Penshurst and afterwards, of Viscount Lisle. But Sir Philip, whom I cannot passe over in silence, beeing the glorious starre of this familie, a lively patterne of vertue, and the lovely joy of all the learned men, fighting valeriously with the enemy before Zurphen in Gelderland died manfully. This is that Sidney, whom, as Gods will was he should be therefore borne into the world, even to shew unto our age a sample of ancient vertues: so his good pleasure was before any man looked for it to call for him againe, and take him out of the world as beeing more worthy of heaven then earth. Thus wee may see, Perfect vertues suddenly vanishes out of sight, and the best men continue not long.

Then the river Medway, branching it selfe into five streamlets, is joynd with many stone Bridges, and thereof giveth the name of Tunbridge to the towne thus situate, as the towne of Bridges. This about King William Rufus his time Richard sonne of Count Gilbert, Grandchild to Godfrey Earle of Ewe, & Lord of Briony obtained requitall for Briony in Normandie, when there had bin long debate about Briony. This Richard, (as William Gemeticensis writeth) in recompence for the same castle received England the towne of Tunbridge for it. And the report goeth, that the * Lowy of Briony measured round about with a line, and with the same line brought into England, he received so much ground measured out at Tunbridge. Shortly after, he built here a faire large castle fenced with the river, a deepe ditch, and strong walles; and albeit it is now ruinous and the Keepe attired with ivie, yet it manifestly sheweth what it was. His posteritie, who were Earles of Glocester, and surnamed De Clare, (for that they were Lordes Clare in Suffolke) built here a priorie for Chanons of Saint Augustines order, founded the parish Church which was appropriated to the Knights of Saint John of Hierusalem, and compounded about the tenure of the Mannour, for which there had been long suit, to hold it of the Archbishop of Canterburie by Knights fee, and to be their high Stewards at their intronizations. From these Clares Earles of Glocester, came by an heire generall to Sir Hugh Audley Earle of Glocester, and by his only daughter to the Earles of Stafford, who were afterward Dukes of Buckingham, & then them by attainder to the Crowne. It hath in latter ages bene beholde to Sir Andrew Iude of London for a faire free-Schoole, and to John Wilford for a causey toward London. Three miles directly South from hence in the very limit of Suffex, and neere Frant, I saw in a white-sandy ground divers vastie, craggie stones of strange formes, whereof two of the greatest stand so close together, and yet severed with a straight line, as you would thinke they had bene sawed asunder, and Nature when she reared these, might seeme sportingly to have thought of a Sea. But to returne to the River.

From Tunbridge, Medway passeth by Haudelo, from whence came that Isabel delo, who happily marrying the heire of the Lord Burnell, had issue by her a sonne, who was called Nicholas, summoned to Parliament among the Barons by the name of Burnell. Then Medway increased with another water, called Twist, which stretcheth about and insulateth a large plot of good ground, runneth on not farre from Mereworth, where stands a faire Castle like house, which from the Earles of Arundell came unto the Newils Lords of Abergevennie, and Le Despencer: whose heire the first Parliament that he held, restored, gave and granted, &c. the name, stile, title, honours, and dignitie of Baronesse le Despencer: & that her heires successively should be Barons & Despencers for ever. Now by this time Medway having received a rivelet, that looketh it selfe under ground, and riseth againe at Loose, serving thirteene fulling-mills, looketh to Maidstone, which seeing the Saxons called it Medwegiton, & Medwegiton beleeve verily it is the same VAGNIACAE, which Antonine the Emperor mentioneth, and Ninnius in his Catalogue of cities, calleth corruptly, Caer Megwad, for Medwag. Neither verily doth the account of distance disagree, From Noviomagus one way, and Durobrovis another, whereof I shall treat anon. Under the latter Empire as is to be seene in Pentegerus his table lately set out by M. Velferus, it is named Medus. Thus as yeeres by litte and litte turne about, so names likewise by litte and litte become changed. A large faire, and sweet towne this is, and populous: from this faire stone bridge, it hath bene beholding to the Archbishops of Canterbury, whom to grace this place at the confluence of the waters, Boniface of Savoy, built a small Colledge, John Vfford raised a palace for himselfe and successors, which Stephen increased, and betwene them, which it standeth in plight, William Courtenay erected a faire Collegiat Church, in which he so great a Prelate, and so high benedict lieth lowly entombed. One of the two common Gaoles or prisons of the County is here appointed. And it hath bene endowed with fundrie privileges by King Edward the sixt, incorporated by the name of Major and Jurates, all which short time they lost by favouring rebels. But Queene Elizabeth amply restored them, and their Major, whereas anciently they had a Portgreve for their head Magistrate. This I note, because this [Greve] is an ancient Saxon word, and as yet among the Germans signifieth, a Ruler, as Markegrave, Reingrave, Landgrave, &c.

Here, a little beneath Maidstone Eastward, a pretty rivelet joyneth with Medway, springing first at Lencham: which towne by probable conjecture is the very same that Antonine the Emperour calleth DVROLENVM, written amisse in some copies, DVROLENVM. For Durolenum in the British language, is as much to say, as The water, Lenum. And besides the remaines of the name, the distance also from DVROLENVM, and DVROBROVIS proveth this to be Durolenum: to say nothing of the situation therof, neere unto that high rode way of the Romans, which in old time (as Higden of Chester doth write) led from Dover through the midst of Kent.

Hard by, at Booston Malherb hath dwelt a long time the family of the Wottons, out of which in our remembrance flourished both Nicholas Wotton, Doct. of the lawes; who being of the Privy counsell to K. Henry the Eighth, K. Edward the sixth, Q. Mary, and Q. Elizabeth, sent in Ambassage nine times to forreine Princes, and thrice chosen a Committie about peace between the English, French, and Scottish; lived a goodly time, and ran a long race in this life with great commendation of piety and wisedome: and also Sir Edward Wotton, whom for his approved wisedome in waighie affaires, Q. Elizabeth made Controller of her house, and K. James created Baron Wotton of Melbury. Here under is Kilcomb anciently a manshp of the family De sancto Leodegario, corruptly called Sensleger & Sellenger, & Motinden, where Sir R. Rockefly descended from Knol, and Grevecar built a house, who held lands at Santon by serjeantie to be Paritarius Regis, when the King goeth into Gascoine, donec perus fuerit pari soluturum pretii: and which as they that understand Law Latin (for I do not translate that he should be the Kings fore-foot-man, until he had worn out a paire of shoes, prized 4*d*. Neither hath this river any other memorable thing nere to it, but Leeds Castle, built by the noble Grevequers, who in ancient charters are named de Grevequers, & De crepto corde: afterwards it was the unfortunate seat of Bartholomew L. Baldismar, who perfidiously fortified it against K. EDWARD the second, who had freely given it him, and after that payed the due price of his disloyalty upon the gallows. The whole matter you may read here if you list out of a brieve historie penned by Thomas de la More, a gentleman that lived at the same time, and which of late I did publish in print. In the year 1521.

Queene Isabel came to the Castle of Leeds, about the feast of Saint Michael, minding there to lodge all night, but was not permitted to enter in. The King offended hereat, as taking it to be done in contempt of him, called certaine of the neighbour inhabitants out of Essex and London, and commanded them to lay siege unto the Castle. Now, there held the Castle at that time Bartholomew de Baldismar, who having left therein his wife and sonnes, was gone himselfe with the rest of the Barons to overthrow the Hughes de Spencer. Meane while, when they that were inclosed within, despaired of their lives, the Barons with their associates came as farre as Kingston, and by the mediation of the Bishops of Canterbury and London, together with the Earle of Pembroch, requested that the King would remove his siege, promising to deliver up the Castle, into the Kings hand after the next Parliament. But the King considering well, that the besieged could not long hold out, nor make resistance, being highly displeased & angered at their contumacy, would not give care to the Barons petitions. And when they had turned their journey another way, he afterward forced the Castle with no small trouble and labour about it: and when he had hanged all the rest that he found therein, he sent the wife and sonnes of Bartholomew aforesaid to the Tower of London. Thus Medway having received this rivelet from Leeds, fetching about through good grounds runneth by Alington, sometime a castle, now lesse than a castellet, where Sir T. Wyatt the elder, a worthy learned knight, reedified a faire house now decayed, whose son S^r Thomas enriched by an heire of Tir T. Haut, proposing to himselfe great hopes upo fair pretises pitifully overthrew himself & his state. Hence commeth Medway to Ailsford in the old English Saxon Eaglesford, which H. of Huntingdon, calleth Elstre, Ninnius Episford, who hath written, that it was named in the British tongue Saiffenaeg haibail of the Saxons there vanquished, vanquished, like as others in the very same sense termed it Anglesford. For, Gaufridus the Britaine, Gaufridus sonne, did here set upon Hengist and the English men, whom being disraied, and not able to abide a second charge, he put all to flight so as they had been utterly defeated for ever, but that Hengist skillfull and prompt to prevent, and divert danger, withdrew himselfe into the Isle of Tence, until such time as he should see the Britanes were allaid, and fresh supplies came to succour out of Germanie. In this Battaille were slaine the Generalls of both Caigern the Britaine, and Horfa the Saxon: of whom the one, Caigern was hoisted not farre from hence, gave name to the place: and Caigern was red with a stately and solemne funerall is thought to have bene: carried neere unto Ailesford where under the side of a hill I saw foure huge, rude stones erected, two for the sides, one transversall in the midst betweene them, and the hugest of all piled and laied over them in manner of the British monument which is called Stone heng but not so artificially with mortis and tennis. Verily the unskilfull common people terme it at this day, of the same Caigern, or Kis-Cosy boufe. In Ailesford it selfe, for the religious house of the Canons founded by Richard Lord Grey of Codnor in the time of King Henrie the Third is now scene a faire habitation of Sir William Sidney a learned Knight painfully, and expensfully studious of the common good of his country as his endowed house for the poore, and the bridge heere with the common voice plentifully testifie. Neither is Boxley neere adjoining to be passed over in silence where William de l'epres, in Flanders, Earle of Kent founded an Abbey in the year our Lord 1145. and translated thither the Monkes, from Clarevalle in Burgundy. Medway having wound himselfe higher, from the East receiveth a brooke springing neare Wrotham or Wirtham, so named for plentie of wortes: where the Archbishops had a place until Simon l'Isle pulled it downe, leaveth Malling which once bee atowne after Gundulph Bishop of Rochester had there founded an Abbey of Nunnes, and watereth Leibourn which hath a Castle sometime the seate of a family thereof surnamed, out of which Sir Foger Leibourn was a great Agent in the Baron warres, and William was a Parliamentary Baron in the time of King Edward the First. Neare neighbour to Leibourn is Brilling, now the habitation of the Lord Abergavenny in times past parcell of the Baronie of the Mammots, then of the Sales, whose maintenance at length by heires generall came to the families of Clinton, Fienes, and Aubrey. Upon the banke of Medway Eastward somewhat higher, after it hath passed by ling where Hamo Heath Bishop of Rochester built an house for his successors, standeth an ancient Citie, which Antonine calleth DVRO BRVS, DVRO-BARN, and in another place more truly DVRO PROV and DVROBROV: DVRO-BREVIS: and in the declining state of the Romane Empire, proceeded time contracted his name so, that it came to be named ROBIS, and so by addition of *Cear*tep, which cometh of the latin word Castrum, betokeneth among our authors a city or Castle, was called *hpouecear*tep, and now with us more short Robis, and in Latia Roffa, of one Rhufus as Bede gueth: but it seemeth unto mee to name in it somewhat still of that old name Durobrevis. Neither is there cause why any man should doubt of the name, seeing that by the account of journeys, or distance betweene places, and Bede's authoritie, it is named expressly in the Charter of the foundation of the Cathedral Church there DVROBROVIS: yet thus much I would advertise the Reader, that in the printed bookes of Bede it is read Darnerum, whereas in the manuscript copies it is termed DVROBREVIS: seated it is in a bottome, fortified on the one side with a marsh, the river, the weake walles, and as William Malmesburie saith, pent within too streights a roome: whereupon, in time past it was counted a Castle rather then a Citie. For, Bede calleth it Castellum Cantuariensis, that is, the Kentishmens Castle. But now it stretcheth forth with large suburbs on the West, East, and South sides. It hath passed through no few dangers and mischances. In the year of Christ 676. it was overthrowne and laied along by King Aethelbert the Mercian: and many a time afterward sacked by the Danes. Aethelbert King of

In an ancient table set forth by Welfer. Roibis.

Ceafter what it is. Rochester.

Kent erected there a sumptuous Church, which also he made more famous with the dignitie of Bishopricke, ordaining Iustus to bee the first Bishop of that See. But when it fell to decay for very age, Bishop Gundulph a Norman about the year 1080. recedified it, and thrusting out the Priests brought in Monkes in their roomes: and when they were cast out, a Deane, fixe Prebendaries and Scholars were substituted in their places. Neere unto the Church there standeth over the river an old Castle fortified both by art, and situation: Which, as the report goeth Odo Bishop of Bayeux and Earle of Kent built: But it was, no doubt, King William the first that built it: For in Domesday booke we read thus, The Bishop of Roucester holdeth in Elesford, for exchange of the land on which the Castle is seated. Yet, certaine it is, that Bishop Odo when his hope depended of a doubtfull change of the State, held this against King William Rufus: At which time there passed proclamation through England, that whosoever would not be reputed a Niding, should repaire to recover Rochester Castle. Whereupon the youth fearing that name, and most reproachfull and opprobrious in that age, swarmed thither in such numbers, that Odo was enforced to yeeld the place, lose his dignitie, and abjure the realme. But concerning the recedification of this Castle about this time, listen what the * Text of Rocester saith, when King William the second would not confirme the gift of Lanfrank as touching the Manour of Hedenham in the County of Buckingham, made unto Rochester church, unlesse Lanfrank and Gundulph Bishop of Rochester would give unto the King an hundred pound of deniers: At last by the intercession of Sir Robert Fitz Hamon and Henry Earle of Warwick, the King granted it thus farre forth in lieu for the money which bee demanded for grant of the Manour, that Bishop Gundulph, because he was very skilfull and well experienced in architecture and masonrie should build for the King at his owne proper charges a Castle of stone. In the end, when as the Bishops were hardly brought to give their consent unto it before the King, Bishop Gundulph built up the Castle full and whole at his owne cost. And a little after, King Henrie the first granted unto the Church of Canterbury and to the Archbishops, the keeping thereof, and the Constablership to hold ever after, (as Florentius of Worcester saith) yea and licence withall, to build in the same towne for themselves. Since which time it was belaid with with one or two great sieges, but then especially, when the Barons with their Al'armes made all England to shake, and Simon Montford Earle of Leicester assaulted it most fiercely, though in vaine, and cut downe the wooden bridge, which was after repaired. But in the time of King Richard the Second, Sir Robert Knowles by warlike prowes raised from low estate to high reputation, and great riches, built a very goodly stone bridge of arch-work with money levied out of French spoiles. At the end of the said bridge, Sir John Cobham who much furthered the worke, erected a Chapell (for our elders built no notable bridge without a chapell) upon which besides armes of Saints, are seen the armes of the King and his three uncles then living. And long after Archbishop Warham coped a great part of the said bridge with iron bars. Under this, Medway swelling with a violent and swift streame strugleth and breaketh through roaring and loud; but forthwith running more still and calme becommeth a road at Gillingham and Chetham for a most royall and warlike navy of strong and serviceable ships, and the same most ready alwaies at a short warning: which, our late gracious Ladie Queene Elizabeth, with exceeding great cost built for the safeguard of her subjects and terror of her enemies; and for the defence thereof raised a castelet at Vynore upon the river side.

Now Medway growne more full and carying a greater breadth, with his curling waves right goodly and pleasant to behold, runneth a long by the fruitfull fields, until that being divided by meeting with Iland Shepy, (which wee supposed to bee Ptolemeis TOLIATIS) maketh his issue into the Estuarie or Fritch of Thames at two mouthes. Of which twaine, the Westerne is called West-Swale: the Easterne, that seemeth to have severed Shepey from the firme land, is named East-Swale: but by Bede, termed Gentlad and Tenlet. This Isle, of the sheepe, whereof it feedeth mighty great flocks, being called by our ancestours Shepey, that is, The Isle of Sheep, passing plentiful in corne, but scarce of woods containeth twentie one miles in compasse. the North-shore it had a little Monasterie, (now they call it Minster) built by Sede- ga wife of Ercambert the King of Kent, in the yeare of 710. Under which, a certain Brabander of late beganne to trie by the furnace out of stones found upon the shore both Brimstone and Coperas. It hath Westward in the Front thereof a very big and strong Castle, which King Edward the third built, as himselfe writeth, Place for site, to the terror of his enemies, and solace of his people: unto which hee adjoyntly Burgh, and in the honour of Philip the Queene his wife called it Queene-borough; one would say, The Queens Burgh. The Constable whereof at this day, is Sir Edmund Hoby, who hath polished his excellent wit with learned studies. Eastward, is Sharlund seated, which belonged in late times to the Cheineies, and now to Sir Philip Herbert second sonne to Henry Earle of Pembroch, whom King Tames in one and the same day created Baron Herbert of Sharlund, and Earle of Marmorie.

This Isle appertaineth to the Hundred of Middleton, so named of Middleton the towne, now Milton. This was some time a towne of the Kings abode, and of greater name by farre than at this day, although, Hasting the Danish pirate for to annoy it, fortified a Castle hard by in the yeare 893. Neere adjoyning heereto Sittingburn a towne furnished with Innes sheweth it selfe with his new Major and corporation: the remains also of Thong Castle, which as some write, was so called for the Hengist built it by a measure of thongs cut out of a beasts hide, when Fortigen gave so much land to fortifie upon, as hee could encompassse with a beasts hide cut into thongs. Since the conquest it was the seat of Guncelline of Baldismere, of noble parentage, whose sonne Bartholomew begat Guncelline: and hee by the Inheritance of Raulph Fitz-Barnard Lord of Kings-Downe was father to that seditious Sir Bartholomew Lord Baldismere of whom I spake: he againe of Margaret Clare begat Sir Giles Lord Baldismere that died without issue; also Margerie, wife to William Russ of Hamlake; Maude the wife of Iohn Vere Earle of Oxford; Elizabeth espoused to William Bobun Earle of Northampton, and afterward to Edmund Mortimer; and Margerie whom Sir Iohn Tiptoft wedded: from whom descended a goodly offspring and fine race of great nobilitie.

Then saw I Tenham not commended for health, but the parent as it were of all the choise fruit gardens, and Orchards of Kent, and the most large and delightheous of them all, planted in the time of King Henrie the Eighth by Rich. Harris his fruer, to the publike good. For thirty Parishes thereabout, are replenished with Cherry gardens, and Orchards beautifully disposed in direct lines. Amongst these is Feversham very commodiously situate. For, the most plentiful part of this country lieth round about it, and it hath a creeke fit for bringing in and carrying forth commodities; whereby at this day it flourisheth amongst all the neighbour townes. It seemed also in former times to have flourished, considering that King Aethelstane assembled higher an assembly the Sages of his Kingdome, and made lawes heerein the year of our redemption 903.

King Stephen also he that usurped the Kingdome of England, founded an Abbey heere, for the Monkes of Clugny; in which, himselfe, Maude his wife, and Emilius his sonne were entombed. Nigh thereto, like as else where through this Countie, are found pits of great depth, which being narrow in the mouth and very spacious beneath have their certaine distinct roomes or chambers (as it were) with their severall supporting pillars of chalke. Concerning these there are divers opinions. I for my part, cannot tell what to thinke of them unless they were those pits, out of which the Britaines in old time digged forth chalke or white marle to dung their grounds withall, as Plinie writeth. For, they sound pits, saith hee, An hundred fathoms deepe, streight at the mouth, but of great capacitie within: like unto these very same of which we now speake.

And verily, no where else are they found but in a chalkie and marly soile. Vellese a man would thinke, that our English-Saxons digged such caves and holes to the same use and purpose, as the Germans did, of whom they were descended. For, they were wont as Tacitus writeth, to make holes and caves under the ground, and those to charge aloft with great heapes of dung, as harbours of refuge for Winter, and garners of receipt for corne, because by such like places they mitigate the rigour of cold wether: and if at any time the enemy commeth, hee waileth onely the open ground: but as for those things that lie hidden and buried under the earth, they are either unknowne, or in this respect doe disappoint the enemies, for that they are to be sought for.

From above Feversham, the shoare runneth on, plentifull of shel-fish, but especially oysters, (whereof there are many pits, or stewes) as far as Reculver, and farther. This Reculver, is a place of ancient memorie, named in the old English-Saxon Reaculf, but in elder time REGVLBIUM. For so it is named, in the Roman Office booke Notitia Provinciarum; which reporteth that the capitaine of the primer band of the Vetassians lay heere in garrison under the Lieutenant of the Saxon-shoare: (for so was the sea coast a-long this tract called) who had the command then of nine Ports, as the L. Warden now hath of five Ports. And verily the Roman Emperours coines digged up there give testimony to this antiquitie of the place: In it Aethelbert King of Kent when he had made a grant of Canterbury to Augustine the Monk, built himselfe a Palace, and Bassa an English-Saxon beatified it with a Monasterie, out of which Brightwald the Eighth Archbishop of Canterbury was elected. Of this Monastery, or Minster it was named Raculf-Minster, what time as Edred brother to King Edward the Elder gave it to Christ-church in Canterbury. Howbeit, at this day it is nothing else but an uplandish country towne, and if it bee of any name, it hath it for the salt savory Oysters there dredged, and for that Minster; the steeples whereof shooting up their loftie spires stand the Mariners in good stead, as markes, whereby they avoide certaine sands and shelves in the mouth of the Thames. For, as he *verifieth in his Philippeis.

*Cernit oloriferum Thamisin sua Doridi amara.
Flumina miscentem*

It now beholds swann-breeding Thames, where he doth mix his streame
With brackish sea

Now are we come to the Isle Tanes, which the river Stour, by Bede named Wantsum, severeth from the firme land by a small channell running betweene, which river made of two divers rivelets in the wood-land called the Weald, so soone as it goeth in one entire streame, visiteth Ashford and Wye, two prery Mercate townes well knowne: Either of them had sometimes their severall Colledges of Priests: the one built by Iohn Kemp Archbishop of Canterbury, who was there borne: the other to wit of Ashford, by Sir R. Fogge Knight. Wye also had a speciall fountaine, into which God infused a wonderfull gift and vertue at the instant prayer of Eustace a Norman Abbat, if we may beleve Roger of Hoveden, whom I would advise you to have recourse unto if you take delight in such like miracles. As how the blind by drinking thereof recovered sight, the dumbe their speech, the deafe their hearing, the lame their limbes. And how a woman possessed of the devill, sipping thereof vomited two toades which immediately were first transformed into huge blacke dogs, and againe into asses: and much more no lesse strange than ridiculous, which some in that age as easily believed, as others falsely forged. Thence the Stour leaving Eastwell the inhabitation of the family of the Finches, worshipfull of it selfe, and by descent from Philip Belknap, and Peoplesham: goeth on to Chilham, or, as other call it Iulham, where are the ruines of an old Castle, which one Fulbert of Dover is reported to have built: whose issue male soone failed, and ended in a daughter inheritrice, whom Richard the base sonne of King Iohn tooke to wife, and had with her this Castle and the lands thereto belonging: Of her hee begat two daughters; namely Lora the wife of William Marmion, and Isabell wife first to David of Strathboly Earle of Athole in Scotland, afterward to Sir Alexander Biall who was called called to Parliament by the name of Lord of Chilham: & mother to that John Fate of Atbole, who being condemned oftentimes for treason was hanged at the last upon a gibbet fifty foot high (as the King commanded because he might be so much the more conspicuous in mens eyes, as he was of higher and nobler birth) and being downe halfe alive, had his head smitten off, and the truncke of his body throwen to the fire, a very cruell kinde of punishment and seldome seene among us. And after his goods were confiscate, King Edward the first bounteously bestowed this castle together with * Felbergh Hundred upon Sir Bartholomew Badilsmer; who likewise quickly lost the same, for his treason, as I have before related. There is a constant report among the inhabitants, that Iulius Caesar in his second voiage against the Britans encamped at this Chilham, and that thereof it was called * Iulham, that is, Iulius his Mansion: and if I be not deceived, they have the truth on their side. For heereabout it was when at his second remove, he in his march staied upon the intelligence that his ships were fore weather-beaten, and thereupon returned and left his army encamped tennue daies while he rigged and repaired the decayes of his Navy. And in his march from hence, was encountered sharply by the Britans, and lost with many other Laberius Durus a Marshall of the field. A little beneath this towne there is a pretty hillocke to be seene apperelled in a fresh suit of greene ford, where men say, many yeeres agoe one Iulhaber was entered, whom some dreame to have bene a Giant, others, a Witch. But I conceiving an opinion that some antiquity lieth hidden under that name, doe almost perswade my selfe, that the foresaid Laberius was heere buried, and so that the said hillocke became named Iul-laber.

Five miles from hence the river Stoure dividing his Channell, runneth swiftly by DYROVERNVM the chiefe Citie of this Countie and giveth it his name. For Durwhern in the * British tongue signifieth a swift river: Ptolome calleth it in kind of Durovernum, DARVERNVM, Bede and others DOROBORNIA, the English Saxons Cant-papa-bypig, that is, The Kentishmens citie: Ninnius and the Britans Cent, that is, the Citie of Cent, wee, Canterbury, and the later writers in Latine Canthuari. A right aient citie this is, and famous, no doubt in the Romans time: not so great (as William of Malmesbury said, 400. yeares since) nor verie small: much renowned both for the situation, and exceeding fertility of the soile adjoining, as also for the whole and undecaied enclosing it round about, by reason likewise of the rivers watering, and commodiousnesse of woods there about; besides the vicinity of the sea, yeelding much fish to serve it. Whiles the Saxons Heptarchie flourished, it was the head citie of the kingdome of Kent and the kings seat; untill such time as king Ethelbert passed grant of it together with the roialty thereof unto Augustine the Apostle as they called him, and consecrated Archbishop of the English Nation, who established here his habitation for himselfe and his successors. And albeit the Metropolitan dignity, together with the honour of the Pall (that is an Episcopall vestiment that was coming over the shoulders, made of a sheepe skin, in memoriall of him that sought the flay sheepe, and having found the same laid it upon his shoulders, wrought and embroydered with crosses, first laied upon Saint Peters coffin or shrine) was ordained by Saint Gregorie the Great then Pope, to bee at London, yet for the honour of Augustine it was translated hither. For, Kennelph King of the Mercians thus writteth unto Pope Leo. Because Augustine of blessed Memorie, the minister of Gods word unto the English Nation, and who most gloriously governed the Churches of English Saxons, departed this life in the Citie of Canterburie, and his bodie was there buried in the Minke of Saint Peter Prince of the Apostles, the which Laurence his successors consecrated, it hath pleased all the wise men of our nation, that the Metropolitan honour should bee conferred upon that Citie where his bodie was entombed, who engraffed in these parts the verie Christian faith. But whether the Archbishops See and Metropolitan dignity were here ordeined by authority of the wise men of our nation (that is to say) the States of the Parliament, (to speake according to our time) or by Augustine him selfe whiles hee lived, as others would have it: the Bishops of Rome, who next followed established the same so, as they decreed, That to have it severed and taken away from them was an abominable act punishable with Curse and hell-fire. Since which time, it is incredible, how much it hath flourished, in regard both of the Archiepiscopal dignity, and also of that schoole of the better kind of literature which Theodore the seventh Archbishop erected there. And albeit it was sore shaken with the Danish wars, and consumed for a great part thereof sundrie times by casualtie of fire, yet rose it up alwaies againe more beautifull and glorious then before.

After the Normans entrie into this land when King William Rufus, as it was recorded in the Register of Saint Augustines Abbey, had given the Citie of Canterburie wholly in fee simple unto the Bishops, which before time they had held at the Kings contrie only, it begun not onely to get heart againe; what through the fame of the religious piety of godly men there; and what through the bounty of the Bishops, and especially of Samon Sudbury, who rebuilt the walls new; but grew also as it were upon a sodaine to such a state, that for beauty of private dwelling, houses it equalled all the cities of Britaine, but for the magnificent and sumptuous building of religious places and the number of them, it surpassed even those that were most famous. Among which; two especially sarmounted all; Christs-church, and Saint Augustines, both of them replenished with Monkes of the Order of Saint Benet. And as for Christs-Church, it raiseth it selfe aloft neare the heart of the Citie, with so great a majestic and stateliness, that it striketh a sensible impression of religion into their minds that behold it a farre off. This Church built in old time, as Beda saith, by the faithfull and believing Romans, the same Augustine of whom I spake, got into his hands, consecrated it to Christ, and assigned it to be the seat for his successors: wherein 73. Archbishops in a continued traine of succession have now set. Of whom Lanfranke, and William Corboyle brought the upper part of the Church, and they that succeeded, the nethermore, (whereas that the more ancient worke had bene consumed with fire) to that stateliness which now wee see not without exceeding great charges, which a devout perswasion in former times willingly disbursed. For a number of high, of low, and of meane degree flocked hither in pilgrimage with very great and rich oblations to visit the tombe of Thomas Becket the Archbishop: who being slaine in this Church by Courtiers, for that in maintaining of the Ecclesiasticall liberties, hee had stubbornly opposed himselfe against the King, was matriculated a holy Martyr by the Bishop of Rome, and worshipped as a Saint, and his shrine so loaden with great offerings, that the meanest part of it, was of pure gold, so bright, so shining and glittering, as Erasmus (who saw it) saith, was every corner with rare and exceeding big precious stones: yea, and the Church all round about did abound with more than princelike riches: and as though Christs name to whom it was dedicated, had bene quite forgotten, it came to be called Saint Thomas Church. Neither was it for any thing else so famous, as for his memoriall and sepulture, although it may justly vaunt of many famous mens tombs and monuments: especially, that of Edward surnamed The Blaque Prince of Wales, a most worthy and renowned Knight for warlike prowesse, and the very wonder of his age: also of Henry the Fourth, a most puissant King of England. But Henry the Eighth scattered this wealth heaped up together in so many ages; and dispersed those Monkes: in lieu of whom were placed in this Christs-Church, a Deane, an Archdeacon; Prebendaries twelve, and Sixte Preachers, who in places adjoining round about should teach and preach the word of God. The other Church that alwaies mightily strove with this for superioritie, stood by the Cities side Eastward, knowne by the name of Saint Augustines: which Augustine himselfe, and King Ethelbert at his exhortation, founded and dedicated to Saint Peter and Paul: that it might be the Sepulture place, both for the Kings of Kent, and also for the Archbishops; (For, as yet it was not lawfull to bury within Cities) and endowed it with infinite riches, granting unto the Abbat a Mint-house with priviledge to coine money. And now, at this day, notwithstanding the greatest part thereof is buried under his owne ruines, and the rest were converted to the Kings house; yet it sheweth manifestly to the beholders how great a thing it was. Augustine himselfe was enterr'd in the porch of the same, with this Epitaph, as witnesseth Thomas Spot.

Inclutus

Incoltas Anglorum praeulpius, & decus alium, Hic Augustinus requiescit corpore sanctus.

The bodie of Saint Augustine doth here interred lie:

A Prelate great, devout also, and Englands honor hic.

But, as Bede reporteth, who rather is to be credited, this was the more ancient description of his tombe.

HIC REQUIESCIT DOMINVS AVGVSTINVS DOROVERNENSIS

NIAS, EODEM REGE REGNANTE.

HERE RESTETH DAN. AVGVSTINE, THE FIRST ARCHBISHOP OF TERBURY: VWHO BEING IN TIMES PAST DIRECTED HITHER FROM SED GREGORIE THE BISHOP OF ROME, AND THROUGH THE WORKING OF MIRACLES SVPPORTED BY GOD, BOTH BROUGHT KING ETHELBERT AND HIS PEOPLE FROM IDOLATRY TO THE FAITH OF CHRIST, AND SO AFTER THE DATES OF HIS FVNCTION ACCOMPLISHED IN PACE, AND THE SEVENTH DAY BEFORE THE KALENDS OF IYNE, IN THE SAME KING REIGNE.

Together with him in the same porch were buried fixe Archbishops next ding, and in memoriall of these seven namely, Austen, Laurence, Mellitus, John Honorus, Deus-dedit, and Theodosius, were these verses (such as they are) engraven there in marble:

SEPTEM SVNT ANGLIS PRIMATES ET PROTO PATRES, SEPTEM RECTORES, SEPTEM CORLOQUE TRIONES; SEPTEM CISTERNAE VITAE, SEPTEMQUE LUCERNAE; ET SEPTEM PALMAE REGNI, SEPTEMQUE CORONAE, SEPTEM SVNT STELLAE, QUAS HABET TENET AREA CELLARVM.

Seven Patriarchs of England, Primates seven:
Seven Rectors, and seven Labourers in heaven.
Seven Cesternes pure of life, seven Lamps of light
Seven Palmes, and of this Realme seven Crowns full bright, Seven Starres, are heere bestow'd in vault below.

I may not forget another Church neere unto this, built as Bede saith, by the mans and consecrated to Saint Martin, wherein, before Austen coming, Arch wife to King Ethelbert, descended from the bloud Royall of France was wont to quent divine Christian service. Concerning the Castle on the South side of the tie, the Bulwarks whereof now are decayed, it maketh no shew of any great antiquity, and there is no memorable thing therof come to my knowledge, but only that it was built by the Normans: as touching the dignitie of the See of Canterbury, which times past carried a great State, I will say nothing but this, that, as in former during the Roman Hierarchie, the Archbishops of Canterbury were Primates of Britaine, Legates to the Pope, and as Frabae the second said, The Patriarches, as of another world: so when the Popes authoritie was abrogated, a decree passed in the Synode, Anno, 1534. that laying aside the said title, they should bee stiled Primates and Metropolitans of all England. Which dignitie the right reverend Father in Christ
D. John Whitgift lately held, who devoutly consecrated both his whole life to God all his painefull labours to the Church, and in the year 1604. slept in the Lord.

late much missed of all good men: After whom succeeded Doctor Richard Bancroft, a man of singular courage and counsaile, in establishing and supporting the state Ec-clesiasticall. For the Latitude of Canterbury, the Pole Artick is elevated above the Horizon there fifty one degrees and sixteene minures, and the Longitude is reckoned to be foure and twenty degrees, and fittie one minutes.

Scour by this time having gathered his waters all into one streame runneth beside Hackington, where Dame Lora Countesse of Leicester, a most honourable Lady in those daies, having abandoned all worldly pleasures, sequestred her selfe from the world devoutly, to serve God wholly. Afore which time Baldwin Archbishop of Canterbury began a Church there in the honour of Saint Stephen, and Thomas of Canterbury. But being inhabited by the Bishop of Rome his authoritie, for feare the same might prejudice the Monkes of Canterbury, hee gave over the workes, Howbeit ever since, the name remained and the place is called Saint Stephens: of which Sir Roger Manwood Knight, L. cheife Baron of the Exchequer, a man of exquisite knowledge in our common lawes, (unto whom for his bounteous liberalitie the poore inhabitants are much beholding) was of late time a right great ornament: and even so is his sonne at this day Sir Peter Manwood Knight of the Bath, whom I cannot but mention when as he is a favourer of vertue, and learning. From thence Scour passeth by Fordich (called the little Burrough of Forewich in King William the Conquerours booke) a place of note for excellent good trouts; and so in former time to Stoure-mouth, which it hath now forsaken a mile, and more; yet left and bequeathed his name to it. But now by Stoure-mouth runneth a brooke which issuing out of Saint Eadburghs well at Liming (where the daughter to King Ethelbert first of our nation tooke the veile) while it seeketh the sea, seeth Elham a mercate towne of which I have read nothing, but that the Mannour was the inheritance of Julian Leibourn a Ladie of great honour in her time, who was mother of Laurence Hastings first Earle of Penbrooke of that surname, and after wife to William Clinton Earle of Huntingdon. Then it holdeth his course by divers villages, which thereof receive the addition of Bourn, as Bishops-bourn, Hawles-bourn, Patricks-bourn, and Beakes-bourn. This bourne is that river Stoure as Cesar calleth it (as I have observed travailling lately in these parts) which Cesar came unto, when he had marched by night almost twelve Italian miles from the sea-coast, and where hee had the first encounter, in his second expedition into Britaine; with the Britaines, whom he drave into the woods, where they had a place fortified both by nature, and mens labour, with a number of trees hewen downe and plashed to fore-clofe the entries, But yet the Romans forced an entrie, drave them out, and there about encamped. The place of campe as I heare, is neare Hardes, a place of ancient Gentlement of that surname, descended from Esten grave, Herengod, and the Fitz-Bernards.

Belowe Stoure-mouth, Stoure dividing his streame taketh two severall waies, and leaving that name is called In lade and Wautsume, making the Isle of Tenet on the West and South side: for on all other sides it is washed with the maine Sea. This Island Solinus named ATHANATON, and in other copies THANATON: the Britaines Inis Rubin, as witnesseth Asserius: happily, for Rhutupin, of Rhutupina a Citie adjoining. The English Saxons called it Tanet, and Tanetcland, and we Tenet. All the Isle standeth upon a whitish mile, full of goodly corne fields, and being a right fertile soile, carrieth in length eight miles, and foure in breadth: reckoned in old time to con-taine 600. Families: in stead whereof, it is corruptly read in Bede Milliarum Sexcentarum, for, Familiarum Sexcentarum. But whereas Solinus writeth that there is not a snake creeping in this Isle, and that the mould or earth carried from hence killeth snakes, it is now proved to bee untrue. That Etymologie therefore derived tanet from tanet, that is, from the death of snakes, falleth quite to the ground. Here the English Saxons landed first: here by the permission of Guortigern they first seated themselves: here was their place of refuge; and here Guortimor the Britaine made a great slaughter of them: when, at Lapis Tituli, (for so is that place named in Ninnius which we now call Stonar almost in the same sense, and haven certainly it was) hee put them to flight flight and forced them with all the speed they might to take their Pinnaces.

In which place also, he gave commandment, saith he, that himselfe should be buried to repress there by, as he thought, the furious outrages of the English Saxons: in like sort as Scipio Africanus did, who commanded that his tombe should be so set, as that it might looke toward Africa: supposing that his verie tombe would be a terror to the Carthaginians. Here also at Vvipped fleet, (so called of Vvipped the Saxon there slaine) Hengest discomfited the Britains and put them to flight, after he had fore tired them with sundry conflicts. S. Austine our Apostle (as they call him) many years after landed in this Isle, unto whose blessing the credulous Clergie ascribed the plentiful fertility of the country: and the Monke Gotceline cried out in this manner: O the land of Tenet, happy by reason of her fertility, but most happy for receiving and entertaining so many Divine in-commers bringing God with them, or rather so many heavenly citizens. Egbert the third King of the Kentishmen to pacifie dame Dunm a devout Lady, whom before time he had exceedingly much wronged, granted her a faire piece of land, wherein she erected a Monastery for 70. veiled virgins: the prioress whereof was Mildred, for her holinesse canonized a Saint, and the Kings of Kent bestowed many faire possessions upon it, but Wibred especially, who (that I may note the antiquitie and manner of livery of Seisin in that age out of the very forme of his owne Donation) For the full complement of his confirmation thereof, laid up on the holy altar a turf of that ground which he gave at Humanun. Heere after ward in dry times arrived the Danes who piteously impoverished this Island by robbings and pillages, and also polluted this Monasterie of Domneva with all kind of cruelty, that flourished not againe before the Normans government. Heere also landed Lois of France, who called in by the tumultuous Barons of England against King Edm, published by their instigation a pretended right to the Crowne of England. For whereas King John for his notorious treason against King Richard his brother slaine in the Holy-land, was by his Peeres lawfully condemned, and therefore after the death of King Richard the right of the Crowne was devolved to the Queene of France sister to the said King Richard; and that shee and her heires had conveyed their right to the said Lewis, and his wife her daughter: Also that King Edm forfeited his Kingdome both by the murder of his Nephew Arthur, whereof he was found guilty by his Peeres in France, and also by subjecting his Kingdome which were alwaies, free to the Pope, as much as in him lay, contrary to his oath at his Coronation, and that without the consent of the Peeres of the Realme, &c. Which leave to Historians, with the successe of his expedition, least I might seeme to digresse extraordinarily.

Neither must I passe over heere in silence, that which maketh for the single praise of the inhabitants of Tenet, those especially which dwell by the roads or harbours of Margate, Ramsgate and Brodsteare. For, they are passing industrious, not as if they were Amphibii, that is, both land creatures, and sea creatures, get their living both by sea and land, as one would say with both these elements: they be Fishermen and Plough-men: as well Husband-men as Mariners: and they that hold the plough-taile inearing the ground, the same hold the helme in steering the ship. According to the season of the yeare, they knit nets, they fish for Cods, Herrings, Mackarels, &c. they saile, and carry forth Merchandise. The same againe dung and manure their grounds, Plough, Sow, harrow, reape their Corne and they inne it. Men well ready and well appointed both for sea and land: and thus goe they round and keep a circle in these their labours. Furthermore whereas that otherwhiles there happen shipwrackes heere, (for there lie full against the shore those dangerous flats, called lowes, shelves, and sands, so much feared of Sailers, which they use to call, The Godwin sands, The Brakes, The four-foots, The whiddick, &c.) these men are wont to bethe themselves lustily in recovering both ships, men, and Merchandize endangered.

At the mouth of Wantsum Southward, (which men thinke hath changed his channel) over against the Isle stood a City, which Ptolomee calleth RHVTVPIA, Tenetus, PORTVS TRVTVLENSIS, for Rhutupensis, if Bedae Renanus coniectured truly.

truly: Antonine, RHVTVPI PORTVS, Ammianus Marcellinus, RHVTVPIAE STATIO, that is, the Road of Rhutupia, Orosius, THE HAVEN and City of Rhutubus: the old English-Saxons as Beda witnesseth, Reptacester, others Ruptimuth, Alfred of Beverly nameth it Richberge: we at this day, Richborow: Thus hath time sported in varying of one and the same name. Whence this name should arise, it is not for certaine knowen. But seeing the places neere unto it, as Sandwich and Sandiby have their denomination of Sand: I considering also, that Rhyd Tufish in the British-tongue betokeneth a sandy fowrd, I would willingly if I durst, derive it from thence. This City seemed to have beene seated on the descent of an hill, the Castle there stood overlooking from an higher place the Ocean which is now so farre excluded by reason of sandy residence inbeached with the tides, that it comes hardly within a mile of it. Right famous and of great name was this City while the Romans ruled here. From hence was the usual passing out of Britan to France and the Neatherlands at it, the Roman fleets arrived here, it was that Lupicinus sent by Constantinus the Emperour into Britaine for to repress the rodes and invasions of Scots and Picts both, landed the Heruli, and Bavarians, and Masian regiments. Heere also Theodosius the father of Theodosius the Emperour, to whom as Symmachus witnesseth, the Senate decreed for pacifying Britan armed Statues on horse-backe, arrived with his Herculij, Iovij, Victores & Fidentes, for these were names of Roman regiments. After wards when the Saxon Pirates impeached entercourse of merchants and infested our coasts with continuall piracies, the Second Legion Augusta, which being remooved by the Emperour Claudius out of Germany had remained many yeares in Garrison at Isea Silurum in Wales, was translated hither, and had a Provost of their owne heere under the great Lieutenant and Count of the Saxon shore. Which Provostship happily, that Clemens Maximus bare, who being heere in Britan by the soldiers saluted Emperour, slew Gratian, the lawfull Emperour; and was afterwards himselfe slaine by Theodosius at Aquileia: For, this Maximus it was whom Ausonius in the verses of Aquileia, called the Rhutupine robber.

Felix quae tanti spectatrix lata triumph,

Fudisti Ausonio Rhutupinum Mare latronem.

The same Poet also in his Poem Parentalia, preserved the memory of Flavius Sanctus another President or Governour of Rhutupia, concerning whom thus hee wrote.

Militiam nullo qui turbine sedulus egit,

Præside letatus quo Rhutupinus ager.

His martiall service who discharged with care without all stirre,

And Rhutupin rejoyce in him, who was their governour.

Ausonius likewise in a lamentable funerall verse, setteth forth the praise of Claudius Contentus his Uncle, who being overtaken with death left behind him unto strangers a mighty stock of money which hee had put out to usury among the Britaines and encreased by interest; and was heere also enterred.

Et patruos Elegia meos reminiscere cantus,

Contentum, tellus quem Rhutupina tegit.

My dolefull Muse now call to minde the songs of Vnkle mine;

Contentus, who enterred lies within mould Rhutupine.

This Rhutupia flourished also after the coming in of the English Saxons. For, writers record, that it was the Royall Palace of Ethelbert King of Kent; and Beda gave it the name of a City. But ever since, it beganne to decay: neither is the name of it read in any place afterward, as farre as I know, but in Alfred of Beverley, who hath put downe in writing, that Alcher with a power of Kentish-men at this towne, then called Richberge, foiled and defeated the Danes encombered with the spoiles they had before gotten.

Now hath time razed out all the footings and tractes thereof, and to teach us that Cities as well as men have their fatall periods, it is a verie field at this daie, wherein when the corne is come uppe a man may see the draught of streetes crossing one another: (For, wherefoever the streetes went, there the corne is thinn) which the common people terme Saint Augustins Crosse. And there remaine onely certaine walles of a Castle of rough flint, and long Britan bricke in forme of a quadrant and the same cemented with lime, and most stiffe binding sand, mightily strengthened by tract of time, so that the corne is as hard as the stone. Over the entrie whereof is fixed a head of a personage engraven in stone, some say it was Queene Berthas head, but I take it to bee a Rome worke, a man would deeme this to have bene the Citadell or keepe of the City, it stands on such a height over-looking the low grounds in Tenes, which the Ocean by little and little shrinking away hath now left. Moreover, the plor whereon the Citie stood, being now plowed up, doth oftentimes discover peeces of Rome coines as well gold as silver, evident tokens of the antiquity thereof: and a little neath theweth a daughter of hers, which the English Saxons of sand call Sonþýc, and wee, Sandwich. This beeing one of the Cinque-ports, as they terme them, is on the North and West side, fortified with walles and on other parts fenced with a rampier, river and ditch. The haven by reason of sand choaking it, and great shippe of burden belonging to Pope Paule the Fourth, which was accidentallie funke in the verie channell thereof, is not deepe enough to beare any vessels.

In ancient times it sundrie times felt the furious forces of the Danes, afterward King Canutus the Dane when hee had gained the Crowne of England, bestowed it upon Christs-Church in Canterburie with the royaltie of the water on each side, so farre forth as a shippe beeing a floate, a man might cast a Danish hake out of the vessell to the banke. In the Norman raigne it was reckoned one of the Cinque ports, and to finde five shippes. In the yeare 1217. Lewis of France whom wee spake lately, burned it, King Edward the first for a time placed heere a staple, and King Edward the Third by exchange reunited it to the Crowne. About which time there flourished heere a familie surnamed De Sandwich, which had matched with one of the heires of Creve-cur, and Dauranches, Lord of Flugh, and deserved well of this place. In the time of King Henrie the Sixth was burned by the French. In our daies Sir Roger Mamood chiefe Baron of the chequer native of this place, built, and endowed heere a free-schoole, and the Netherlanders have bettered the towne by making, and trading of Baies, and other commodities.

Beneath Rhutupia, Ptolomee placeth the Promontorie CANTIVM as the head cape of this Angle, which in some copies is corruptly written NVCANTIVM and A CANTIVM: Diodorus as corruptly calleth it CARION, and we at this day call Foreland of Kent. Now all these shores on every side, are of this Rhutupia by the Poets termed Rhutupina littora. Hence it is, that Iuvenall satyrically inveighing against Curtius Montanus a dainty and delicious glutton, speaking of oysters carried from this shore to Rome, hath these verses.

— nulli major fuit usus edendi Tempestate meâ, Circeis nata forent, an Lucrinum ad saxum, Rhutupinove edita fundo Ostrea, callebat primo deprendere morsu.

None in my time had more use of his tooth,
Whence oysters came, where they were bred, full well
He knew: at Circeie cape, at Lucrine rock, forsooth,
Or Rhutup * coast, at first bit he could tell.

And Lucan the Poet.

when it is come as farre as Sandon (that is to say the Downe of Sand), and to Deale, and Walmer, three Neighbour Castles, which King Henrie the Eighth, within the remembrance of our Fathers built, it setteth low, and in a flat and open plaine lieth full against the sea. At this Deale, or Dole: as Ninnius calleth it (and that truly in mine opinion: For, our Britains at this day doe so terme a plaine lying low and open upon sea or river) the constant report goes that Julius Caesar did arrive: and Ninnius avoucheth as much, who in barbarous Latine wrote thus, Caesar ad Dole bellum peragavit, that is, At Dole Caesar fought a battaile. A Table likewise set up in Dover Castle confirmeth the same: yea and Caesar himselfe verifieth it: who reporteth that he landed upon an open and plaine shore, and that the Britaines welcommed and received him with a hote and dangerous encounter. Whereupon, our Country man Leland in his Swans song

Iactat Dela novas celebris arces,

Notus Casareis locus trophaeis.

Deale famed much, vnants of new turrets hie,

A place well knowne by Casars victorie.

For hee, (give mee leave I pray you to digresse awhile out of my course) having, (as Pomponius Sabinus reporteth out of Seneca) wonne all that was to be gotten by sea and land, cast his eie to the Ocean, and as if the Romane world would not suffice him, berthought him selfe upon another world: and with a fleet of a thousand saile (for so writeth Athenius out of Cotus, either to be revenged of the Britains who aided the Gauls (as Strabo saith; or in hope of British pearles, as Suetonius reporteth: or inflamed with an ambitious desire of glory, as others doe record, in the yeare before Christs nativirie fiftie foure, and once againe in the yeare ensuing, entred into Britaine: having before hand founded the havens by his espialls, as Suetonius, and himselfe doth testifie; and not, as Roger Bacon fableth, by setting certaine looking glasses upon the coast of Gaulle, and by Art perspective, which by reflection multiplieth hidden formes. What hee exploited here, himselfe hath at large delivered in his Commentaries; and I likewise before have summarily abridged out of him, and the writings of Suetonius concerning Scæva, whose valourous service during the civill warre was notably seen above others at Dyrrachium, and whom our Poet Ioseph of Excester in his Antiocheis, and namely in these his verses touching Britaine, reported (I know not how truly) to have bene a Britaine borne.

Hinc et Scæva satus, pars non obscura tumultus

Civulis, MAGNUM solus qui mole soluta

Obfedit, meliorq, stetit pro Casare murus.

Here borne also was Scæva, he that bare no little sway

In all these civill broiles; the Fort that stood full in his way Alone he brake, Pompey besieged, was Casars strongest stay.

But what were the exploits of Caesar in this our country, learne you may of himselfe, and out of that which hath before bene written. For, neither as yet, have I met with that old father a Britaine, whom Marcus Aper, as we read in Quintilian, saw in this Island; who avowed that he was present at the battaile, in which they assaied to keepe Caesar from landing, when he came to warre upon them: neither is it any part of my meaning now to write an Historie, but a Topographie.

Vpon this shore, lie out with a long traine certaine heapes in manner of bankes or rampiers, which some imagine that the winde swept up together. But I suppose them to have bene a fence and countermure, or rather the Ship-campe, which Caesar raised with ten daies and as many nights labour, to haile up thereto his sea-beaten and shaken Navie, and to defend it, both against tempests and also the Britaines, who in vaine did assaile it.

For I understand by relation of the dwellers, thereby, that this rampier is called Romes worke, as if it were A worke of the Romans. And so much the rather believe I, that Caesar arrived heere, because hee writeth, that seven miles miles from hence, (for, so wee reade in the ancient bookes, corrected by Flavius Constantinus a man of Consul degree) the sea is kept in and compassed with such freight mountaines that for the higher places a dart may bee flung to the very shore: verily as soone as we are past Deale, a mightie ridge of steepe high Cliffs, Cliffes termeth them moles magnificas, that is, Stately cliffs bringing forth Samphire in great plenty, runneth for seven miles or there about, as far as to Dover: where it openeth it selfe: and of that nature is the place, that, right as Cæsar writeth, betweene two hills it letteth in and encloseth the sea. Within this partition and separation of the Cliffs lieth Dover, which Antonine the Emperour mentioneth, the Saxons name it Dopna, and we Dover. This name was given unto it, as Darell out of Eadmer writeth, because the place was shut up and hard to come unto. For, when as, (saith he) in ancient times the sea there barbarous spreaded it selfe upon urgem. cessitie to make it a more commodious haven, they kept it in with more freight banks. Howbeit, William Lambard, with more probabilitie terched the reason of this name from the word Dufyrba, which in the British language betokeneth a place steepe and upright.

The towne which is seated betweene high clyffes (whereas some time the haven was, when the sea more insinuated it selfe, as wee collect by the anchors and ship planks that are digged there up; is more famous for the commodiouse of the haven, (such as it is) and for readie passage into France, than for any elegance, or great trade. For it is a place of passage of all other most haunted, and it was provided in old time by a speciall Statute, that no man going forth of the realme in pilgrimage, should else where embarque and take sea: more-over it is reckoned one of the Cinque-ports, and in times past it was charged to furnish and set out one and twenty ships unto the warres, in the same manner and forme as Hastings did, whereof I have already spoken. Toward the sea (now somewhat excluded by Beach) it was fenced with a wall; whereof some part as yet standeth. It had a faire church consecrated unto Saint Martin, founded by Whitred King of Kent, an house also of the Knights-Templars, which now are quite gone, and nothing to bee seene of them: It yieldeth likewise a seat for the Archbishop of Canterburie Suffragans, who when the Archbishop is busied in weightier affaires, manageth for him matters that pertaine to Orders onely, and not to the Episcopall jurisdiction. From the top of a rough and cragie cliffe which mounteth up to a wonderfull height, where it looketh downe to the sea: a most stately Castle like unto a prettie Citie fortified right strongly with bul-warkes and many a Tower, overlooketh and threatneth after a sort the sea: Matthew of Paris calleth it the Key and Locke, The Barre and Sparre of England. The common fort of people dreameth, that it was built by Julius Cæsar, and verily I suppose by the British Bricks in the Chappell there, that it was built by the Romans, who used such in their great buildings. What time as the Roman Empire declined, they placed here a band or companie of the Tungricans, who were accounted among the Aides-Palatine: out of whose armoury and munition happily were those big arrowes, which the Castellanes doe now shew for wonders, and were wont to bee discharged then, and many yeares after, before the invention of great Ordnance, out of engines called Baliste like huge crosse-bowes bent by force of two or foure men.

From the entrance of the English Saxons into this land, unto the expansion of their Kingdome, no where could I as yet reade so much as one bare word of this Caille or the Towne; save onely in certaine by-notes out of a Table, that was heere hanged upon a wall; which reported that Cæsar, having arrived at Deale, and discomfited the Brittaines at Baramdowne (which is a plaine adjoyning, fit for horse fight, and meete to embattle an armie in) began the Castle of Dover; and that Arviragus afterward fortified it against the Romans, and stopped up the haven. Also, that after him King Arthur and his knights vanquished I wor not what rebels heere. Howbeit a little before the Normans comming in, it was reported the onely defence and strength of England: and for that cause William Duke of Normandie, bound Harold by an oath to deliver up into his hands this Castle together with the well, what time as he aspired to the Kingdome: and after hee had settled his estate and affaires at London, thought it good before all other things to fortifie this peece, and to assigne faire lands in Kent unto Gentlemen to bee held in Castle-guard, with this condition to be in readinesse with certaine numbers of men for defence of the same: which service notwithstanding at this day is redeemed with a yearly payment of money. For, when Sir Hubert de Burgh was Constable of this Castle, (to use the words of an old writer) he weighed with himselfe that it was not safe for the Castle to have every moneth new warders for the Castle-guard, procured by the assent of the King and all that held of that Castle, that every one should send for the ward of one moneth tenne shillings: and that therewith certaine men elected and sworne, as well horse as foote, should be waged, for to gard the Castle. It is written, that Phillip surnamed Aufort, King of France, when Lewis his sonne, went about to gaine the Crowne of England, had wonne certaine Cities and Forts, and could not get this, being manfully defended by the said Sir Hubert de Burgh: said thus. Verily my sonne hath not one fane of land in England, untill he be Master of Dover Castle: as beeing in very deed the strongest hold of all England and most commodious for the French. Upon the other cliffe which standeth over against it, and beareth up his head, in manner, even with it, are extant the remaines of a very ancient building. One, I know not upon what reason induced, said it was Cæsar's Altar. But John Twinn of Canterbury a learned old man, who in his youth saw a great part thereof standing whole and entire, assured me, that it had beene a Watch-towre to give night light and direction to ships. Like as there stood another opposite unto it at Bologne in France, erected there by the Romans, and long after reedified by Charles the Great (as Regino witnesseth, in whom Pharum, for Pharum, is falsly read, which at this day the French terme Tour de Order, and the English, The old man of Bullen. Under this cliffe, Henry the Eighth, in our fathers daies with exceeding labour, and 63000. pounds charges, by pitching huge posts fast within the very sea, and the same bound together with yron worke, and heaping thereupon a deale of timber and stones, brought up a mightie Pile which we call, The Peere, wherein the ships might more safely ride. But the furious violence of the raging Ocean soone overcame the laudable endeavour of that puissant Prince, and so the frame of this worke beaten continually upon with the waves, became disjoynd. For the repaire whereof, Queene Elizabeth laid out a great summe of money, and the Authoritie of Parliament imposed upon every English ship that carry forth or bring in merchandise a certaine toll upon Tonnage for certaine yeares.

This Sea coast of Britaine is seperated from the Continent of Europe by a frete or freight, where, as some suppose the Seas brake in and made way betweene the lands. Solinus calleth it Fretum Gallicum, Tacitus, and Ammianus Macellinus, Fretum Oceani, and Oceanum Fretalem, Gratius the Poet:

Freta Morinum dubio refluencia ponto.

The narrow Seas on Boilen-coast that keepe uncertaine tides.

They of the Netherlands call it Dehofden, of the two heads or promontories: we the Narrow-sea, and The strait of Calais, as the Frenchmen, Pas de Callais. For, this is the place as faith a Poet of our time.

*gemini quâ janna ponti
Faucibus angustis, latèque frementibus undis Gallorum Anglorumque vetat concurrere terras.*

Where current of two seas

In gullet streight, wherein throughout, their billowes rage and fret Keepes France and England so a part, as though they never met.

The narrow sea, as Marcellinus truly writeth, swelleth at every tide with terrible high floods, and againe at the ebbe, becommeth as flat as a plaine field: if it be not raised with winds, and counter-seas betweene two risings of the moone it floweth twice and ebbeeth as oft. For, as the Moone ascendeth toward the Meridian, and is set againe under the Horizon zon in the iust opposite point, the Ocean heere swelleth mightily, and the huge billowes rush upon the shores with so great a noise that the Poet might well say, Pinâq, litora fervent. And Rhurup shore doth boile and billow, and D. Paulinus wherehe speaketh of the County of Bulloigne, which he termeth the utmost shor of the world, not without cause used these words, Oceanum barbaris fluctibus fremens, that is, The Ocean raging and roaring with barbarous billowes.

Heere might arise a question becomming a learned man that hath wit and time will, whether, where this narrow sea runneth between France and Britaine now, there was a narrow banke or necke of land that in times past conjoynd these regions, and afterwards being broken either by the generall deluge, or by rushing in of the waves, or else by occasion of some earth-quake, did let in the waters to make a through passage. Verily, as no man makes doubt that the face of the whole earth hath beene altered, partly by the said deluge, and partly by long continuance of time and other causes, as also that Ilands by earthquakes, or the shrinking back of waters were laid and joynd unto firme lands: so, most certainly it appeareth by authors of best credite, that Ilands by reason of earthquakes and the breaking in of waters were severed, disjoynd, and rent from the Continent. Whereupon Pythagoras in Ovid saith thus:

*Vidi ego quod quondam fuerat solidissima tellus
Esse fretum; vidi factas ex aequore terras.*

My selfe have seene maine ground sometime turned into sea and sand,
And seene I have againe the Sea, became maine settled land.

Strabo gathering of things to come by those that are past, concluded that fish Isthmi, neckes, or narrow bankes of land, both have beene, and shall bee wrought and pierced through. You see, saith Seneca, whole regions violently removed from their places, and now to lie beyond the Sea, which lay before bounding upon it and hard by. In see, there is separation made both of Countries and nations, when as some part of nature provoked of it selfe: or when the mighty wind beatech strongly upon some sea: the force whereof, as in generall, is wonderfull. For, although it rage but in part, yet it is of the universall power that so it rageth. Thus hath the sea rent Spaine from the Continent of Africa: Thus by Decalions floud so much spoken of by the greatest Poets, was Sicilie cut from Italy, And hereupon Virgil wrote thus,

*Hec loca vi quondam, & vasta convulsa ruina
(Tantum evi longinqua valet mutare vetustas)
Disiuisse ferunt, cum protinus utraque tellus
Vna foret, venit medio vi pontus & undis, Hesperium Siculo latus absceidit, arvaq; & urbes Littore ductas angusto interluit aestu.*

These lands whilom by violence of breach and ruines great,
(Such change makes time, and what is it that long time doth not eate?)
A sunder fell (men say) where as they both in one did grow,
The Seas brake in by force, and through the mids did overthrow Both townes and grounds. And Italy forthwith from Sicily side, Did cut, and them with in-let streight doth still part and divide.

Plinie sheweth likewise of Isles, that Cyprus was rent from Syria, Eubaa, from Italia, Besbicus, from Bythinia, being parts before of the maine land: But none of the old writers was ever able to avouch, that Britaine was so severed from the Maine: only those verses of Virgil and Claudian before cited by me in the very first entrance into this worke, together with the conjecture of Servius Honoratus doe insinuate so much. And yet, Dominicus Marius Niger, and Master Iohn Twinn a right learned man, and whosoever he was that wrested these verses made of Scicilia, unto Britaine, are of this opinion:

*—Britannia quondam
Gallorum pars una fuit, sed pontus & aestus
Mutavere situm, rupit confinia Nereus
Victor: & abscessos interluit aequore montes.*

A part of France. But swelling tides on hie
Have changed the site; and Nereus he, as Conquerour hath torne
The confines quite, and runnes betweene the cliffs a sounder worne.

Considering therefore, that in this matter there is no assured ground upon certaine authorities; the learned, by laying and comparing the like examples in such narrow Seas as this, for searching out of the truth, propose these and such like points duly to be weighed and considered.

First, whether the nature of the soyle in both shores be the same; which verily is found here to be even so: For the shore of either side, where the distance betweene is narrowest, riseth up with loftie cliffes, of the same matter, as it were, and colour, so as they may seeme to have beene riven asunder.

Secondly, How great the breadth is of the sea or streight. Certes, the streight heere is not much broader, than either the streight of Gibraltar, or of Sicily: to wit, twenty foure miles over: so as at the first sight, one would imagine that these lands were severed by the billowes of the raging counter-seas. For that the land sunke downeward by earth-quakes, I hardly dare thinke, seeing that this our Northern climate of the world is seldome shaken with earth-quakes, and those when they happen, be never great.

Thirdly, How deepe the streight is. As the Streight of Sicilie is founded in depth 80. paces, so this of ours exceedeth not 25. fathom, whereas the sea on both sides of it is much deeper.

Fourthly, Of what nature the ground is in the bothoms, stony, sandy, bea chy, or else oasy, and muddy. And whether there be beds or shelves of sand lying scattered in the said narrow sea: I have learned of Sailers that there lieth but * one banke, and the same in the very mid-channell, which at a low water is scarce 3. fathoms deepe, But within halfe a league to the South-ward it is 27. fathom deepe, and to the North-ward 25.

Lastly, Whether any place in either of the two shores taketh name in the ancient language, of a breach, a plucking away, division, separation or such like: as Rhegium which standeth upon the Sicilian Streight, is named of the Greeke word Rhymus that is, to breake, because in that place, by the violent force of waves Sicilie was broken off from Italia. But thinking, as I doe heereof, I can meet with none, unlesse one would suppose that Vitruvius upon the French shore, had the name from Gwith, which in the * British tongue betokeneth a division or separation.

They that would have Britaine to have been the very continent of Gaulle after that universall deluge, argue from the wolves, whereof there were many among us in old time, like as at this day in Scotland and Ireland.

How, say they, could there be any of them in Ilands considering that all beasts and living creatures perished which were not in the Arke: unlesse a long time after, the earth had beene passable throughout, and no Isles at all. This question busied Saint Augustine, but unto it he answereth thus, *Wolves and other beasts may bee thought to have swome over the sea unto Ilands, yet onely to neere adjoyning Ilands (as Stags yearely for their reliefe and food swim out of Italy into Cicily). But some Isles there be so far remote from maine lands, that it is to be thought no beast could swim over. If it should bee said, men caught them and so brought them over with them, it carrieth some credit, that this might well have beene for the delight they had in hunting. Although it cannot bee denied but by the commandment or permission of God even by the worke of Angels they might have beene transported. But if so be they sprung out of the earth according to their first originall, when as God said, Let the earth bring forth a living soule, then it appeareth much more evidently, that all kind of living creatures were in the Arke, not so much for the encrease and reparation of them, as to * figure out sundry Nations for the sacrament of the church, in case the earth brought forth many creatures in those Ilands, whereto they can not passe. Thus Philosphizeth he. Neither is any man able upon this argument to pronounce any thing more sufficiently and exquisitely. For me, it may suffice, that I have propounded* propounded thereof, let the Reader thoroughly waigh and examine it. And hee that is able in this point to see deepest what is most true, verily I will report him a man right skilfull and deeply quick-sighted.

Morini.

On the other side in the Firme-land, inhabited the MORINI, so called in the ancient Gaules tongue, as it were Maritimi, sive Maris accolæ, men dwelling upon the Sea-coast, or hard by the sea. Their countrey is now termed Conto de Guines, and Comeli Belonois, and had in old time two places of very great name, to wit Gessoriacum, and ITIVM, * whence, as Cæsar hath recorded, there was the best and most commodious passing out of Gaul or France into Britain, and most Authors thinke it was that towne which now they call Callais. But that famous and learned man Hospitalius, Chancellour of France, a very skilfull Antiquary, avoucheth, that Callais is no ancient towne, but was only a small village, such as the French-men terme Burgados, untill that Philip Earle of Bolen, walled it about, not very many yeares before the English won it. Neither is it red in any place, that men tooke shipping there for Britaine, before those times. I thinke therefore that Itium is to bee sought some where else: that is to say, below, at Vitsan, neere unto Blacknesse, which we call Whitsan, the word founding not much unlike to Itium. For, that all men crossed over out of this Island thither, and embarked there to saile hither, wee observed out of our owne histories: in so much as certaine lands were held in Coperland neere Dover by service to hold the Kings head betweene Dover and Whit-sand when soever hee crossed the Sea there. And Lewis the younger French King when he came in devout pilgrimage to visit Thomas of Canterbury, besought that saint by way of most humble intercession, that no passenger might miscarry by shipwracke betweene Vitsan and Dover; as who would say, that at the same time, that was the usual passage to and from neither in truth, is this narrow sea else where more streightned: although it is to bee supposed, that they who saile betweene, in passing over did not respect the neerer way and shorter cut in sailing, but the commodiousest of the havens in the one shoare, and the other. For even so, albeit the sea be narrowest, betweene Blacknesse in France, and the Nesse in England, yet now the ordinary passing is betweene Dover and Callais: in former ages, before that Vitsan haven was dammed up, the passage was betweene it and Dover: and before that time, betweene Rhutupia and Gessoriacum: From whence Claudius the Emperour and the other capitaines, whom I have spoken of, sailed over into Britaine. This Gessoriacum, Pliny seemeth to call, Portum Armorum Britannicum, peradventure for the passage from thence into Britaine Ptolomeus, whom it hath crept into the place of Itium, nameth it Gessoriacum Navale, in which signification also our Welsh-Britans commonly terme it Eowling-long, that is, Below the ship-road.

Gessoriacum.

For that Gessoriacum was the very same Sea-coast towne, which Ammianus calleth BONONIA, the Frenchmen Bologne, the Low-country men Beunen, and we Bolen, I dare bee bold to aver and maintaine against Hector Boethius, and Turnebus: grounding my assertion both upon the authoritie of Beatus Rhenanus, who saw an ancient military Map, wherein was written Gessoriacum quod nunc Bononia, that is, Gessoriacum, now called Bolen: and also upon Itinerarie computation, or account of the miles, which answereth just to the distance that Antonine the Emperour hath put downe betweene Ambiani and Gessoriacum. But, that which may serve in stead of all proofes.

The rablement of Pyrates serving under Carausius, which the Panegirick Oration, pronounced unto Constantinus the Emperour, reported to have bene inclosed and shut up within the walles of Gessoriacum and there surpris'd: an other Oration unto Constantinus Maximus his sonne, relateth to have bene vanquished at Bononia: so that Bononia, that is, Bolen, and Gessoriacum must needs be one and the selfe same place: and it may seeme, that the more ancient name was vvorne out much about that time. For it is not to be surmised, that so grave authors unto the great Princes erred in the setting downe and naming of this place, the memory thereof being then so fresh, and that victory so glorious. But, what have I to doe with France? Heerby

Fig. 27. in Basil edition and pag. 251.

Verily, I have the more willingly ripped up the memorie of these matters, for that the prowesse and valour of our Ancestours shewed it selfe often in this coast; as who wonne and wrestled both Calais and Bolen from the French. And as for Bolen, they rendred it backe againe at the humble request of the French King after eight yeares, for a summe of money agreed upon. But Callais they held 12. yeares in despight and maugre of the French. Now returne wee to Britaine with full sailes and a favourable tide.

From (Dover, leaving the little Abbey of Bradsole dedicated to S. Radegund, where of Hugh the first Abbat was founder) there runneth for five miles in length a continued cheine of chalky cliffs standing on a row, hanging joyntly one to another, as far as to Folkstone: which was a flourishing place in times past, as may appeare by the pieces of Roman coine and Britaine bricke daily there found: but under what name, it is uncertaine. Probable it is, that it was one of those towres or holds which in the reigne of Theodosius the younger, the Romans placed for to keep off the Saxons, as Gildas saith, At certaine distances along the shore, in the south part of Britaine.

Famous it was and much frequented by the English Saxons, for religions sake, by reason of a Monasterie that Eanwilde daughter to Eadwald King of Kent consecrated thereunto Nunnes: But now it is a small towne, and the greatest part thereof the Sea hath, as it were, parted away. Howbeit, it was the Baronie of the Family de Abrincis, or Aurenches: From whom it came to Sir Hamon Crevequer, and by his daughter to Sir Iohn of Sandwich, whose grand child Julian by his sonne Iohn, brought the same as her dowry to Iohn Segrave.

From thence, as the shore turneth a front South West-ward Sandgate Castle, built by King Henry the Eighth defender the coast, and upon a Castle hill thereby are scene reliques of an ancient Castle. More inward is Saltwood a Castle of the Bishops of Canterbury which William Courtney Archbishop of Canterbury enlarged. And neere unto it is Osten-hanger, where Sir Edward Poinings Baneret a father of many faire bastards, and amongst them of Thomas Lord Poining Lieutenant of Bollen, began to build a stately house but left it unperfected when death had bereft him of his onely lawfull child which he had by his lawfull wife the daughter of Sir I. Scot his neighbour at Scots-Hall: where the family of Scots hath lived in worshipfull estimation a long time, as descended from Pashely, and Sericane by Pimpe. But to returne to the sea-coast: neere to Sandgate, Hith is situated, one of the Cinque ports, whereof it assumed that name, which in the English Saxons tongue signifieth an haven or harbour: although hardly it maintaineth that name now, by reason of sands, and the Sea withdrawing it selfe from it. And yet it is not long since it first made any shew, and that by the decay and fall of Westhith, a neighbour-towne Westward, and which was sometime a Port, untill the Sea in our great grandfathers daies retired from it. So are Sea-townes subject to the uncertaine vicissitude of the Sea.

This Hith, like as West-Hith also, had their beginning from the ruine of Lime standing hard by, which in times past was a most famous Port towne, untill the sands that the Sea casteth up, had choked and stopped the haven. Both, Antonine and the booke of Norries called it PORTVS LEMANIS, Ptolomee Νηλυ which being in Greeke a significative word, the Copiantes, or Copiers out of old bookes, because they would seeme to supply the defect, wrot it Κανος Νηλυ and the Latin Interpreters following them translated it Novus portus, that is, New port, or New haven: whereas, the proper name of the place was Limen or Leman, like as at this time Lime. Heere the Capitaine over a company or band of Turnacenses, kept his station under the Count or Lieutenant of the Saxon shore. And a Port way paved with stone, called Stonystreet, reacheth from hence toward Canterbury, which one would easily judge to have bene a worke of the Romans, like as the Castle adjoyning hard unto it, now named Stusfall, which in the side and descent of a pretty hill, tooke up about tenne acres of ground in compasse: and the reliques of the wall remaine still of British bricke and flint so close laid and couched together with a kind of strong mortar made of lime, sand and pibles, that as yet time hath not given it the check: and now, although it be be not an haven towne, yet it retaineth still no small shew of the ancient dignitie it had: For heere the Warden of the Cinque Ports at a place called Shipway useth to take his solemne oath, when hee first entreth into his office, and heere, upon certaine set daies, the custome was to decide causes betweene the inhabitants of the said Ports.

Some have thought, that in this place a great river discharged it selfe into the sea, for that one or two writers have made mention of the river Leman, and the mouth of Leman, at which the Danes Fleet in the yeare of our salvation 892. arrived. But I suppose they are deceived in the description of the place, both because there is no river heere, but a very small one, which streight waies being of no reckoning at all, vanisheth: as also, for that the Archdeacon of Huntingdon, a compendious author, and of good approved credit writeth, that the said fleet arrived at the Haven Lemn, and saith not a word of the river. Vnlesse a man would thinke, (with whom I dare not accord) that the river Rother, which interminglith it selfe with the Ocean under Rheine, ran downe this way, and changed his course by little and little, when the champion plaine called Rumney Marsh, grew unto the firme land.

For, this Marsh-country, (which from Lime containeth 14. miles in length, and 8. in breadth, and reckoneth two townes, nineteene parishes, and 4200. acres or thereabout, by reason of ranke greene grasse most convenient for the grasing and feeding of beasts), hath bene by little and little laied unto the land by the benefit of the sea. Whereupon I may well and truly terme it the Seas gift, like as Herodotus called Aegypt, the gift of the river Nilus, and a very *learned man termed the pastures of Holland, the gifts of the North-wind and the river Rhene. For, the sea to make amends yielded that againe in this place (which it swallowed up else where in this coast) either by retyring backe, or by laying oze thereto from time to time: as some places which in the remembrance of our grandfathers, lay close unto the sea shore, are now dis-joynd a mile or two from the sea. How fruitful the soile is, what a number of herds of cattell it feedeth, that are sent thither from the furthest parts of Wales, and England to be fatted; what art and cunning is used in making of banks to fence it, against the violent risings of the sea, one would hardly believe, that hath not seen it. And that it might be the better ordered, certaine lawes of Sewers were made in the time of King Henry the third. And King Edward the fourth ordained, that it should be a Corporation, consisting of a Bailive, Jurates, and the Communalty. In the Saxons time the inhabitants thereof were called Wepyc-pape, that is, Marshmen*: and verily the signification of that name accordeth passing well with the nature of the place. Neither can I understand and conceive that ancient writer Aethelward, when he reporteth, That Cinulph King of the Mercians wasted Kent, and the country which is called Merc-warum. And in another place, That Herbyth a Captaine was by the Danes beheaded in a place named Merc-warum, if he meant not this very Marsh-country, Rumney, or Romeney, and in former time Romenal, which some conjecture by the name to have bene the Romans worke, is the principall towne of this Marsh, and one of the Cinque-ports, whereof Old Romeney and Lid are accounted members, which joyously were charged with the setting forth of five ships of warre, in that manner and forme, as I have before said. It is seated upon an hill of gravell and sand, and had on the West side an haven of good receit and commodious withall, for most of the winds; before the sea with-drew it selfe from it. The inhabitants, as we read in King William the Conquerours booke, were in regard of their sea service, quite and quiet from all customs, beside for *robbery, peace-breach and Forisfell. And in those daies it flourished with the best; For it was divided into twelve wards, it had also five Parish-churches, it had a Priorie, and an Hospitall for sicke persons: But in the reigne of Edward the first, when the sea raging with violence of windes overflowed this tract, and made pitifull waste of people, of cattell and of houses in every place, as having quite drowned Promhill a pretty town well frequented: it made the Rother also forsake his old channell, which heere before time emptied himselfe into the sea, and stopped his mouth, opening a new and neerer way for him to passe into the sea by Rhie: So as by little and little hee forsoke this towne. Which ever since hath decreased, and lost much of the forme, frequency, and ancient dignitie.

Beneath this, the land tending more East-ward maketh a Promontory, (we call it the Nesse, as it were a nose) before which lieth a dangerous flat in the sea, and upon which standeth Lid a towne well inhabited: whereunto the inhabitants of Promhill after that inundation aforesaid betooke themselves. And in the very utmost point of this Promontory which the people call Denge-ness, where there is nothing but beach and pible stones, Holme-trees* grow plentifully with their sharp prickly leaves all waies greene, in manner of underwood, for a mile and more. Among the said beach neere unto Ston end is to be seene an heape of greater stones, which the neighbour inhabitants call Saint Cryspins, and Crispinians tombe, whom they report to have bene cast upon this shore by ship-wracke and from hence called into the glorious compagnie of Saints. From thence the shore retyring it selfe is directly carried into the West, bringing forth peafon among the beach, which grow up naturally like clusters of grapes a number together, and in tast little differ from our field peafon, and so runneth on as farre as to the Rother-Mouth, by which for some space Kent is divided from Suffex.

The course of this river on Suffex side wee have in part briefly spoken of before. On Kent side it hath Newenden, which I almost passwade my selfe was that haven so long sought for, and which the booke Notitia Provinciarum called ANDERIDA, the old Britains Caer Andred, and the Saxons Andredscap-tep: first, because the Inhabitants by a continued tradition constantly affirme it was a most ancient towne and Haven whereof they shew the plot; then, for that it is situate by the wood Andredswald, that tooke the name of it; lastly, because the English-Saxons seeme to have termed it Brittenden, that is, The Britans Vale, (as they called also Segontium an ancient towne of the Britans of which we spake before): whence the whole Hundred adjoyning is named Selbrittenden. The Romans for to defend this coast against the Saxon rovers, placed heere the band of the Abulci with their Captaine: Afterward being taken by the English Saxons it decayed quite. For, Hengist being fully determined to rid all the Britans out of Kent, and thinking it would much availe him to encrease his troups and bands with greater forces of his owne nation, called forth Aella out of Germany with a strong power of English Saxons, and while he gave the assault unto this Anderida by violence, the Britans out of the wood hard by, where they laie in ambushments, chased him so, that at length after many losses on both sides given and taken, when he had parted his army and both discomfited and put to flight the Britans in the wood, and also at the same time forced the towne, by assaults; his barbarous heart was so enflamed with desire of revenge, that he put the Inhabitants to the sword and razed the towne even to the ground. The place lying thus desolate, was shewed, (as Henry of Huntingdon saith,) to those that passed by many ages after. Vntill the Friars Carmelites newly come out from Mount Carmell in the Holiland, who sought for such solitary places, built them heere a little Priory in the time of King Edward the first, at the charges of Sir Thomas Albuger Knight: and so streight waies there rose up a village, which in regard of the old towne overthrowen, began to be called Newenden, that is, The New towne in the vale. I saw nothing there now, but a mean village with a poore Church, & a wodden bridge to no great purpose for a ferry is in most use, since that the river Rother, not containing himselfe in his channell hath overlaid, & is like to endanger & surround the levell of rich lands thereby. Whereupon the inhabitants of Rhie complaine, that their haven is not scoured by the streame of Rother as heerebefore, and the owners heere suffer great losse: which their neighbours in Oxeney doe feare, if it were remedied, would fall upon them. This is a river-isse ten miles about, encompassed with the river Rother dividing his streames, and now brackish; having his name either of mire, which our ancestours called Hex, or of Oxen, which it feedeth plentifully with ranke grasse. Opposite to this is Appledore, where a confused rabble of Danish and Norman Pirates, which under the conduct of one Hasting had fore annoied the French coasts, loden with boories landed, landed, and built a Castle: whom notwithstanding King Aelfred by his valour caused to accept conditions of peace.

Vp-land hence, and from Nawenden I saw (which I should have before remembered) Cranbroke and Tenterden good clothing towns, Sissingherst a fairehouse of the familie of Bakers advanced by Sir Iohn Baker not long since Chauncellour of the Exchequer, and his marriage with a daughter and heire of Dingley, Bengebury an habitation of the ancient familie of Colpepper, and neere adjoining Hemsted a manor of the Guildfords, an old familie, but most eminent since S. Iohn Guildford was Comptroller of the houle to king Edward the Fourth. For his sonne and heire S. Richard Guildford was by king Henry the seventh made knight of the Garter. Of his sonnes againe Sir Edward Guildford was Marshall of Calais, Lord Warden of the Cinque Ports, and Master of the Ordinance, father to Iane Durbes of Northumberland, wife to Sir I. Dudley Duke of Northumberland, mother to the late Earles of Warwick, and Leicester, and Sir Henrie was chosen Knight of the Garter by King Henrie the Eighth, and had his Armes enobled with a Canton of Granado by Ferdinand king of Spaine for his worthy service in that Kingdome when it was recovered from the Moors, and Edward lived in great effectme at home. To be brieft from the said Sir Iohn are issued by his males immediatly the Darells of Cale hill, Gages, Brownes of Beechworth, Walsingham, Cromers, Isaacs, and Iseleies, families of prime and principall note in these parts. But now I digresse and therefore crave pardon.

In the parishes heere about the commendable trade of cloathing was first begun, and freshly practised, ever since King Edward the Third his daies, who by proposing rewards, and granting many immunities, trained Flemings into England in the tenth yeere of his reigne to teach our men that skill of Draperie, or weaving and making wollen cloth, which is justly counted at this day one of the Staies that support our common Weale. Thus much of Kent, which (to conclude summarily) had this part last spoken of for Draperie, the Isle of Tenet and the East parts for the Garerie, the Weald for the wood, Rumney Marsh for the meddow-plot, the North down toward the Thames for the Conny-garthe, Tenham and there about for an Orchard, and Head-Corne for the brood and poultrery of fat, big, and commended capons.

As for the Earles; omitting the English Saxons Godwin, and Leofwin his brother, and others, who were Earles not by descent and inheritance, but by office: the halfe brother by the mothers side to King William the Conquerour, and Bishop of Baieux, was the first Earle of Kent, of the Norman bloud: a man, by nature of a bad disposition and busie head, bent alwaies to low sedition and to trouble the State. Whereupon he was committed to prison by a subtil distinction, as Earle of Kent, and not Bishop of Baieux in regard of his holie orders; and afterward for a most dangerous rebellion which he had raised, he was by his nephew King William Rufus deprived of his places of dignity, lost all his goods in England and abjured the Realme. Afterwards, King Stephen who as an Intruder reaped the revenewes and Commodities of the Crowne of England, that hee might bind by benefits martiall men to him, hee advanced William of Ipres a Fleming to that honor: who being, as Fitz-Stephen calleth him; Violentus Cantij incubator, that is, the violent over-pressor of Kent, was forced by King Henrie the second to depart, sheading many teares and so became a monke, Henrie likewise the sonne of King Henrie the second, whom his father had crowned King, rebelling against his father, gave in like respect the title of Kent unto Philip Earle of Flanders. But this Philip was Earle of Kent in title only and by promise. For, as Gervase of Canterbury writeth, Philip Earle of Flanders undertooke to the uttermost of his power for to aide the young King, doing him homage and binding himselfe with an oath unto whom the said King promised in reward of his service the revenewes of a thousand pounds, together with all Kent: also the Castle of Rochester and the Castle of Dover. Not many yeeres after, Hubert de Burgh, having done notable good service unto the State, received as it were, by due desert the same honor at the hands of King Henrie the Third: who also made him chiefe Iustice of England. This Hubert was a man who unfainctly loved his Countrey, & amidst the stormes of crowning ning Fortune performed all duties to the utmost that his Countrey could require of a right good patriot. Yet at length he fell in disgrace, and was dispoyle of his dignities: whereby this title slept and lay as dead untill the time of King Edward the Second. Who bestowed it upon his younger brother Edmund of Woodstocke, who being Tutor of his nephew Edward the Third, falling into the tempest of false, injurious, and malignant envie was beheaded, for that he never dissembled his naturall brotherly affection toward his brother deposed, and went about when hee was (God wot) murdered before (not knowing so much) to enlarge him out of prison; perswaded thereunto by such as covertly practised his destruction. Hee had two sonnes Edmund, and Iohn, who were restored by Parliament to bloud and land shortly after. And with all, it was enacted that no Peere of the land, or other that procured the death of the said Earle should bee impeached therefore, than Mortimer Earle of March, Sir Simon Beresford, Iohn Matravers, Baions, and Iohn Devorail. So these his two sonnes succeeded in order, and when they were both dead without issue, their sister Joane, who survived them, (for her lovely beaurie called The Faire maid of Kent) brought this honour unto the house of the Hollands. For Sir Thomas Holland her husband was stiled Earle of Kent, and thence after married by dispensation to the Black Prince heire to him King Richard the Second. Her sonne Sir Thomas Holland succeeded in that honourable title, who died in the twentieth yeere of King Richard the Second. Him againe there succeeded his two sonnes Thomas and Edmund. Thomas who also was created Duke of Surry, and forthwith for plotting a conspiracie against King Henry the Fourth lost his head, leaving no child: Edmunds his brother being Lord High Admirall of England, was wounded at the assault of Saint Brieux in little Britan, and died thereof in the yeare of Salvation 1408. leaving likewise no issue. Now when this dignitie was expired, in this family of the Hollands, their glasse being runne out, and the Patrimony parted among Edmunds sisters; King Edward the Fourth honoured with the title of the Earldome of Kent, first Sir William Nevill Lord Fauconberg: and after his death, Edmund Lord Grey of Ruthin, Hastings and Weisford, and who had to succeed him George his sonne. Hee of Anne Wideville his first wife begat Richard Earle of Kent, who having wasted his inheritance ended therewith his daies issuelesse, 1523. But the said George by his second wife Katherine, daughter to William Herbert Earle of Pembrooke, was father of Sir Henry Grey of Wrex knight, whose grand-sonne Reginald, by his sonne Henrie, Queene Elizabeth in the yeare 1571. advanced to the Earldome of Kent. And after his decease without issue, his brother Henrie succeeded, a right honourable personage and endued with the ornaments of true nobility.

DOBVNI.

DOBVNI.

Hitherto we have walked over all those Countries that lie betweene the British Ocean of the one side, and the Severne sea and river Thames on the other. Now according to the order which wee have begun, let us survey the rest throughout: and passing over the said river returne to the head of Thames and the salt water of Severne; and there view the DOBVNI, who in ancient times inhabited those parts which now are termed Oxford-shire and Gloucester-shire. This their name, I verily suppose came of Duffin a British word, because the places where they planted themselves, were in the most part low and lying under the hills, whereupon the name became common to them all: and verily from such a kind of site, Bathicia in Troy, Catabathmos in Africk, and Deep-Dale in Britan tooke their names. I am the more easily induced to believe this because I see, that Dio in the very same signification hath named certaine people, BODVNNI if the letters be not misplaced. For, Bodo or BODVN, (as Plinie saith) in the ancient French tongue, (which I have proved before was the same that is the British language,) betokeneth Deepe. Hence was it, that the City Bodincomagus, as he writeth, became so called, for that it stood where the river * Po was deepest hence had the people Bodiontij that name, who inhabited a deepe vale by the Lake of Lozanne, and Geneva, now called Val de Fontenay, to say nothing of Bodotria the deepest Frith in all Britan. Concerning these Bodunj, I have found in all my reading no matter of great antiquity, save only that A. Plautius sent as Proprator by Claudius into Britan, received part of them upon their submission to his protection, to wit, those that were under Cattuellani, (for they held the region bordering upon them) and as Dio hath recorded, about the forty and foure yeare after Christ was borne, placed a garrison over them.

But when the English Saxons reigned in Britan, and the name of Dobuni was worne out, some of these, as also the people dwelling round about them,

Duffin in the British tongue signifieth low, deepe, or flat.

Bodo what it signifieth in British and French.

them, were by a new English Saxons name called Wiccij: but whereupon, I dare scarce venture to guesse, without craving leave of the Reader. Yet, if Wic in the Saxons tongue soundeth as much as the * creeke, or reach of a river, and the Viguones, a nation in Germanie are so called, because they dwell neere unto the creekes or baies of the Sea, and of rivers, (for so doth Beatus Rhenanus constantly affirme) It will bee no absurditie, if I derive our Wiccii from thence, who inhabited round about the mouth of Severne, which is very full of such Coves and small creekes and reaches.

GLO-

GLOCESTER-SHIRE.

Locester-shire, in the Saxon tongue Gleaucester-ſchyre, which was the chiefe ſeat of the Dobuni; on the Weſt ſide butteth upon Monmouth-shire and Hereford-shire, on the North upon Worceſter-shire, on the Eaſt upon Warwick-shire, Oxford-shire and Barck-shire, on the South upon Wilt-shire and Somerſet-shire both. A pleaſant countrey and a fruitfull, ſtretching out in length, from North-eaſt unto South-weſt. The part that lyeth more Eaſt-ward, riſing up in height with hills and wolds is called Corteswold: the middle part ſettleth downe low to a moſt fertile plaine, and is watered with Severne that noble river, which doth infuſe life, as it were, into the ſoile. That part which bendeth more Weſtward on the further ſide of Severne, is all over be ſpread with woods. But what meane I to buſie my ſelfe herein? William of Malmesbury will eaſe mee of this labour, who fully gives high commendations to this countrey. Have therefore what he writeth in his booke of Biſhop; The countrey (ſaith he) *is called of the principall Citie: The vale of Gloceſter. the ground throughout yieldeth plentie of corne, and bringeth forth abundance of fruits: the one through the naturall goodneſſe onely of the ground, the other through diligent manuring and tillage; in ſo much, as it would provoke the lazieſt body that is, to take paines, ſeeing that it answereth backe againe with the encrease of an hundred fold, that which is ſowne. Here may you ſee the high wayes and common lanes clad with apple-trees and pearre-trees, not ſet nor graſſed by the induſtry of mans hand, but growing naturally of their owne accord. The ground of it ſelfe is enclined to beare fruits, and thoſe both in taſte and beautie farre exceeding others: whereof ſome will laſt a whole yeare and not wither and rivell: ſo that they are ſerviceable untill new come againe for ſupply. There is no countrey in all England ſo thicke ſet as this Province with Vine-yards, ſo plentifull in encrease, and ſo pleaſant in taſte. The very wines thereof made, affect not their mouthes that drinke of them with any unpleaſing tartneſſe, as being little inferiour in ſweetneſſe and odour to the French wines. The houſes in it are almoſt innumerable, the Churches paſſing faire, and the townes ſtanding very thicke. But that which addeth unto all theſe good gifts a ſpeciall glory is the river Severne, than which there is not any one in this land, for channell broader, for ſtreame ſwifter, for fiſh better ſtored. There is in it a daily rage and fury of the waters, which I know not whether I may call a gulfe or whirle poole of waves, and the ſame raiſing up the ſands from the bothome winding and driving the ſame upon heapes, commeth with a forcible violence, and reacheth no further then to the bridge. Sometimes alſo it overfloweth the bankes, and when it hath roved about a great way, it retireth backe as a conquerour of the land. Unhappy is that veſſell which it taketh full upon the ſide. The Water-men well ware hereof when they ſee that Higra comming, (for ſo they call it in Engliſh), turne the veſſell affront upon it, and ſo cutting through the middeſt of it, checke and avoide the violence thereof.*

Higra.

But that which hee ſaith of the hundred fold increaſe and yeeld of the ground, doth not hold true. Neither for all that, would I thinke with theſe whining and ſlothfull husbandmen, whom Columella taketh up for it, that the ſoile is now wearied and become barren with too much fruitfullneſſe and over-free bearing in former ages. Howbeit hereby, if I ſhould ſay nothing of other things; it is to bee ſeene, that wee have no cauſe to wonder, why many places in this countrey and elſe-where in England are called Vine-yards, ſeeing it hath afforded wine; and ſurely it may ſeeme to proceed rather of the Inhabitants idleneſſe than any diſtemperature and indiſpoſition of the ayre; that it yeeldeth none at this day. But why in some places within this Countrey, as wee read in our Statutes, by a private custome which now is become of strong validitie as a law, the goods and lands of condemned persons fall into the Kings hands for a year onely and a day, and after that terme expired (contrary to the custome of all England beside) returne to the next heires, let law-students and State-men looke to that: for no part it is of my purpose to search thereinto. Now I will take a superfluous survey (such as I can) of those three parts whereof I spake orderly one after another.

The part, that lyeth more West beyond Severne, (which the Silures in old time possessed) along the river Vaga or Wye, that parteth England and Wales, was wholly bespiced with thicke tall woods: we call it at this day, Deane Forrest: The Latine writes some name it of the Danes Danica Sylva the Danes wood, others with Girald, the Wood of Danubia. But I would thinke, if it had not this name of Deane a little towne adjoining, that by short cutting the word, it was called Deane, for Arden. Which terme both Gauls and Britans in ancient times may seeme to have used for a wood, considering that two mighty great woods, the one in that part of Gaulle called Gallia Belgica, and the other among us in Warwick-shire, are by one and the selfe same name termed Arden. For, this was a wonderfull thicke Forrest, and in former ages so darke and terrible, by reason of crooked and winding wayes, as also the grisly thick therein, that it made the inhabitants more fierce, and bolder to commit robberies. For in the reigne of Henry the first they so infested all Severne side with robbing and spoiling, that there were lawes made by authority of the Parliament, for to restrain them. But since that rich Mines of Iron were heere found out, those thicke woods began to wax thin by little and little. In this Forrest, upon the foresaid river stood Tudenham and Wollaston, two townes of good antiquity, which Walter and Roger his brethren of Gislebert Lord of Clare wrested out of the Welsh-men hands, about the year 1160. As also Lidney is adjoining to them, where Sir William Winter, Vicemirall of England, a renowned Knight for Sea-services (as his brother Arthur slaine in Orkeney-Isles) built a faire house. But the most ancient towne of all others is ABONE or AVONE, mentioned by Antonine the Emperour in his Tourney-booke, which having not lost that name altogether, is at this day called Aventon: a small towne indeed, but standing upon Severne, just nine miles, as hee writeth, from VENTASILVRVM, or Caerwent.

And seeing that Avon in the Brittainish tongue importeth A River, it shall be a strange thing, if we thinke it so called of the river: for in the very same signification, (that I may omit the rest) we have Waterton, Bourne, and Riverton: as the Latins had Aquinum and Fluentium. And I suppose the rather, that it tooke name of the river, because people were wont at this place to ferry over the river, whereupon the towne standing over against it, is by Antonine called TRAIECTVS, that is, a passage or ferry: but without doubt, the number in that place set downe, is corrupted. For he maketh it nine miles betwene TRAIECTVS and ABONE, whereas the river is scarce three miles broad. It may seeme then to have bene utterly decayed, or turned rather into a village, either when as passengers began to ferry over below, or when Athelstane thrust out the Welsh Britans from hence. For, hee was the first that drove them, as William of Malmesbury witnesseth, beyond the river Wye. And when as before his time, Severne was the bound, betwene the English and Welshmen, hee appointed Wye to be the limit confining them both: Whence our Nicholas writeth thus.

Inde vagos vaga Cambrenses, hinc respicit Anglos.

To Wales on this side, looketh Wic,

On that againe, our England he doth eye.

Not farre from Wye amongst blind by-wayes beset with thicke plumps of trees, appeareth Breulis Castle more than halfe fallen downe, remarkable for the death of Mahel youngest sonne of Miles, Earle of Hereford. For there, his greedy deviles, bloody crueltie, and covetousnesse ready to pray upon other mens estates (for which vices he is much blamed in Writers) were overtaken with a just revenge from heaven. For, as Girald hath written, being entertained guest-wife by Sir Walter Clifford in this Castle, when the house was all on a light fire, hee was killed with a stone that from the top of an high Turret fell upon his head and brained him.

Neither have I any thing else to be recounted in this wood-countrey beside Newnham a pretty mercate, and Westbury thereby a seate of the Bainhams of ancient descent: But that Herbert who had wedded the sister of the said Mahel Earle of Hereford, in her right was called Lord of Deane fro whom that Noble house of the Herberts fetcheth their pedigree, out of which family came the Lords of Blanlevney, and of late daies, the Herberts Earles of Huntingdon and Pembroch, with others. From hence also, if wee may believe David Powell in his historie of Wales, was descended Antonie Fitz-Herbert, whole great learning and industrie in the wisdom of our law, both the judiciall Court of Flees, wherein he sate Iustice a long time, and also those exact bookes of our common law by him exquisitely penned and published, doe sufficiently witness. But other have drawne his descent and that more truly, if I have insight therein, from the race of the Fitz-Herberts Knights in Derby shire.

The river Severne, called by the Britains HAFREN, after it hath run a long course with a channell somewhat narrow, no sooner entereth into this shire, but entertaineth the river Avon, and another brooke coming from the East. Betwixt which, is seated Tewkesbury, in the Saxon tongue Theocsbury, by others Theoci Curia, taking the name from one Theocus who there did lead an Eremites life. It is a great and faire towne, having three bridges to passe over, standing upon three rivers, famous for making of Wollen cloth, and the best mustard; which for the quicke heate that it hath, biterh most and piercerh deepest: but most famous in times past by reason of an ancient Monastery which Dodo a man of great power in Mercia founded in the year 715, where beforetime he kept his royall court, as is testified by this inscription which there remained long after.

And Odo his brother endowed the same, which being by continuance of time, and the fury of enemies ruinated, Robert Fitz-Haimon the Norman, Lord of Corbeile and Thorigny in Normandie reedified, translating monks from Cranborn in Dorsetshire hither upon a devout mind verily and a religious, that he might make some amends to the Church, for the losse that the Church of Baiuex in Normandie had sustained: which K. Henry the first for to free him from his enemies had set on fire and burned, and afterwards repenting that which he had done, built againe. It cannot, (writeth William of Malmesbury) be easily reported, how highly Robert Fitz-hamon exalted this Monastery, wherein the beauty of the buildings ravished the eyes, and the charity of the Monks allured the hearts of such folke as used to come thither, Within this both himselfe and his successors Earles of Glocester were buried: who had a Castle of their owne called Holmes hard by, which now is almost vanished out of sight. Neither is this towne lesse memorable for that battell, whereby the house of Lancaster received a mortal wound: as wherein very many of their side in the yeere, 1471. were slaine, more taken prisoners and divers beheaded, their power so weakened and their hopes abated, especially because young Prince Edward the only sonne of King Henry the sixth, a very child, was there put to death, and in most shamefull and villanous manner his braines dashed out, as that never after they came unto the field against King Edward the fourth. In which respect, John Leland wrote of this towne in this wise:

*Ampla foro, & partis spoliis praelara, Theoci
Curia, sabrina quae se commisit Avona*

Falget;

*Fulget; nobilium sacrisque recondit in antris
Mulorum cineres, quondam inclusa corpora bello.*

Where Av'n and Severn meete in one, there stands a goodly towne.
For mercat great and pillage rich there wonne, of much renowne, Hight Tewkesburie: where noble men entombed many are,

Now gone to mould, who sometimes were redoubred Knights in warre.

From thence we come to Deorhirst, which Bede speaketh of, scituate somewhe low upon the bank of Severn, wherby it hath great losses many times, when he overfloweth his bounds. It had in it sometimes a little Monasterie, which being by the Danes overthrowne flourished againe at length under Edward the Confessor; who, as we read in his Testament, assigned The religious place at Deorhirst and the government thereof to Saint Denis neere unto Paris. Yet, a little while after, as William of Malmesbury saith, It was but a vaine and void representation of antiquitie. Over against it lieth a place halfe encompassed in with Severne, called in the Saxon tongue Olenas, and Alney, now the Eight, that is, The Island: Famous, by the reason of this occurrence, when both the Englishmen and the Danes were much weakened with continuall encounters, to make a small dispatch at once of all quarrels, the Fortune and destinie of both nations was committed to Edmund King of the English, and to Canutus King of the Danes, who in this Island by a single combat tried it out, unto whether of them the right of this Realme should belong. But after they had fought and given over one even hand, a peace was concluded, and the kingdome divided betwene them. But when streight upon it Edmund was dispatched out of the way not without suspicion of poison, Canutus seized into his owne hands all England.

From Deorhirst Severne runneth downe by Haesfield which King Henry the Third gaveto Rich. Paunceforte, whose successours built a faire house heere, and whose predecessors were possessed of faire lands in this Countrey before, and in the Conquerours time in Wiltshire making many reaches winding in and out, and forthwith dividing himselfe to make a river Island most rich and beautifull in greene meddowes, he passeth along by the head Citie of this Shire, which Antonine the Emperour called CLBVVM and GLEVVVM, the Britans terme Caer Glevie, the English Saxons Gleaucester, the Vulgar sort of Latinists Glovernia, others Claudiocopia, of the Emperour Claudius, as they imagine: who forsooth, should give it this name, when hee had bestowed heere his daughter Genissa in marriage upon Arviragus the Britan. Touching whom, Iuvenall writeth thus,

Excidet Arviragus.*

Some King (sure) thou shalt prisoner take in chafe or battaile heat,
Or else Arviragus shall loose his British royall seare.

As though hee had begat any other daughters of his three wives besides Claudia, Antonia and Othavia; or as if Arviragus had bene knowne in that age, whose name was never heard of before Domitians time and scarce then. But, let them goe, that seeke to build antiquitie upon a frame grounded on lies: Rather yet would I give my voice and accord with Ninnius, who writeth, That it took the name from Glevum, the great grandfathers father of King Vortigern; but that long before it, Antonine had named it Glevum (which, both the Distance from Corinium and the name also may prove.) But as the Saxon name Gleaucester came from Glevum, so Glevum proportionably from the British, Caer Glow which I suppose sprong from the word Glow, that in the British tongue signifieth Faire and Goodly: so that Caer Glow may be as much as to say, a faire Citie: In which signification also, the Greekes had their Callidromos, Callistratia: the English men their Brighstow, and Shirley, and in this very Countie Faireford, Faire-ley &c.

This Citie was built by the Romans, and set, as it were upon the necke of the Silures to yooke them. And there also was a Colonie plantred to people it, which they called COLONIA GLEVVVM. For I have seene a fragment of antique stone in the walles of Bath neere unto the North-gate, with this Inscription.

*DEC COLONIAE GLEV
VIXIT ANN. LXXXVI.

* Decurio.

It lieth stretched out in length over Severne: on that side where it is not watered with the river, it hath in some places a very strong wall for defence. A proper and fine Citie I assure you it is, both for number of Churches and for the buildings. On the South part there was a lofty Castle of square Ashler stone which, now for the most part, is nothing but a ruine. It was built in King William the first his time, and sixtene houses there about, as wee read in the booke of Englands Survey, were plucked downe for the rearing of this Castle. About which, Roger the sonne of Miles, Constable of Gloucester went to law with King Henry the second: and his brother Walter lost all the right and interest hee had in this City and Castle, as Robert de Mont hath written. Ceanlin King of the West Saxons, was the first, that about the yeare of our redemption 570. by force and armes wrested Gloucester out of the Britans hands. After this, the Mercians won it, under whom it flourished in great honour, and Offricke King of Northumberland by permission of Etheldred the Mercian, founded there a very great and stately Monastery for Nunnes, over whom Kineburg, Eadburg and Eve Queenes of the Mercians were *Prioresse*s successively one after another. Edelfst also that most noble Ladie of the Mercians, adorned this City with a Church, wherein shee her selfe was buried, and not long after, when the Danes had spoyled and wasted the whole countrey, those sacred Virgins were throwne out, and The Danes (as Aethelward that ancient authour writeth) with many a stroake pitched poore cottages into the citie of Gleu-cester. At which time, when those more ancient Churches were subverted, Aldred Archbishop of Yorke, and Bishop of Worcester erected another for Monkes which is now the chiefe Church in the Citie, and hath a Deane and sixe Prebendaries. But the same in these late precedent ages was newly beautified. For, John Hanley and Thomas Farley two Abbats added unto it the Chappel of the blessed Virgin Mary: N. Morwent raised from the very foundation the forefront, which is an excellent piece of worke: G. Horton an Abbat, adjoynd to it the crosse North-part; Abbat Trowcester a most daintie and fine Cloister, and Abbat Sebrok an exceeding high faire Reecple. As for the South side, it was also repaired with the peoples offerings at the Sepulcher of the unhappy King Edward the second, who lieth heere entered under a monument of Alabaster: and not farre from him another Prince as unfortunate as hee, Robert Curt-hose, the eldest sonne of King William the Conquerour Duke of Normandy within a wooden painted tombe in the midst of the quire, who was bereft of the Kingdome of England for that he was borne before his father was King, deprived of his two sonnes the one by strange death in the New-forrest, the other dispoiled of the Earledome of Flanders his inheritance, and slaine; he himselfe dispoiled of the Dukedome of Normandy by his brother King Henry the first, his cies plucked out, and kept close prisoner 26. yeares with all contumelious indignities untill through extreame anguish hee ended his life. Above the quire, in an arch of this church, there is a wall built in forme of a femicircle full of corners, with such an artificiall device, that if a man speake with never so low a voice at the one part thereof, and another lay his eare to the other being a good way distant, he may most easily heare every fillable. In the reigne of William the Conquerour and before, it may seeme that the chiefe trade of the Citizens was to make Iron. For as we find in the * Survey booke of England, the King demanded in manner no other tribute than certaine Icres of Iron, and Iron barres, for the use of the Kings Navy, and some few * quarts of hony. After the comming in of the Normans, it suffered divers calamities: by the hands of Edvard, King Henry the third his sonne; whiles England was all on a smoake and combustion by the Barons warre, it was spoiled;

led; and afterward by casualty of fire almost wholly consumed to ashes; but now cherished with continuance of long peace it flourisheth againe as fresh as ever it was, and by laying unto it two Hundreds, it is made a County, and called the County of Glocester. Also within the memory of our fathers, King Henry the Eighth augmented the state thereof with an Episcopall See, with which dignitie in old time it had bene highly endowed, as Geffery of Monmouth avoucheth, and I will not derogate ought from the credit of his assertion, considering that among the Prelates of Brittain the Bishop Cluvienfis is reckoned, which name derived from Clevum or Glow, doth rather a fort confirme and strengthen my coniecture, that this is that Glevum, whence Antonine maketh mention.

Severne, having now left Glocester behind it, and gathered his waters unto one streame againe, windeth it selfe by Elmore a Mansion house of the Gists, ancient by their owne lineall descent, being in elder times owners of Apsely-Gife neere Brighthill: and from the Beauchamps of Holt, who acknowledge Huber de Burgo Earle of Kent (whom I lately mentioned) beneficiall to them; and restifie the same by their Armories. Lower upon the same side Stroud a pretty river slideth into Severne our of Coteswold by Stroud a Mercat towne sometimes better peopled with Clothiers, and not farre from Minching-Hampton which anciently had a Nunnery, or belonged to Nunnnes whom our ancestors named Minchings.

Now Severn waxing broader and deeper by reason of the alternative flowing and ebbing of the sea, riseth and swelleth in manner of a rough and troublous sea indeed, and so with many windings and turnings in, and out, speedeth him unto the Ocean. But nothing offereth it selfe unto his sight, (to count of) as hee passeth along, but Cam-bridge a little country towne: where it receiveth Cam a small rivelet: Over the bridge whereof, when the Danes with rich spoiles passed (as Aethelward writeth) * a battail-ray, the West-Saxons and the Mercians received them with an hote battaile in Winesfield, where three of their Pettie Kings were slaine, namely, Heastden, Cimril and Inguar.

On the same shore nor much beneath, standeth Barkley, in the Saxon-tongue Bæopkenlau, of great name for a most strong Castle, a Major, who is the Head Magistrate, and especially for the Lords thereof descended from Robert-Fitz-Harding to whom King Henry the second gave this place, and Barkely Hearnes. Out of this house are branched many Knights and Gentlemen of signall note, and in the reigne of King Henry the seventh flourished William Lord Barkely, who was honoured by King Edward the fourth with the stile of Viscount Barkely, by King Richard the third with the honour of Earle of Nottingham (in regard of his mother daughter of Thomas Mowbray Duke of Norfolke, and Earle of Nottingham) and by King Henry the Seventh with the office of Marshall of England, and dignity of Marquis Barkely. But for that he died issuelesse, these his titles died together with him. If you be willing to know by what a crafty fetch Goodwin Earle of Kent, a man most deeply pregnant in devising how to do injury, got the possession of this place, you may read these few lines out of Wid. Map. us, who flourished 400. yeares ago: and worth the reading, (believe me) they are. Barkley neere unto Severn is a towne of 500. pounds revenue. In it there was a Nunnery, and the Abbess over these Nunnnes was a Noble woman and a beautifull. Earle Goodwin by cunning and subtilt wile, desiring not her selfe, but hers, as he passed that way, left with a Nephew of his, a very proper and beautifull young Gentleman (pretending that hee was sickly) untill he returned backe. Him he had given this lesson, that hee should keepe his bed and in no wise seeme to be recovered untill he had got both her and as many of the Nunnnes as hee could wish child as they came to visite him. * And to the end that the young man might obtaine their favour and his owne full purpose, when they visited him: the Earle gave him pretty rings and fine girdles to bestow for favours upon them, and thereby to deceive them. Hee therefore being willing entred into this course of libidinous pleasure (for that the way downe to hell is easie) was soon taught his lessons, and wisely playeth the fool in that, which seemed wise in his own conceit. With him they were restant all those things that the foolish virgins could wish for, beauty, daintie delicacies, riches, faire speech; and careful he was now to singe them alone. The Devil therefore thrust out Pallas, brought in Venus, and made the Church of our Saviour and his Saints, an accursed Temple of all Idols; and the Shrine, a very steeple, and so of pure Lambes, hee made them foule shee-wolves, and of pure virgins, filthy harlots. Now when many of their bellies bare out big and round, this youth long by this time over wearied with conquest of pleasure, getteth him gone, and forthwith bringeth home againe unto his Lord and Master, a victorious Ensigne, worthy to have the reward of iniquitie: and to speake plaine, relateth what was done. No sooner heard he this, but he bieth him to the King: enformeth him how the Lady Abbess of Barkely and her Nuns were great with child, and commonly prostitute to every one that would: sendeth speciall messengers of purpose for enquirie heereof, proveth all that he had said. Hee beggeth Berkley of the King his Lord after the Nuns were thrust out, and obtained it at his hands: and he left it to his wife Gueda: but because she her selfe (so faith Doomes-day booke;) would eat nothing that came out of this Manour, for that the Nunnery was destroyed, he purchased for her Vacester, that thereof she might live, so long as she made her abode at Barkley.

Thus wee see, a good and honest mind abhorreth whatsoever is evill gotten. How King Edward the second being deposed from his Kingdome through the crafty plotting and practise of his wife, was made away in the Castle heere, by the wicked subtiltie of Adam Bishop of Hereford, who wrote unto his keepers these few words without points betweene them: Edwardum occidere nolite timere bonum est: C that by reason of their diverse sense and construction, both they might commit the murder, and he also cleanly excuse himselfe, I had rather you should seeke in Historians, than looke for at my hands.

Beneath this Barkley, the little river Avon closely entereth into the Sea, at the head whereof scarce eight miles from the waterside, upon the hils neere Alderley a small towne, there are found certaine stones resembling Coccles or Periwinkles and Oysters: which, whether they have bene sometimes living creatures, or the gamefom sports of Nature, I leave it to Philosophers (that hunt after natures works.) But Fracastorius the principall Philosopher in this our age; maketh no doubt, but that they were living creatures engendred in the Sea, and by waters brought to the D mountaines. For, he affirmeth, that mountaines were cast up by the Sea, with the driving at first of sand into heapes and hillocks: also that the sea flowed there where now hilles doe rise aloft: and that as the said Sea retired the hilles also were discovered. But this is out of my race.

TRAJECTVS, that is, The ferry, whereof Antonine the Emperour maketh mention over against Alone, where they were wont to passe over Severne salt water by boare, was in times past as I guesse by the name, at Oldbury, which is by interpretation, The Old Burgh: like as we doe ferry, in these daies at Aust, a little towne somewhat lower. This in ancient times was called Aust clive: for, a great craggy cliffe it is indeed, mounting up a great height. And verily, memorable is the thing which E that Mapas whom I spake of writeth to have bene done in this place. Edward the elder, saith he, Lay at Austclive, and Leolin Prince of Wales at Bethesley: now when Leolin would not come downe to parley, nor crosse Severn, Edward passeth over to Leolin; whom when Leolin saw and knew who he was, hee cast off his rich robe (for hee had prepared himselfe to sit in judgement) entred the water breast-high, and clasping the boat with an embrace, said, Most wise and sage King, thy humility hath overcome my insolency, and thy wisdom triumphed over my folly: Come, get upon my necke which I have (foole as I am) lifted up against thee, and so shalt thou enter into that land, which thy benigne mildnesse hath made thine owne this day: and after he had taken him upon his shoulders, hee would needs have him sit upon his roabe aforesaid, and so putting his owne hands joyntly into his, did him homage. Upon the same shore also is situate Thornebury, where are to be scene the F foundations brought up above ground of a sumptuous and stately house which Edward the last Duke of Buckingham, was in hand to build, in the yeare of our Lord, (as the engraving doth purport) 1511. when he had taken downe an ancient house which Hugh Audley E. of Glocester had formerly built seven miles from hence, Avon sheading it selfe into Severn running crosse before it, maketh a division betwene Glocestershire

Here, and Sommerſſhire, and not farre from the banke thereof, Pucle-Church reth, being in times paſt a towne or Manour of the Kings called Pucle-Kerkes, Edmund King of England, whiles he interpoſed himſelfe betweene his Sewer, Leove a moſt vilanous wretch, for to part and end certaine quarrels betwene him was thruſt through the body, and ſo loſt his life.

Nere bordering upon this place are two towneſ, Winterburne, which had for Lords the Bradſtons, amongſt whom S. Thomas was ſummoned amongſt the Lords in the time of King Edward the Third. From whom the Vicounts Montacute, the Barons of Wenworth, &c. fetch their deſcent: Acton, which gave name to the houſe of the Actons, Knights: whoſe heire, being married unto Nicolas Points Knight in K. Edward the ſecond his daies, left the ſame to their off-ſpring: Derham a little towne, in the Saxons tongue Deopham, where Ceaulin the Saxon ſlew three Princes or Lords of the Britans, Commeil, Condidan and Fariemeiel, with others, whom he himſelfe put to the ſword and diſpoſſeſſed the Britans of that cuntry for ever.

There remaine yet in that place huge rampiers and trenches as fortifications of their campes, and other moſt apparent monuments here and there of ſo great a war. This was the chiefe ſeat of the Barony of * James de novo Mercatu, who begat daughters, wedded to Nicholas de Moelis, John de Boteraux, and Ralph Ruſſell: one of whoſe poſterity, enriched by matching with the heire of the ancient family of Gorges, aſſumed unto them the name of Gorges. But from Ralph Ruſſell the heire this Douglis ham deſcended to the family of Venis. Above theſe is Sodbury knowne by the ſurname of Walſh, and neighbours thereunto are Wike-ware the ancient ſeat of the family De-la-ware, Wotton under Edge, which yet remembreth the ſlaughter of Sir Thomas Talbot Vicount Liſle heere ſlaine in the time of King Edward the Fourth in an encounter with the Lord Barkley, about poſſeſſions, ſince which time have continued betwene their poſterity untill now, lately they were finally compounded. Northward I had fight of Durſley reputed the ancienteſt habitation of the Barkleys, hereupon ſlaid Barkley of Durſley, who built here a Caſtle now more than ruins, and were accounted founders of the Abbey of Kingswood thereby for Ciſtercian Monkes, derived from Timern whom Maud the Empreſſe greatly enriched. The males of this houſe failed in the time of King Richard the Second, and the heire garrall was married to Canſelow. Within one mile of this, where the river Cam lately ſpoken of, ſpringeth, is Vleigh, a ſeat alſo of the Barkleys deſcended from the Barons Barkley, ſlaid of Vleigh, and Stoke Giffard, who were found coheires to I. Baron Bouchart, deſcended from the Baron Zouch of Richards Caſtles, alias Mortimer, and the Somerſet Lords of Ducley, Beverſton Caſtle not farre of Eaſtward appertained alſo to the name of Barkleys, but in former times to the Gournois, and Ab-Adam a Baron in the time of King Edward the Firſt.

Hitherto have we curſorily paſſed over the principall places in this Shire ſituate beyond and upon Severn, and not far from his banke: Now proceede we forward to the Eaſt part, which I ſaid riſeth up with hilles, to wit, Cotteswold, which of wolds, and Cotes, that is, hils and Sheepſolds tooke that name. For, mountaines and hils without woods, the Engliſhmen in old time termed Wolds: whence it is that an old Gloſſary interpreteth Alpes Italie, The Wolds of Italie. In theſe Wolds there feed in great numbers, flockes of ſheepe, long necked and ſquare of bulke and bone, by reaſon (as is commonly thought) of the weally and hilly ſituation of their paſturage: which wool being moſt fine and ſoft is had in paſſing great account among all nations. Under the ſide of theſe hils, and among them are to be ſcene, as it were, in a row neighbouring together, theſe places following, of more antiquity than the reſt, beginning at the North-eaſt end of them.

Campden, commonly Camden, a mercat towne well peopled and of good reſort, where, as John Caſtoreus writeth, all the Kings of Saxon blood aſſembled in the year of Salvation 689. and conſulted in common about making war upon the Britans. In William the Conquerours time this Weſton and Biſſelay were in the poſſeſſion of Harold Earle of Cheſter, and from his poſterity came at laſt by Nicolaus de Albiniaco an inheritor rice to the ancient Earles of Arundel unto Roger de Somery. Neere unto it ſtandeth the ſaid Weſton, a place now to bee remembered in regard of a faire houſe, which maketh a goodly ſhew a faire off, built by Ralph Sheldon for him and his Poſterity.

Hales in late time a moſt flouriſhing Abbay built by Richard Earle of Cornwall, and King of Romanes, who was there buried with his Wife Sanchia daughter to the Earle of Province: and deſerving commendation for breeding up of Alexander of Hales a great Clerke and ſo deeply learned above all others in that ſubtile and deepe Divinity of the Schoole men, as he carried away the ſurname of Doctor Irrefragabilis, that is, the Doctor ungainſaid, as he that could not be gainſaid.

Sudley, in times paſt Sudlength, a very faire Caſtle, the ſeat not long ſince of Sir Thomas Scimor Baron Scimor of Sudley, and Admirall of England, attained in the time of King Edward the Sixth, and afterward of Sir John Bruges whom Queene Mary created Baron Chandos of Sudley, becauſe he derived his pedigree from the ancient family of Chandos, out of which there flouriſhed in the raigne of Edward the third Sir John Chandos a famous Baneret Vicount of Saint Savours, L. of Caumont, and Kerison in France, a martiall man, and for military Proweſſe every way moſt renowned. But in old time certaine Noblemen here dwelt, and of it had their addiſion de Sudley, deſcended of anigh ancient Engliſh Race, to wit from Gorda K. Athelreds daughter, whoſe ſon Ralph Medantinus Earle of Hereford begat Harold L. of Sudley, whoſe progeny flouriſhed here a long time, untill for default of iſſue male, the daughter and heire matched in marriage with Sir William Butler of the family of Wem, and brought him a ſonne named Thomas, and he begat Ralph, Lord Treaſurer of England, created by King Henry the Sixth Baron of Sudley, with a fee of 200. markes yearely, who repaired this caſtle and enlarged it with new buildings. His ſilters and coheires were married unto the houſes of Norbury and Belknap, and by their poſterity the poſſeſſions in ſhort time were divided into ſundry Families. Toddington alſo is next adjoining hereunto, where the Tracies Gentlemen of a right worſhipfull and ancient houſe flouriſhed a long time, who long ſince found the Barons of Sudley very bounteous unto them. But how in the firſt variance about Religion, William Tracy Lord of this place was proceeded againſt and puniſhed after his death by digging up his corps and burning it openly, for ſome few words put downe in his laſt Will and Teſtament, which favoured (as choſe times judged) of hereſie: as alſo how another William de Tracy long before, embred his hands in the bloody murder of Thomas Archbiſhop of Canterbury, the Eccleſiaſticall Hiſtoriographers have written at large, and it is no part of my purpoſe to relate ſuch like matters. There is heere likewiſe Winchelcombe a great Towne and well inhabited, wherein Kenulph the Mercian King erected an Abbay, and on the ſame day that hee hallowed and dedicated it, hee freed and ſent home Edbricht a King of Kent, whom he had kept before his Priſoner. A man would hardly believe how much haunted and frequented this Abbay was long ſince, for the Reliques of King Kenelme a child ſeven yeares old, whom his owne ſiſter to get the Inheritance unto her ſelfe, ſecretly made away, and our forefathers regiſtred in the ranke of holy Martyrs. The Territory adjoining hereto in times paſt was reckoned a County by it ſelfe or a Sheriff-dome: For, we read in an old manuſcript, ſometime belonging to the Church of Worceſter, in this wiſe, Edric ſurnamed Stronach, that is, The gentle, or gainer, who firſt under King Athelred, and afterwards for a good while under Cnut governed the whole Kingdome of Englond, and ruled as Vice Roy, adjoining the Sheriff-dome of Winchelcombe which was then an entire thing by it ſelfe, unto the ſhire of Gloceſter. Thence I found nothing memorable, but neere the fountaine of Churn River, Cobertey, a ſeat of a ſtem of Barkleys ſo often named even from the Conqueſt, which marched with an heire of Chandos, and ſo came hereditarily to the Bruges progenitors to the Lords Chandos. Then by Bridlip-hill, whereby we aſcended unto this high Cotteswold out of the vale, lyeth Brimſfield, which had for the L. there of the Giffords in times paſt, unto whom in right of marriage there came a goodly inheritance from the Cliffords, and ſtreight waies by the female heires, the ſame fell to the Lords de Strange of Blackmer, ſo Andelies and divers others. Thus much of the places among the Wolds.

But under the said Wolds I have seene that notable Roman high-way by and knowne name called the Fosse, which out of Warwicke-shire commeth downe by Lemington, (where it may seeme there was a Station of the Romanes by the peeces of Romane Coine ploughed there often times out of the ground: some which Edward Palmer a curious and diligent Antiquary, whose Ancestors flourished heere a long time, hath of his courtesie imparted unto mee) then, by Stow onto Wold, where by reason of that high fite, the Windes blow cold: and Norfolk bearing the name of a Riveret running hard by it: and then to Circencester, whith the River Corinus, now Churn rising among the Wolds neere Corberley, very commodious for Milles, passeth by into the South, and so giveth it his name. This was City of as great antiquity as any other, called by Ptolomee CORINIUM, by Ca- tonine the Emperour, DUROCORNOVIUM, that is, The water Cornovium, full of teene miles from Glevum or Glocester, as hee noteth. The Britans named it Caer and Caer Ceri; the English Saxon Cypen-ceaster, wee in these dayes Cirester, and Circiter. The ruinate wals doe plainly shew that it was very large: for, by report they tooke up two miles in compasse: That it was a famous place, the Romanes Coines, the cherkerworke pavements, and the engraven marble stones that now then are there digged up, (which, have beene broken and to no small prejudice of Antiquity) doe evidently testifie: As also the Port Consular wayes of the Romanes, that heere did crosse one another, whereof that which led to GLEVUM or Glo- ster, is yet extant with his high rigde evident to bee seene as farre as to Birdlip, and if a man looke well upon it, seemes to have beene paved with stone. The British Chronicles record, that this City was burnt being set on fire by Sparrowes, through a stratageme devised by one Gurmund, I wot not what Tyrant of Africke, whereas Giraldus calleth it Passerum urbem, that is, the Sparrowes City: and out of those Chro- nicles Necham writeth thus,

Urbs vires experta, tuas Gurmunde per annos

Septem

This City felt for seven yeares space, Thy forces Gurmund.

Who this Gurmund was I know not. The Inhabitants shew a Mount beneath the City which they report Gurmund did cast up, and yet they call it Griffins Mount.
Marianus an Historian of good antiquity and credit, reporteth, that Cenelin King the West Saxons dispossessed the Britans of it, what time hee had discomfited put to flight their forces at Deorham, and brought Glocester to his subjection. Many yeares after this, it was subje& to the West Saxons: for, wee read, that Penda Mercian was defeated by Cinegise King of the West Saxons, when hee besieged with a mighty Army. Howbeit, at length both it, and the whole Territory and country came under subjection of the Mercians, and so continued untill the Eng- lish Monarchie. Under which it sustained much sorrow and grievous calamity by the Danes: and peradventure at the hand of Gurmen that Dane, whom the Histo- riographers call both Gusbrus and Gurmundus. So that it may seeme he was that Gur- mund which they so much speake of. For certes when hee aged, about the year, 825, a rablement of Danes rosted heere one whole yeare. Now scarce the fourth part within the wals is inhabited: the remaines beside are pasture grounds and the ruins of an Abbey, built (as the report goeth) at first by the Saxons, and newly repaired terwards by King Henry the First for Blanche Chanoines, wherein, I heard say, that many of the family of the Barons de  Sancto Amando* were buried. But the Castle that had, was by a Warrant from the King, overthrowne in the first yeare of Henry the Third his Raigne. The Townesmen raise the chiefe gaine by the Trade of Co- thing, and they make great reports of the singular bounry of King Richard, the first towards them, who endowed the Abbey with lands: and (as they say) themselves made them Rulers of the seven Hundreds adjoining, to hold the same jurisdiction see farre by vertue whereof they should have the hearing and determining of causes and take unto themselves the fines, perquisites, amercements, and other profits growing growing out of the trials of such causes. Moreover King Henry the Fourth granted unto them certaine priviledges in consideration of their good and valiant service performed against Thomas Holland Earle of Kent, late Duke of Surrey, John Holland Earle of Huntingdon, late Duke of Excester, John Montacute Earle of Salisbury, Thomas de Spenser Earle of Gloucester, and others, who being by him dispoiled of their honours, and maligning his usurpation, conspired to take away his life, and here, by the townes-men intercepted, were some of them slaine outright, and others beheaded.

The river Churne when it hath left Circester behinde him, six miles * neere to Dou- nam very an ancient seate of the Hungerfords, joyneth with Isis. For, Isis, commonly called Ouse, that it might bee by originall of Glocester-shire, hath his head there, and with lively springs floweth out of the South border of this shire nere unto Tor- leton an upland Village, not farre from that famous Port-way, called the Fosse. This is that Isis which afterwards entertaineth Tame, and by a compound word is called Tamisis, Sovereigne as it were of all the Britain Rivers in Britaine: of which a man may well and truly say as ancient Writers did of Euphrates in the East part of the World: that it doth both Sow and Water the best part of Britaine. The poeticall description of whose Source or first head, I have heere put downe out of a Poem entituled The Marriage of Tame and Isis, which whether you admit or omit, it skilleth but little.

* Isis, afterwards Tamisis.

As touching the Earles of Gloceſter; ſome there be, who have thruſt upon me William Fitz-Euſtace, for the fiſt Earle: who this was, I have not yet found, all verily beleeeve hee is yet unborne. But that which I have found, I will now reale from the Reader. About the coming in of the Normans, we readeth one Bithricke an Engliſh Saxon was Lord of Gloceſter, whom Maud wife to am Conquerour, upon a ſecret rankor and hatred conceived againſt him for his tempt of her beauty (for Bithricke had before time reſuſed to marry her) troubled and moleſted moſt maliciously. And when ſhee had at length caſt him in Priſon, John Fitz-Haimon Lord of Cerboile in Normandy, was by the King endowed with his ſeſſions, who in a battaile having received a wound with the puſh of a pike upon the temple of his head, had his wits cracks therewith, and ſurvived a good while after, as a man beſt and madde. His daughter Mabil, whom others name Sibill, Robert the baſeſon King Henry the Firſt by the interceſſion of his father, obtained for his wife, but not before he had made him Earle of Gloceſter. This is hee who is called commonly by Writers The Conſull of Gloceſter. A man of an haughty valorous minde and undaunted heart, as any one in that age; and who being never dejected with any adverſity, wanne great praife for his fidelity and worthy exploits in the behalfe of his ſiſter Maud the Empreſſe againſt Stephen then uſurping the Crowne of England. This honourable Title left he unto his ſon William, who dejected with comfortleſſe griefe when death had deprived him of his onely ſon and heire, aſſured his eſtate with his eldeſt daughter to John ſon to King Henry the Second, with certaine proviſions for his other daughters. Yet his three daughters brought this Earldome into as many families. For John when he had obtained the Kingdome repudiated her upon pretence as well that ſhe was barren, as that they were within prohibited degrees of conguinity: and reſerving the Caſtle of Briflow to himſelfe, after ſome time, paſſed over his repudiated wife with the Honor of Gloceſter, to Geffrey Manderil ſon of Geffrey Fitz Peter, Earle of Effex for 20000. markes, who thus over-marrying himſelfe was greatly impoveriſhed, and wounded in Tournament died ſoone after iſſueleſſe and the being remarried to Hubert of Burgh died immediately. Then K. John upon an exchange granted the Earldome of Gloceſter to Almarie Earle of Euxenx, ſon to the eldeſt daughter of the foreſaid E. William, who enjoyed it a ſhort time dying alſo without iſſue. So by Amis

A the ſecond daughter of the forenamed Earle William married to Richard de Clare
Earle of Hertford, this Earledome deſcended to Gilbert her ſonne, who was ſtiled Earle of Gloceſter and Hertford, and mightily enriched his houſe by marrying one of the heires of William Marshall Earle of Pembroch.

His ſonne and ſucceſſour Richard in the beginning of the Barons warres againſt king Henry the Third ended his life, leaving Gilbert his ſonne to ſucceed him, who powerfully and prudently ſwaied much in the ſaid wars, as he inclined to them or the king.
He obnoxious to King Edward the Firſt, ſurrendered his lands unto him, and received them againe by marrying Joane the Kings Daughter (ſirnamed of Acres in the Holy land becauſe ſhee was there borne) to his ſecond Wife, who bare unto him Gilbert
B Clare laſt Earle of Gloceſter of this ſirname, ſlaine in the flower of his youth in Scotland at the battaile of Sterling in the 6. yeare of K. Edward the ſecond. Howbeit while this Gilbert the third was in minority, Sir Ralph de Mont-hermer who by a ſecret contract had eſpouſed his mother the Kings daughter (for which he incurred the kings high diſpleaſure, and a ſhort imprifonment) but after reconciled was ſummoned to Parliaments by the name of Earle of Gloceſter and Hertford. But when Gilbert was out of his minority, he was ſummoned amongſt the Barons by the name of Sir Ralph de Mont-hermer, as long as he lived, which I note more willingly for the rareneſſe of the example. After the death of Gilbert the third without children Sir Hugh Le De Spencer (commonly named Spencer) the younger, was by writers called Earle of Gloce
C ſter, becauſe he had married the eldeſt ſiſter of the ſaid Gilbert the third. But after that he was by the Queene and Nobles of the Realme hanged, for hatred they bare to K. Edward the 2. whoſe minion he was; Sir Hugh Audley, who had matched in marriage with the ſecond ſiſter, through the favour of King Edward the Third, received this honour. After his death King Richard the Second erected this Earledome into a Dukedome, and ſo it had three Dukes and one Earle betweene: and unto them all it proved Equus Sejanus, that is, Fatal to give them their fall. Thomas of Woodſtocke youngſt ſonne to King Edward the Third, was the firſt Duke of Gloceſter advanced to that high honour by the ſaid King Richard the Second, and ſhortly after by him ſubverted. For when he buſily plotted great matters, the King tooke order that he D ſhould be conveyed ſecretly in all haſte to Calis, where with a featherbed caſt upon him he was ſmothered; having before under his owne hand confeſſed (as it ſtands upon Record in the Parliament Rols) that he by vertue of a Parent which hee had wreſted from the King, tooke upon him the Kings regall authority, that he came armed into the Kings preſence, reviled him, conſulted with learned about renouncing his allegiance, and deviſed to depoſe the King: for which being now dead he was by authority of Parliament attainted and condemned of high Treason. When hee was thus diſpatched, the ſame King conferred the Title of Earle of Gloceſter upon Tho mas Le De-Spencer in the right of his Great Grand-mother; who within a while after ſped no better than his great Grand-father Sir Hugh. For by King Henry the fourth he was violently diſplaced, ſhamefully degraded, and at Briflow by the peoples E fury beheaded. After ſome yeares King Henry the Fifth created his brother Humfrey, the ſecond Duke of Gloceſter, who ſtiled himſelfe the firſt yeare of King Henry the Sixth, as I have ſeene in an Inſtrument of his, Humfrey by the Grace of God, ſonne, bro ther, and Uncle to Kings, Duke of Gloceſter, Earle of Henault, Holland, Zeland, and Pen broch, Lord of Frieſland, Great Chamberlaine of the Kingdome of England, Protector and Defender of the ſame Kingdome, and Church of England. A man that had right well deſerved of the common wealth and of learning, but through the fraudulent praſtiſe and malignant envie of the Queene brought to his end at Saint Edmunds Bury. The third and laſt Duke was Richard brother to King Edward the Fourth who afterwards having moſt wickedly murdered his Nephewes, uſurped the Kingdome, by the name of King Richard the third: and after two yeares loſt both it and his life in a pitched field, give over againe as not well able to act it. When this Richard Duke of Gloucester being now proclaimed Protector of the Kingdome had under his command his nephewes, Edward the Fifth King of England, and Richard Duke of York, he retriuing after the Kingdome for himselfe, by profuse liberality and bounty to many, by passing great gravities tempered with singular affabilitie, by deepe wisdom, by ministring justice indifferently, and by close devises, wonne wholly to him all mens hearts, but the Lawyers especially to serve his turne. So shortly he effected in the name of all the States of the Realme, there should be exhibited unto him a supplication, wherein they most earnestly besought him for the publike Weale of the Kingdome, to take upon him the Crowne, to uphold his Countrey, and the common-weale now shrinking and downe falling, not to suffer it to runne headlong into utter desolation; by reason that both lawes of nature, and the authority of positive lawes, and the laudable customes and liberties of England, wherein every English man is an inheritor, were subverted and trampled under foote through civill wars, rapines, murders, extortions, oppressions, and all sorts of misery. But especially ever since that King Edward the fourth, his brother bewitched by forcerie and amorous potions fell in fancie with Dame Elizabeth Greie widdow, whom he married without the assent of his Nobles, without solemnne publication of Banes, secretly in a private place, and not in the face of the Church, contrary to the law of Gods Church and commendable custome of the Church of England: and which was worse, having before time by a precontract espoused Dame Eleanor Butler, daughter to the old Earle of Shrewsburie: whereby most sure and certaine it was, that the foresaid matrimony was unlawfull and therewith the children of them begotten illegitimate, and so unable to inherite or claime the Crowne. Moreover considering that Gary Duke of Clarence the second brother of King Edward the Fourth, was by authority of Parliament convicted and attainted of high treason, thereupon his children disinherited and debarred from all right succession; evident it was to every man, that Richard himselfe remained the sole and undoubted heire to the Crowne. Of whom they desired themselves, that being borne in England he would seriously provide for the good of England, neither could they make any doubt of his birth, parentage, and filiation; whose wisdom also, whose justice, princely courage, warlike exploits most valiantly achieved in the defence of the State, and whose roiall birth and blood, as who was descended from the blood roiall of the three most renowned Kingdomes of England, France, and Spaine they knew assuredly. Wherefore having thoroughly weighed these and such like motives, they willingly and withall hearty affection considering the welfare of the land, by that their petition and one generall accord of them all elected him for their King, and with prayers and teares lying prostrate before him, humbly craved and besought his gracious favour to accept and take upon him the Kingdomes of England, France, and Ireland, appertaining to him by right of inheritance, and now presented to him by their free and lawfull election; and so for every pittie and naturall zeale to reach forth unto his Countrey now forlorne his helping hand, that after so great and grievous stormes the sonne of grace might shine upon them to the comfort of all true hearted Englishmen: This supplication being read privately to himselfe, before that he entred upon the Kingdome, was presented also afterwards unto him in the publike assembly of all the States of the Realme, and there allowed, and so by their authoritie enacted and published, with a number of words (as the maner is) heaped up together, that according to the law of God, the law of Nature, the lawes of England and most laudable custome, Richard was and is by lawfull election, Inauguration, and Coronation the undoubted King of England, &c. and that the Kingdomes of England, France, and Ireland appertained rightfully to him and the heires of his body lawfully begotten. And to use the very words as they stand penned in the originall Record. By the authority of the Parliament it was pronounced, decreed and declared, that all, and singular the contents in the foresaid bill were true and undoubted, and the Lord the King with the assent of the three States of the Kingdome, by the foresaid authoritie pronounceth, decreeth, and declareth the same, for true and undoubted.

She was married first to R. Butler, L. of Sudley.

undoubted. These things have I laid forth more at large out of the Parliament Rowle, that yee may understand, both what and how great matters, the power of a Prince, the outward shew of vertue, the wily fetches of Lawyers, fawning hope, penfive feare, desire of change, and goodly pretences, are able to effect in that most wise assembly of all the States of a Kingdome, even against all Law and right. But this Richard is not to be accounted worthy to have bin a Sovereigne had he not bin a Sovereigne as Galba was reputed; who when he was a Sovereigne, deceived all mens expectation: but most worthy indeed of Sovereignty, had he not being transported with ambition (which blasteth all good parts) by lewd practises, and mischievous meanes made foule way thereunto. For that by the common consent of all that are wise, he was reckoned in the ranke of bad men, but of good Princes.

Now remembering my selfe to be a Chorographer I will returne to my owne part, and leave these matters unto our Historiographers, when God shall send them.

In this Countie there are Parishes. 280.

OXFORD

OXFORDSHIRE.

OXFORDSHIRE, in the Saxon Tongue Oxenporthchýne, which, as we said, belonged also to the Dobant, on the West side joyneth upon Gloucester-shire, on the South, which way it runneth out farthest in breadth, is dislevered from Bark-shire, by the River Isis or Tamis: Eastward, it bordereth upon Buckingham-shire: and Northward where it endeth pointed, in manner of a Cone, or Pine-apple, hath North-hampton-shire of one side, and Warwick-shire on the other side, confining with it. It is a fertile Country and plentiful: wherein the Plaines are garnished with Corne-fields and meddowes, the Hilles beset with Woods, stored in every place not onely with Corne and fruites, but also with all kinde of game for Hound, or Hawke; and well watered with fishfull Rivers. For ISIS, or Ouse which afterwards comes to bee named Tamis, maketh a long course and runneth under the South side; Cherwell also a pretty River well stored with fish, after it hath for a time parted North-hampton-shire and Oxford-shire passeth gently with a still streame through the middelt of the Country, and divideth it, as it were, into two parts. And Tamis with his waters conforteth and giveth heart to the East part, untill both of them together with many other Riverets and Brookes running into them bee lodged in Isis.

This Isis when it hath passed a small part of Wil-shire, no sooner is entred into Oxford-shire but presently being kept in and restrained with Rodcot bridge, passeth by Bablae, where Sir R. Vere that most puissant Earle of Oxford, Marquesse of Dublin, and Duke of Ireland, who as he stood in most high favour and authority with King Richard the Second, so he was as much envied of the Nobles, taught us (as one said) that no power is alwaies powerfull. Who being there discomfited in a skirmish by the Nobles and constrained to take the River and swimme over, found the Catastrophe of his fortune and subversion of his state: For, immediately he fled his country and died distressed in exile. Of whom the Poet in his Marriage of Tame and Isis, made these verses.

Rodcot Bridge,
Bablae.

—Hic Verus notissimus apro,
Dum dare terga negat virtus, & tendere contra Non sinit invicta retrix prudentia mentis;
Undique dum resonat repetitis ictibus umbo,
Tinnitque strepit circum sua tempora cassis,
Se dedit in fluvium, fluvius latatus & illo
Hospite, suscepit saluum, salvumque remisit.

Heere VERE, well knowne by badge of savage Bore,
While man-hood shames to yeeld, yet strive againe
Stout heart may not, restrain'd by wisdomes lore;
Whiles shield resounds by doubled blowes amaine,
And helmet rings about his eares; is faine
The streame to take: The River glad therefore,
His Guest tooke safe, and set him safe on shore.

Isis from thence overflowing many times the flat and low grounds, is first encreased with the Brooke Windrush, which springing out of Cotteswold, hath standing upon the banke side Burford, in the Saxon Tongue Beorþporth, where Cusbred King of West-Saxons at that time by curtesie of the Mercians, when hee could endure no longer the most grievous exactions of Ethelbald the Mercian, who began to oppress his people and sucke their blood, came into the field against him, and put him to flight: having won his Banner, wherein, by report of Authours, there was a golden Dragon depainted. Then passeth it by Minister Lovell, the habitation in times past of the

the great Barons Lovels of Tichmerch, who being descended from * Lupellus a Noble man of Normandy flourished for many ages, and augmented their estate by rich marriages with the daughters and heires of Tichmerch, with the heires of the Lords Beland D'eyncourt, and the Vicounts Beaumont. But their line expired in Francis Vicount Lovell, Lord Chamberlaine to King Richard the Third, (attainted by King Henry the Seventh, and slaine in the battaile at Stoke in the quarrell of Lambert that Comencher Prince) whose sister Fridiswid was Grandmother to Henry the first Lord (Hence Windrush hoding on his course watereth Whitney an ancient Towne, and before the Normans daies belonging to the Bishops of Winchester: to which adjoyneth Coger, the chiefe place of the Barony of Arfic, the Lords whereof branched out of the family of the Earles of Oxford are utterly extinguished many yeeres agoe. Note unto this, the Forest of Witchwood beareth a great breadth and in time past spread farre wider. For King Richard the Third disforested the great Territory of Witchwood betwene Woodstocke and Brighton: which Edward the Fourth made to be a Forest, as John Rolfe of Warwicke witnesseth. Isis having received Windrush passeth downe to Einsam in the Saxon tongue Eignephham, a Manour in times past of the Kings, seated among most pleasant meadowes, which Cuthwulfe the Saxon was the first that tooke from the Britans whom he had hereabout vanquished, and long after Aethelmar a Nobleman beautified it with an Abbey: the which, Aethelred King of England in the yeere of Salvation 1005. confirmed to the Benedictine Monkes, and in his confirmation gave the privilege of the liberty thereof, (I speake out of the very original grant as it was written) with the signe of the sacred Crosse: but now is turned into a private dwelling house and acknowledgeth the Earle of Derby Lord thereof. Beneath this, Evenode a little river arising likewise out of Coteswold speedeth him into Isis, which riveret in the very border of the Shire passeth by an ancient Monument standing not far from his banke, to wit, certaine huge stones placed in a round circle (the common people usually call them Rolle rich stones, and dreameth that they were sometimes men, by a wonderfull Metamorphosis turned into hard stones. The draught of them, as it is, portrayed long since, heere I represent unto your view. For, without forme and shape they bee, unequal, and by long continuance of time much impaired. The highest of them all, which without the circle looketh into the earth, they use to call The King, because hee should have bene King of England (forsooth) if hee had once seene Long Compton, a little Towne so called lying beneath, and which a man, if he goe some few paces forward, may see: other five standing at the other side, touching as it were, one another, they imagine to have been knights mounted on horse backe; and the rest the Army. But loe the foresaid Portraiture.

The

These would I verily thinke to have bene the Monument of some Victory and haply, erected by Rollo the Dane, who afterwards conquered Normandie. For, what time as he with his Danes and Normans troubled England with depredations, we read that the Danes joined battaile with the English thereby, at Hoch Norton, and afterwards fought a second time at Scier stane in Hwiccia, which also I would deeme to be that Mere-stone standing hard by for a land Marke, and parting foure shires: For, so much doth that Saxon word Scier-stane most plainly import. Certainly in an Exchequer booke the Towne adjacent is called Rollen-drich, where as it is there specified, Turstan le Dispenser held land by Serjeanty of the Kings Dispensary, that is, to be the Kings Steward. As for that Hoch-Norton, which I spake of before, for the rustical behaviour of the Inhabitants in the age afore going it grew to be a proverbe, when folke would say of one rudely demeaning himselfe and unmanerly after an English kinde, that hee was borne at Hocknorton. This place, for no one thing was more famous in old time, than for the woefull slaughter of the Englishmen in a foughten field against the Danes, under the Raigne of King Edward the Elder. Afterwards, it became the seat of the Barony of the D'Oilies an honourable and ancient Family of the Norman race, of whom the first that came into England was Robert de Oily, who for his good and valiant service, received of William Conquerour this Towne and many faire possessions, whereof hee gave certaine to his sworne brother Roger Ivery, which were called the Barony of Saint Valeric. But when the said Robert departed this life without issue male, his brother Niele succeeded him therein: whose sonne Robert the second was founder of Osney Abbey. But at length the daughter and heire generall of this house D' Oily, was married to Henry Earle of Warwicke: and he bare unto him Thomas Earle of Warwicke, who dyed without issue in the Raigne of Henry the Third: and Margaret, who deceased likewise without children, abeit shee had two husbands, John Marefcall, and John de Plesetis, both of them Earles of Warwicke. But then, (that I may speake in the very words of the Charter of the Grant) King Henry the Third granted Hoch-norton and Cudlington unto John de Plesetis, which were in times past the possessions of Henry D' Oily, and which after the decease of Margaret, wife sometime to the foresaid John Earle of Warwicke, fell into the kings hand as an Escheat of Normanslands: To have and to hold, untill the lands of England and Normandie were common. Howbeit out of this ancient and famous stocke there remaineth at this day a family of D' Oilies in this shire. Evenode passeth by no memorable thing else, but La Briuer, now Bruer sometime an Abbey of white Monks, and after he hath runne a good long course taketh to him a Brooke, neere unto which standeth Woodstocke, in the English Saxon language puocroc, that is, A woody place, where King Etheldred in times past held an assembly of the States of the Kingdome and enacted Lawes. Heere is one of the Kings houses full of State and magnificence, built by King Henry the First, who adjoyned also thereunto a very large Parke compassed round about with a stone wall, which John Rolfe writeth to have bene the first Parke in England, although we read once or twice even in Doomesday Booke, these words, Parcus silvestris bestiarum in other places. In which sense old Varro useth the word Parcus, which some thinke to be but a new word. But since that, Parkes are growne to such a number that there bee more of them in England, than are to be found in all Christendome beside, so much were our Ancestours ravished with an extraordinary delight of hunting. Our Historians report, that King Henry the Second being enamoured upon Rosamund Clifford, a Damosell so faire, so comely, and well favoured without comparison, that her beauty did put all other women out of the Princes minde; in so much as now shee was termed Rosa mundi, that is, The Rose of the World; and for to hide her out of the sight of his jealous Juno the Queene, he built a Labyrinth in this house, with many inexplicable windings, backward and forward: Which notwithstanding is now where to be seene at this day. The Towne it selfe, having nothing in it at all to shew, glorieth yer in this, that Geoffrey Chaucer, our English Homer was there bred and brought up. Of whom and of our English Poets I may truly avouch that, which that learned Italian said of Homer and the Greeke Poets;

Geoffrey Chaucer

Hic

— *Hic ille est cuius de gurgite sacro
Combibit arcenos vatum omnis turba furoris.*

This is the man whose sacred streame hath served all the crew
Of Poets, thence they dranke their fill, thence they their furies drew.
For, he surpassing all others without question in wit, and leaving our finishing Poet-alters by many degrees behinde him :

— *jam monte positus,
Ridet anhelantem dura ad fastigia turbam.*

When once himselfe the steepe top hill had wonne,
At all the sort of them he laught anone,
To see how they the pitch thereof to gaine
Puffing and blowing doe clamber up in vaine.

Isis having now entertained Evenode, divideth his Chanell and severing it selfe maketh many and those most delectable Islands, neere which stood Goditha a little Nunnery, which Dame Ida a rich widow built; and King John both repaired and also endowed with yearly Revenewes, that these holy Virgins might reliefe with their prayer (for by this time had that persuation possessed all mens mindes) the soules of King Henry the Second his father, and of Rosamund: For, there wasthe ryed with this Epitaph in Rhyme :

*Hac jacet in tombâ Rosa mundi, non Rosamunda,
Non redolet, sed olet, qua redolere solet.*

Rose of the World, not Rose the fresh pure floure
Within this Tombe hath taken up her boure :
She senteth now and nothing sweet doth smell,
Which earst was wont to favour passing well.

We read that Hugh the Bishop of Lincolne Diocefan of this place comming ther caused her bones to bee removed out of the Church as unworthy of Chri buriall for her unchaste life. Nevertheless the holy sisters there translated them gaine into the Church, and layed them up in a perfumed leather bagge; which in lead as was found in her Tombe at the dissolution of the house; and they used a Crosse there whereby the Passengers were put in minde with two rhyming Ver ses to serve God, and pray for her. But I remember them not.

Neither doth the Ouse or Isis as yet gather himselfe into one streame, which meeteth with Cherwell, which out of Northampton-shire, runneth almost through the mids of this Country. This River first watereth Banbury sometime Bancubyn, a faire large Towne, at which Kimic the West Saxon King in old time put to fight the Britans in a memorable battaile fighting manfully for their lives, state, and they had: and in this later foregoing age, not farre off Richard Nevill Barke of War wicke siding with the house of Lancaster gave such an overthrow to those of Tow ke that forthwith also he tooke King Edward the Fourth now forlorne and hopelesse.
Now the fame of this Towne is for zeale, cheefe, and cakes, and hath a Castle shew, which Alexander Bishop of Lincolne, (for to the See of Lincolne it belongeth) first built, who having a minde to dwell stately rather than quietly, brought himselfe many adversities by his huge buildings. About this Towne, (that may observe so much by the way) peeces of the Romane Emperours Coinc found, as also elsewhere in the field neere adjoyning) make somewhat to prove the antiquity of the place.

Neere to Banbury is Hamwell, where the Family of Cope hath flourished many years in great and good esteeme. And neere it againe is Broughton the habitation of Sir Richard Fienes, or Fenis: unto whom and to the heires of his body, the most mighty Prince King James, in the first yeare of his Raigne, Recognized and con firmed the name, stile, title, degree, dignity and honour of the Baron Say and Sele: who lineally descended from Sir James Fienes Baron Say and Sele, and Lord high Treas urer of England, who was cruelly beheaded by a rabble of Rebels in the time of King Henry the Sixth.

Cherwell carrying his Streame along from Banbury seeth nothing but pleasant fields passing well husbanded, and as plentifull meadows. Amongst which stand Heisford Warin, so denominated Warin Fitz-Gerold Lord thereof, Heyford Purcell likewise, so named of the Purcells, or de Porcellis ancient Gentlemen the old owners, Blechindon an an ancient Possession of the ancient Family Le Pover, and Islip in elder time Ghistilpe ^{Islip.}
the nall place of that King Edward (whom for his religious Piety and continency our Ancestours, and the Popes vouchsafed the name of Saint Edward the Confessor) as hee himselfe witnesseth in the originall Charter, whereby he granted this place to the Church of Westminster.

Here there runneth a riveret from the East in to Cherwell, which passeth by Bur- ^{Burcester.}
cester, in the English Saxons tongue Bupencear-cep, and Bepnacear-cep, a little towne carrying an ancient name, but wherein I have observed no matter of antiquity, save that Gilbert Basset and Egelina Courteney his Wife; built heere a Religious Houle in honour of Saint Eadburga, in the time of King Henry the Second, and that not long since the Barons Le Strange of Knocking were Lords of the place. But Westward, there lie some few remaines of a decayed and forlorne ancient station Alchester, they call it happily, as one would say, Aldechester, that is, an old Towne, by which a Port way from Wallengford, as the neighbour Inhabitants thinke, led to Banbury, and the same they called Akemanstreet way: the Tract whereof for cer taine miles together is yet most plainly to bee scene in the plaine of Otmore, which oftentimes is strangely overspread with winter waters. Cherwell thus increased passeth Southward nere to Hedindon, which King John gave to Sir Thomas Basset for his Barony.

But where Cherwell is confluent with Isis, and pleasant Eights or Islets lye dis perbed by the sundry disseverings of Waters; there the most Famous University of OXFORD, called in the English-Saxon tongue Oxenford, sheweth it selfe aloft ina Champion plaine. OXFORD, I say, our most noble Athens, The Muses-Seate, and one of Englands flayes; nay The Sunne, the Eye, and the Soule thereof, the very Source and most cleare Spring of good Literature and Wisedome: From whence Religi on, Civility and Learning are spred most plenteously into all parts of the Realme.
A faire and goodly City, whether a man respect the seemely beauty of private houses or the stately magnificence of publike buildings, together with the whol some sight or pleasant prospect thereof. For, the hills beset with woods doe so envi ron the plaine, that as on the one side they exclude the pestilent Southwinde, and the tempestuous West winde on the other, so they let in the cleering Eastern-winde onely, and the North-east winde with all, which free from all corruption: Whence it came to passe that of this Situation it was, (as writers recorde in ancient times) called Bellostium. Some are of opinion, that it hath beene named Caer Fortigern and Caer Fember in the British language, and that I wote not; what Fortigern and Mem price built it. But what ever it was in the Britans time, the English Saxons called it Oxenford, and altogether in the same signification that the Grecians terme their Dysphori, and the Germans their Ochen-furt upon Odera; to wit, of the fould of Oxen:
in which sense it is named of our Britans in Wales at this day Rhyd-y-jen: And yet Leland grounding upon a probable conjecture, deriveth the name from the River Ouse called in Latine Isis, and supposeth that it hath beene named Ousford con sidering that the River Eights or Islands which Isis scattereth hereabout, bee cal led Ousney.

Sage antiquity, as wee read in our Chronicles, consecrated this City even in the British age unto the Muses: whom from Greeke-lad (which is a small Towne at this day in Wilt-shire) they translated hither as unto a more fruitfull Plant-plot.
For thus writeth Alexander Neckam, The skill of Civill Law Italy challengeth to it selfe: ^{Lib. 2. de Neg.}
but for Heavenly Writ or Holy Scripture, the liberall Sciences also do prove, that the City of ^{tur. serm.}
Paris is to bee preferred before all others. Moreover according to the Prophecie of Merline, Wisedome and Learning flourished at Oxford, which in due time was to passe over into the parts of Ireland. But when during the English Saxons age next ensuing, there was nothing

Fridefwide.

nothing but continuall waisting and rasing of Townes and Citties, according to the sway and current of those dayes it sustained in part the common calamity of that time, and for a great while was frequented onely for the reliques of Fridefwide, who for the chastity and integrity of her life was canonized a Saint, upon this occasion especially, for that by a solemne vow shee had wholly devoted her selfe unto the Service of GOD, and Prince Algar whiles he came a wooing unto her, was miraculously, as writers say, stricken blinde. This Fridefwide, (as wee read in William of Malmesbury) triumphing for her virginity, erected here a Monastery, into which when certaine Danes adjudged to die in King Etheldreds time fled for refuge as to a Sanctuary, they were all burned with the buildings, (such was the unfatiable anger of the Englishmen against them.) But soone after, when the King repented this Act, the Sanctuary was cleansed, the Monastery reedified, the old Lands restored, new Possessions added, and at length the place was given by Roger Bishop of Salisbury unto a Chanon excellently well learned who there presented unto GOD many such Chanons who should live regularly in their Order. But leaving these matters, let us returne unto the Univeristy. When the tempestuous Danish stormes were meetely well blowne ouer, Alfred that most devout and Godly King recalled the long banished Muses unto their owne Sacred Chancells and built three Colledges: one for Grammarians, a second for Philosophers, and a third for Divines. But this you may more plainly understand out of these words in old Annales of the new Abbey of Winchester. In the year of Christs Incarnation * 806. and in the second year of Saint Grimbald his coming into England, was the Univeristy of OXFORD begonne. The first Regents in the same and Readers in the Divinity Schoole were Saint Neoth an Abbat, and besides a worthy Teacher in Divinity, and holy Grimbald a right excellent Professor of the most sweete written Word of Holy Scripture. But in Grammar and Rhetorike, the Regent was Asserius a Monk, in the skill of Literature passing well learned. In Logicke, Musicke and Arithmetike, the Reader was John a Monke of the Church of * Saint David: In Geometry and Arithmetike, the Reader was John a Monke also and Companion of Saint Grimbald, a Man of very quicke witte, and right learned every way: At which Lectures was present that most glorious and invincible King Alfred, whose memoriall in every Mans mouth shall be as long as bonie.

* Meneceus.

But presently after, as wee read in a very good manuscript copy of the sayd Asserius, who at the same time professed learning here: There arose a most dangerous and pernicious dissention at Oxford, betwene Grimbald and these great Clerkes whom he brought thither with him on the one side, and those old Schoole-men whom hee there found, on the other side: who upon his coming refused altogether to embrace the Rules, Orders and Formes of reading prescribed and begonne by him. For three yeares space the variance and discord betwene them was not great, howbeit there lurked a secret hatred fostered and kindled among them, which brake out afterwards in most grievous and bitter manner, and was most evident. For the appeasing whereof, that most invincible King Alfred being by message and complaint from Grimbald certified of that discord, went to OXFORD to intermeddle and end this controversie: Where also himselfe in Person tooke exceeding great paines in giving Audience to the quarrels and complaints of both sides. Now the main substance of all the contention stood upon this point. Those old Schoole-men holily avouched, that before Grimbalds coming to OXFORD Learning generally flourished there, although the Schollers and Students were fewer then in number than in former times, by reason the most of them through the cruelty and tyranny of Painims were expelled. Moreover they proved and declared, and that by the undoubted testimony of old Chronicles, that the Orders and Ordinances of that place were made and established by certaine Godly and learned men, namely Gildas of holy memory, Melkin, Ninnius, Kentigern and others, who all of them studied and followed their books there untill they were aged persons, managing and governing all things there in happy peace and concord: also that S. German came to Oxford and dwelt there halfe a yeare, what time as he travelled through Britan, with a purpose to preach against the Pelagian heresies, who wonderous well allowed of their former Orders and Ordinances. This Noble King with incredible and unexampled humility heard both parts most diligently,

A exhibiting them in earnest wise, (enterlacing godly and wholesome admonitions) to keepe mutual society and concord one with another. And so the King departed with this minde, hoping they would all of both sides obey his counsell and embrace his orders. But Grymbald taking this unkindly and to the heart, forthwith went his wayes to Winchester Abbey newly founded by Alfred: Shortly after hee caused his owne Tombe to be translated to Winchester, wherein he purposed after hee had runne his race in this life, that his bones should be bestowed, in an arched Vault made under the Chancell of Saint Peters Church in Oxford: Which Church verily the same Grymbald had built from the very foundation out of the ground, with stone most curiously wrought and polished.

Within some years after this new revived felicity, there ensued divers disturbances from the Danes, and afterward followed one or two calamities. For the Danes in the reign of Etheldred by way of robbery and foule worke and havocke there: and straight after, Herald surnamed Light foote raged against it with such barbarous cruelty, for that some of his followers were slaine there in a fray, that there followed thereupon a most heavy banishment of the Students, and the Univeristy, (a sorrowfull spectacle) lay as it were, halfe dead and past all recovery, untill the dayes of King William the Conquerour. Whom some write falsly to have wonne it by assault: but Oxonis written amisse in the Copies, for Exonia, that is, Excester deceived them. And that it was at that time a place of Studies and Students, may be understood out of these words of Ingulph, who in that age flourished. Ingulph (saith hee) being first placed in Westminster, and afterwards sent to the * Study of Oxford, when as in learning of Aristotle, I had profited above my fellowes of the same time, &c. For those Schooles of Learning which wee call Academies or Univeristies, that Age termed Studia, that is, Studies, as I will shew anon. But at this very time, it was so empoverished, that whereas within the wall and without, (I speake out of William the Conquerour his Domesday booke) there were about seaven hundred and fifty houses, besides foure and twenty Mansions upon the Walls, five hundred of them were not able to pay their Subsidy or Imposition. And to use the very words of that booke, This City paid pro Theloneo et Gablo, and for other Customs by the yeare to the King twenty pounds and sixe quaris of Honey: and unto Earle Algar tenne pounds.* About this time,

D Robert D'ully a noble man of Normandy (of whom I have before spoken) when hee had received at the hands of William the Conquerour in reward of his Service in the Warres, large Possessions in this Shire, built a spacious Castle in the West side of the City with deepe Ditches, Rampiers, an high raised Mount, and therein a Parish Church to Saint George, unto which when as the Parishioners could not have access, by reason that King Stephen most straightly besieged Mande the Emperesse within this Castle, Saint Thomas Chappell in the streete hard by was built. He also, as it is thought, fortified the whole City with new walls, which by little and little time doth force, and as it were embreach with his assault. Robert likewise

E founded Osney or Osney, a most stately Abbey, as the ruines doe yet shew, amidst the divided waters, not farre from the Castle: perswaded thereto by Edith his wife, (the daughter of Forne) who before time had beene one of King Henry the First his sweet hearts and lig-bies.

1074. Register of Osney Abbey.

About those times as we read in the Chronicle of the said Osney Abbey, Robert Pulein beganne to read in Oxford the Holy Scriptures, in England now growne out of request: Who afterwards, when as by his Doctrine the English and Frenchmen both had much profited; was called by Pope Lucius the second, and promoted to be Chancellor of the Church of Rome. To the same effect also writeth John Rosse of Warwicke. By the procurement of King Henry the First, the Divinity Lecture which had discontinued a long time in Oxford, began againe to flourish, and there hee built a Palace, which King Edward the Second at length converted into a Convent of Carmelites. But long before this time, in this Palace was borne into the World that Lion-hearted Knight, Richard the First King of England; commonly called Coeur de Lion, a Prince of a most baury minde and full of resolution, borne for the weale of Christendome, the honour of England, and the terrour of Infidels.

Richard Cœur de Lion.

Infidels. Upon whose death a Poet in that age of no meane conceite verified thus, for that his remaines were interred in diuerse places ;

*Viscera Carcelorum, Corpus Fons seruat Ebrardi, Et cor Rhotomagus, Magne Richarde, tumus :
In tria diuiditur unus, qui, plus fuit uno,
Nec superest uno gloria tanta viro.*

Hic Richarde jaces, sed mors si cederet armis, Victa timore tui, cederet ipsa tuis.

Thy Bowels keep's Carceolum, thy corps Font Everard :
And Roan thy valiant Lions heart, O noble great Richard.
Thus one three fold diuided is, for more he was then one.
And for that one, so great he was, such glory is in none.

Here li'st thou Richard, but if death to force of armes could yeeld,
For feare of thee he would to thee have given as lost the field.

Thus after the Citty was refreshed againe with these buildings, many began to flocke hither as it were to a Mart of learning and vertue: and by the industrious means especially of that Robert Pulein, a man borne to promote the Common-wealth of learning, who refused no paines, but laboured all that he could to set open againe the Well springs of good Literature which had bene stopped up, through the fault especially of King Henry the First, King Henry the Second, and King Richard the first, of whom I spake ere while. And these endeavours of Pulein sped to welde toke so good effect, that in the reigne of King John, there were here three thousand Students; who all at once every one changed their Habitation to Reading and partly to Cambridge, because the Citizens seemed to wrong and abuse overmuch the Students and Professours of Learning: but after this tumult was appeased, they returned within a short time. Then and in the age presently ensuing, as God provided this City for good learning, so he raised up a number of very good Prelates to the good thereof, who for the adorning and maintenance of learning extended their liberality in the highest degree. For, when King Henry the Third holly way of Pilgrimage visited Saint Frideswide, (a thing before-time thought to be a heinous Offence in a Prince for the dishonour offered to her by Alger a Prince) and so removed that superstitious feare, wherewith some superstitious Priests had for a time frightened Princes from once comming to Oxford: and had assembled here a very great Parliament for the composing of certaine controversies betweene him and the Barons, hee confirmed the priuiledges granted by the former Kings, and conferred also some other himselfe. So that by this time there was so great a flock of learned men, that diuers most skilfull in Divinity as well as in Humanitie, were great numbers spread from thence both into the Church and Common-wealth. Mathew Paris, in plaine termes called The Vniuersity of Oxford, The Second Scholasticke the Church, nay, rather a ground-woke of the Church, next after Paris. For with the name of Vniuersity the Bishops of Rome had before time honoured Oxford, which Title at that time by their Decrees they vouchsafed to none but unto that of Rome, this of Oxford, unto Bononia in Italy and Salamanca in Spaine. And in the Council of Vienne, it was ordained that there should bee erected Schooles for the Helike, Greeke, Arabicke and Chaldaean tongues, in the Studies of Paris, Oxford, Bologna and Salamanca, as the most famous of all others, to the end that the knowledge of these tongues might by effectual instruction be thoroughly learned. And that Catholike men having sufficient knowledge in those tongues should be chosen, twaine skilfull in every of these tongues. For those who were to bee Professours in Oxford, The same Council ordained, That the Prelates of England, Scotland, Ireland and Wales, the Monasteries the Chapters, the Covents, the Colledges exempt, and not exempt, and Persons of Churches should provide competent stipends.

Out of these words may bee observed, both that Oxford was the chiefe place of Studies in England, Scotland, Ireland and Wales, and also that those Schooles which we now adayes doe call Academies and Vniuersities, were aptly in old time named Studies: as S. Hierom termed the Schooles of Gaul, Studia Florentissima, that is, most flourishing Studies. And as for the name of Vniuersity, it was taken up about the time of King Henry the Third, for a Publike Schoole, and if I bee not deceived in mine owne observations, it was then in use not for the place but for the very body and society of Students, as we reade in bookes of that age, Vniuersitas Magistrorum Oxonia, Vniuersitas Magistrorum Cantabrigia, that is, The Vniuersity of Masters of Oxford, &c. But happily this may seeme beside my Text.

Now by this time, good and bountifull Patrons began to furnish the Citty with- in, and the Suburbs without with most stately Colledges, Halls and Schooles, and to endow them also with large Reuenues: For the greatest part of the Vniuersity was beforetime in the Suburbs without the North-gate. In the reigne of King Henry the third, John Balliol of Barnards Castle in the Bishopricke of Durham who died in the yeere 1269, the father of Balliol King of Scots, founded Balliol Colledge and so named it: and straight after Walter Merton Bishop of Rocheſter, translated the Colledge which hee had built in Surrey to Oxford, in the yeere 1274, enriched it with Lands and Possessions, naming it The house of Schollers of Merton, but now it is called Merton Colledge. And these two were the first endowed Colledges for Students in Christendome. William Archdeacon of Durham repaired and enlarged with new building that worke of King Aelfred, which now they call, Vniuersity Colledge. At which time, the Students, for that they entertained somewhat coarsely Otto the Popes Legate, or Horse-leach rather, sent out to sucke the English Clergies blood, were excommunicate and with all indignities shamefully handled. And in those dayes, as Armarhanus writeth, there were counted here thirty thousand Students. Under King Edward the Second, Walter Stapledon Bishop of Excester founded Excester Colledge and Hart Hall, and the King himselfe in imitation of him built the Colledge commonly called Oriall, and S. Mary Hall. At which time a convert Jew read an Hebrew Lecture here, unto whom for a Stipend every one of the Clergy of Oxford for every Mark of his Ecclesiasticall living, contributed a penny. Afterward Queene Philip wife to King Edward the Third, built Queenes Colledge, and Simon Islip, Archbishop of Canterbury, Canterbury Colledge.

The Students then, having the world at will and all things falling out to their hearts desire, became insolent, and being divided into factions, under the names of Northren and Southren men, strucke up the Alarum to intestine and unreasonable tumults among themselves. Whereupon the Northren faction went their wayes to Stanford and beganne there to set up Schooles. But some few yeeres after, when Gods favour shined more light somely had scattered away the clouds of contention, they returned from Stanford recalled by Proclamation directed to the High-sheriffe of Lincolneshire upon penalty to forfeit their bookes and the Kings displeasure. And then it was ordained that no Oxford man should professe at Stanford, so any prejudice or hinderance of Oxford. Shortly after William Wickham Bishop of Winchester founded a magnificent Colledge, which they call New Colledge: into which out of another Colledge of his at Winchester the best wits are yeerely transplanted. And hee about the same by the tract of the Citty wall built a faire high wall embatled and turreted. Also Richard Angervill Bishop of Durham, surnamed Philobiblos, that is Love of books, furnished a Library for the publike use of Students. His Successour Thomas Ruffeld, laied the foundation of Durham Colledge, for Durham Monkes, and Richard Fleming Bishop of Lincolne founded likewise Lincolne Colledge. Also at the same time the Monkes of the order of Saint Bennet, by a Chapter held among them, laid their monies together and encreased Gloucester Hall: built before by I. Lord Clifford of Gloucester for Monkes of Gloucester, wherein one or two Monkes out of every Convent of Benedictine Monkes were maintained at study, who afterwards should profite good letters in their Abbaies, unto which Glocester Hall, Nicholas Wadham of Morfeld in the County of Somerfet, hath assigned a faire portion of lands and money for the propagation of Religion and Learning, which I note incidently by way of congratulation to our Age, that there are yet some who graciously respect the advancement of good Learning. About that time, not to speake of the Chinon, Saint Frideswide, and Osney, or the Cistercian Monkes of Reilew, there were erected fower faire Frieries and other religious houses, where flourished also many profound Learned men. In the age ensuing, when Henry the Fifth reigned, Henry Chicheley Archbishop of Canterbury built two and those very faire Colledges, the one dedicated to the memory of All Soules, and the other to Saint Bernard. And there passed not many yeeres betweene, when William Wainfleet Bishop of Winchester founded Mary Magdalen Colledge: for building rare and excellent, for sight commodious, and for waikes passing pleasant. And at the very same time was built the Drumy Schoole, so fine a peece of elegant worke that this of Xenocritus may justly bee ingenuously upon it: Invisarum facilius aliquem quam imitaturum: that is, Sooner will one copy out then set such another by me. And Humphrey that good Duke of Glocester, a singular Patron, and a respective lover of learning, encreased the Library over it with hundred twenty nine most select Manuscript bookes, which at his great charges he procured out of Italy. But such was the private avarice of some in the giddy time of Edward the Sixth, that they for small gaine envied the use thereof to Posterity. Yet now againe (God blesse and prosper it) Sir Thomas Bodley a right worshipfull knight and a most worthy Nource-son of this Univerfity furnished richly in the same place a new Library with the best books of exquisite choice from all partes, with great charges and studious care, never sufficiently commended. Whereby the Univerfity once againe have a publike Store-house of knowledge and learning, and might deserve the Glory that may flourish freshly in the memory of all Eternity. In wheras by an ancient custome of the wisest men, those were wont to be dedicated within such Libraries in gold, silver or brasse, by whose care they were erected, and whose immortall soules in them doe speake to the end that Time might not overpower and prevaile against men of worth, and the desires of mortall men might be satisfied who do all long to know what their persons and presence were. The Earle of Dorset late Chancellor of this Univerfity (that he might also leave some memoriall himselfe) hath in the very place dedicated unto Sir Thomas Bodley so passing well deserving of the Learned Common-wealth, his representation with this inscription:

THOMAS SACKVILLUS DORSETTIAE COMES, SUMMUS ANGLIAE THESAURARIUS, ET HUIUS ACADEMIAE CANCELLARIUS, THOMAE BODLEIO BQUITI AURATO, QUI BIBLIOTHECAM HANC INSTITUIT, HONORIS CAUSSA PIPPO POSUIT.

That is,

THOMAS SACKVILL EARLE OF DORSET, LORD HIGH TREASURER OF ENGLAND, AND CHANCELLOR OF THIS UNIVERSITIE, UNTO SIR THOMAS BODLEY KNIGHT, WHO INSTITUTED THIS LIBRARY OF A PIOUS MIND ERECTED THIS MONUMENT TO DO HIM HONOUR.

In the Raigne of Henry the Seventh, for the better advancement of learning, William Smith Bishop of Lincolne built new out of the ground Brazen Nose Colledge, (which that good and godly old man Master Alexander Newell Deane of Saint Pauls in London lately augmented with Revenewes) and Richard Fox Bishop of Winchester erected likewise that which is named Corpus Christi Colledge: and Thomas Wolsey Cardinall of Yorke following their example, beganne another (where the Monastery of Fridefwide stood) the most stately and fairest of them all, for Professors and 200. Students, which Henry the Eighth, joyning unto it Canterbury Colledge assigned to a Deane Prebends and Students, endowed it with livings, and named it Christis Church. And the same most puissant Prince, with money disbursed out of his owne Treasury, ordained, both for the Dignity of the City a Bishop, and for the ornament and advancement of the Univerfity, publike Professours. Likewise within our remembrance, for the furtherance of learning with new and fresh benefits, Sir Thomas Pope Knight reared a new Durham Colledge: and Sir Thomas White Knight Citizen and Alderman of London raised Bernard Colledge, both which lay buried in the rubbish. They reedified them, repaired them with new buildings, enriched them with faire lands and gave them new names: For the one of them they dedicated to Saint John Baptist, and that other to the holy and sacred Trinity. Queene Mary also built the common Schooles. And now of late Hugh Prife Doctor of the Lawes, hath begunne a new Colledge (with good speede and happy successe as I wish) to the honor of Iesus. With these Colleges which are in number 16. (and eight Halls beside) all faire, and decently built, richly endowed, and furnished with good Libraries, Oxford at this day so flourisheth, that it farre surmounteth all other Universities of Christendome. And for Living Libraries, (for so may I well and truly with Ennapius terme great Scholars and learned men) for the discipline and teaching of the best Arts, and for the politique government of this their republike of Literature, it may give place to none. But to what end is all this? Oxford needeth no mans commendation: the excellency thereof doth so much exceede, and (if I may use Pindus word) superfluit, that is, surmounteth. Let this suffice to say of Oxford as Pomponius Mela did of Athen, Clarior est quam ut indicari queat, that is, More glorious it is of it selfe, than that it needeth to bee out shewed. But have heere for an upshot and farewell, the beginning of Oxford story out of the Proctors booke. By the joint testimony of most Chronicles, many places in divers Coastes and Climates of the world we read to have flourished at sundry times in the studies of divers Sciences; But the Univerfity of Oxford is found to be for foundation more ancient; for plurality of sciences more generall, in profession of the Catholike truth more constant, and in multiplicity of Privileges more excellent, than all other Schooles that are known among the Latines. The Mathematicians of this Univerfity have observed, that this their City is from the Fortunate Islands 22. Degrees, and the Arctike or Norrb Pole elevated 51. Degrees, and 30. Scruples high. And thus much briefly of my deare Nurse-mother Oxford.

But when a little beneath Oxford Isis and Cherwell have confociated their waters together within one Chanell, Isis then entere of himselfe and with a swifter current runneth Southward, to finde Tame whom so long he had sought for. And gone he is not forward many miles, but behold Tame streaming out of Buckinghamshire, meeteth with him: who is no sooner entered into this Shire, but he giveth name to Tame a Mercate Towne situate very pleasantly among Rivers. For, Tame passeth hard by the Northside, and two Riverets shedding themselves into it compasse the same, the one on the East, and the other on the West. Alexander that liberall Bishop of Lincolne, Lord of the place, when his prodigall humor in sumptuous building of Castles was of every body privily misliked, to wash out that staine (as Newbrigensis saith) built a little Abbay nere unto the Towne: and many yeeres after the Quatromans, who in the age foregoing were men of great reputation in these parts, founded an Hospitall for the sustentation of poore people. But both of these are now decayed and quite gone: and in stead thereof Sir John Williams Knight, whom Queene Mary advanced to the Dignity of a Baron, by the Title of Lord William of Tame erected a very

liams of Tame.

Baron William of Tame.

a very faire Schoole, and a small Hospitall, But this Title soone determined when he left but daughters married into the Families of Norris and Wenman.

From hence Tame runneth downe neere unto Ricot, a goodly house, which in times past belonged to those Quatremans: whose stocke failing to bring forth Maies, it was devolved at length after many failes and alienations passed by the Foulers and Herons, unto the said Lord Williams; and so by his daughter fell to Sir Henry, Lord Norris, whom Queene Elizabeth made Baron Norris of Ricot, a man of good make in regard of his noble birth and parentage: for he descended from the Lowells, who were neere allied by kinred unto the greatest houses in England: but most renowned for that right valiant and warlike Progeny of his, as the Netherlands, Portugall, little Bretagne, and Ireland can witnesse. At the length, Tame by Haseley, where sometimes the names of Barentines flourished as at Cholgrave commeth to Dorchester by Bede termed Civitas Dorcinia: by Leland Hydropolis, a name devised by his owne conceit, yet fit enough, considering that Dour in the British tongue signifieth water. That this Towne was in old time inhabited by Romanes, their coined peeces of money oftentimes turned up doe imply: and our Chronicles record, that it was for long time much frequented by reason of a Bishops See, which Birinus the Apostle of the West-Saxons appointed to be there. For when hee had baptised Cinigif, a pey King of the West-Saxons, unto whom Oswald King of Northumberland was God-father, both these Kings, as faith Bede, gave this City unto the same Bishop to make therein his Episcopall residency. This Birinus, as wee may read also in Bede, was wonderfully in those daies admired, for a deepe conceived opinion of his holiness: whereupon an ancient Poet who penned his life in Verse, wrote thus of him,

*Dignior attollit quam sit Tyrinthus heros,
Quam sit Alexander Macedo; Tyrinthus hostis
Victi, Alexander mundum, Birinus utrunque.
Nec tantum vicit mundum, Birinus, & hostem, Sed sese bello vincens, & victus eodem.*

More worthy for to be extold than Hercules for might,
Or that great king of Macedon, who Alexander hight:
For Hercules subdu'd his foes, and Alexander he Wonne all the World by force of Armes: But our Birinus, see,
Did vanquish both: nor conquer'd he onely the World and Foe;
But in one fight subdu'd himselfe, and was subdu'd also.

After 460. yeares, Remigius Bishop of this place least the name of Bishop should loose credit in so small a City (a thing forbidden in the Canons) in the Raigne of William the first translated his seat to Lincolne. At which time this City of Dorchester (as Malmesbury faith who then flourished) was but slender and of small resort, yet the majesty of the Churches was great, whether you respected either the old building or the new diligence and care employed thereupon. Ever since it beganne by little and little to decay: and of late by turning London high way from thence, it hath decreased so, as that of a City it is scarce able now to maintaine the name of a Towne, and all that it is able to doe, is to shew in the fields adjoyning ruines onely and rubbish, as expresse tokens of what bignesse it hath beene. A little beneath this Towne Tame and Isis meeting in one streame become hand-fast (as it were) and joynd by Wedlocke: and as in waters, so in name, they are coupled, as Ior and Dan in the holy Land, Dor and Dan in France, whence come Iordan and Dordane. For ever after this, the River by a compound word is called, Tamisis, that is, Tame. He seemeth first to have observed this, who wrote the booke entituled Eulogium Historiarum. Now as touching this marriage of Isis with Tame have heere certaine Verses taken out of a Poem bearing that Title, which you may read or leave unread at your pleasure:

There lay they foorth and make no spare,
Those spoiles that whilom Brut
From Achives tooke; what riches great
From Grecians Brennus stout,
And from fierce Irish, Gurmund wonn,
What either Bundwic Queen,

Her husband wondrous glad.
Impatient now of all delay
She hastneth him to wed,
And thinks the daies be long untill
They meet in marriage bed.
Untill I say, ambitious she,
May now before her love
Her own name set : see whereunto Ambition minds doth move !

Which was to give presage,
And lucky Augury of this Long wished marriage.
Up riseth TAME then, who know's
Her locks with eares of corn
Full well to knit, with kirtle green
Her wast eke to adorn :
The light some raies of morning bright
She now doth far excell,
Dione faire in countenance
Lookes not by halfe so well.
Her lips the Pestane Rose surpasse,
Her eyes, gemmes of great cost,
Her haire the Lilies fresh and white,
Her necke the hoary frost.
And as she runnes, her haire all wet
She doth behind her cast,
Which waving thus she kembeth slick;
And layeth even at last.
Lo, ISIS sudainly out of
The Waves so mild doth shew,
His lovely face, his eies withall
Glitter with golden hew,
As they from dropping visage send Their beames the fields throughour, Whiles one anothers neck with armes Displayd they clip about,
Full sweetly he doth TAME kisse
Whom he hath wish'd so long,
A thousand kisses twixt them twain
Doe now resound among.
With clasping close their armes wax pale,
Their lips their hearts linke fast,
To nuptiall chamber thus they both Jointly descend at last :
Where CONCORD with religious FAITH
Together both ymet,
Knit up the knot of wedlock sure
With words in forme yser.
And now the pipes of thyried box
On every side resound;
The water Nymphes, the Dryades
The wanton Satyrs round
About the place disport and dance
The measures cunningly,
Whiles on the grasse they foote it fine,
In rounds as merily.
The Birds heerewith in every wood Melodiously doe sing,
And ECHO her redoubled notes
In mirth strives forth to ring.
All things now laugh, the fields rejoice
The CVPIDs as they fly,
Amid the aire on bridled birds
Clap hands right pleasantly

BRITONA,

BRITONA, hand-fast-maker thee,
 All clad in Laurell green,
 Play's on the Harp what ever acts
 Our anceftours have feene.
 Shee fings how BRITANNY from all
 The world divided was,
 When Nereus with victorious Sea
 Through cloven rocks did paffe:
 And why it was that Hercules
 When he arrived heere,
 Upon our coaft, and tafted once
 The mudleffe T AMIS cleere, Did Neprun's fonne high Albion
 Vanquish in bloody fight
 And with an haile-like ftorme of ftones
 Kild him in field out-right.
 And when Phyffes higher came,
 What Altars fared were
 By him? How Brute with Corinae
 His truffy friend and fere,
 Went forth into the Western parts
 And how that Caeſar, he
 When he had fought and found, turn'd back
 With feare, from Britannie.

And after ſome few verſes interpoſed.

This ſaid, then Tame and Iſis both
 In love and name both one,
 Hight Tamiſis, more joy's therein,
 And haſtning to be gone
 Ariſeth up and leaping out,
 With haſtfull hot deſire,
 Advanceth forth his ſtreame, and ſeekes
 The Ocean main his ſire.

Benſon.

From Dorcheſter, Tamiſis goeth to Benſon, in old time Benſington, which Strabo calleth Villam Regiam, that is, The Kings towne, and reporteth, That Ceanlin took it from the Britans in the yeere of our Lord, 572. and that the Weſt-Saxons by the poſſeſſion of it 200. yeeres after. For, then Offa the King of Mercians, thinking it would be for his commoditie and honor both, that they ſhould have nothing on this ſide the river, wonne it, and ſubjected it to him. But at this day it goeth but village onely, and hath a houſe of the Kings hard by, ſometime a faire place, but now running exceedingly to ruine, as being not very whoſome by reaſon of the foggy aire and miſts ariſing from a ſtanding water adjoining. This houſe of certain Elmes called Ewelme, but commonly New-Elme, was built by William de la poſte Duke of Suffolke, who having taken to Wife Alice the onely daughter of Thomas Chaucer, had by her faire lands heereabout as elſewhere: and beſide this houſe, he erected alſo a faire Church, wherein the ſaid Alice lieth buried, and a proper Hoſpittall: John Earle of Lincolne his Grand child, who by King Richard the Third had been declared heire apparent to the Crowne, overthrow in ſome ſort the happie chance of this Family. For while he plotted and projected ſeditiouſly to rebell againſt King Henry the ſeventh, he was attainted and ſlaine in the battell at Stoke, and Edmund his brother being for like cauſe attainted, the poſſeſſions became Crowne-land. The King Henry the Eighth made this houſe an Hanour, by laying unto it certain Manours, and Wallingford among others, which before, had a long time belonged unto the Dukes of Cornwall.

Ewelme.

The Tamiſis from hence having ferched a great compaſſe about windeth in manner backe againe into himſelfe, enclosing within it the Hundred of Henley, mounting high with Hills, and beſet with thicke Woods, which ſome doe thinke the ANCALITES that yeelded themſelves unto Caeſar's protection, did inhabit. Here is Rix-brond and Stonor ancient Poſſeſſions of the Families of Stonors who ſince the time of King Edward the Third when Sir John Stonor was chiefe Juſtice in the Common-pleas, flouriſhed with great alliance, and faire revenues untill they were transferred by an Heire generall to Sir Adrian Fortescue unhappily attainted, whoſe daughter, Heire to her mother was married to the firſt Baron Wenworth. Next neighbour hereunto is Puſhull which the Family of D'ohly held by yeelding yeerely to the King a Table-cloth of three ſhillings price, or three ſhillings for all ſervice. Under this Southward ſtandeth Greys Roberſfield, a houſe which in times paſt Walter Grey the Archbiſhop of Yorke gave freely unto William Grey his Nephew, the Inheritance whereof by the Baron of D'Eincourt was devolved upon the Lovels. Now it is the dwelling houſe of Sir William Knolles, Treasuſer of the Kings Houſe, whom James our King for his faithfull ſervice performed unto Queene Elizabeth, and to be performed unto himſelfe, advanced to the honourable title of Baron Knolles of Roberſfield. Nere unto it, Henley upon Tamiſis, in old time called Haleganz ſheweth it ſelfe in the very confines of the ſhires. The Inhabitants whereof be for the moſt part Watermen, who make their chiefeſt gaine by carrying downe in their Barges wood and Corne to London: neither can it make report of any greater antiquity than that in times paſt the Mollines were Lords thereof, from whom by the Hungerfords who procured unto the towne, of King Henry the Sixth the liberty of holding two faires, it came by right of Inheritance unto the honourable houſe of the Hallings. And where now the Tamiſis hath a wooden Bridge over it, they ſay in times paſt there ſtood one of ſtone arched. But whether this Bridge were here, that Dio writeth the Romans paſſed over when they purſued the Britans along this tract, who below had ſworn over the river, hard it is for a man to ſay. From Henley, the Chiltern-hills hold on with a continued ridgerunning Northward, and divide this Country from Buckinghamſhire: at the foote whereof ſtand many ſmall townes: among which theſe two are of greateſt note, Warrington a little mercate towne belonging ſometime to Robert D'Oily: and Shirburne a prerty Caſtle of the Quatremans in times paſt, but now the habitation of the Chamberlains deſcended out of the houſe of the Earles of Tankervill, who having beene long agoe Chamberlains of Normandy, their Poſterity relinquishing that old name of Tankervills, became ſurnamed Chamberlains, of the Office which their anceſtours bare.

To omit Edg, Algar, and other Engliſh Saxons, official Earles of Oxford; ſince after the Conqueſt, the title of the Earledome of Oxford hath flouriſhed a long time in the Family of Vere, which derive their deſcent from the Earles of Guines, and that ſurname from Vere a towne in Zeland. They received the beginning of their greatneſſe and honour here in England from King Henry the Firſt, who advanced Aubrey de Vere for his ſingular wiſedome with ſundry favours and benefits, as namely with the Chamberlainſhip of England, and Portgreveſhip of the City of London. To his ſon Aubrey, Henry the Second (before hee was eſtabliſhed King, and when hee uſed onely this title, Henry Sonne to King Henries daughter, right heire of England and Normandie) reſtored firſt the Chamberlainſhippe, which hee had loſt in the civil broiles, and then offered unto him which of the Titles he himſelfe would chooſe, of theſe foure Earledomes: Dorſet, Wiltſhire, Barkſhire, and Oxfordſhire; that he might divert him from Stephen then uſurping the Kingdome, and aſſure him to himſelfe. And in the end both Maud the Empreſſe, and Henry alſo her ſon being now come to the Crowne by their ſeverall Charters created him Earle of Oxford. Among thoſe that deſcended from him, (not to recount every one in their courſe and order) theſe were they that purchaſed greateſt fame and honour: Robert de Vere, who being in very high favour with King Richard the ſecond was honoured with theſe new and ſtrange dignities not heard of before, namely, Markeſſe of Dublin, and Duke of

Ireland:

Ireland: of which, as one said, he left nothing at all to himselfe, but to his Tombe titles, and to the world matter of talke. For, shortly after through the spiritfull copy of the Nobles as much against the King as against him, he was dispoiled of his crown and ended his dayes miserably in exile. John the First of that name so trusty and true to the House of Lancaster, that both Hee and his Sonne and Heire Aubrey lost their heads therefore together in the First yeere of King Edward the Fourth. John his second Sonne a right skilfull, and expert Martiall man, neverthelesse was most true and faithfull to the said House of Lancaster, fought in sundry battells against King Edward the Fourth, defended and made good for a while Saint Michaels Mount, and was an especiall assistant unto Henry the Seaventh in attaining to the Kingdom. Another John likewise in the reigne of Henry the Eighth, a Man in all parts of his life so sincere, so religious, and so full of goodnesse, that hee gained the surname of the Good Earle. Hee was great Grandfather of Henry that is now Earle, and the Eighteenth of this race in Lineall descent, and also Grandfather of Sir Francis and Sir Horatio Vere, brethren, who by their singular knowledge in Military affaires, and exploits most valiantly, and fortunately achieved in the Low-Countries, have added exceeding much honour and glory to themselves, and to the ancient Nobility of their Family.

CATTIEUCHLANI.

CATTIEUCHLANI.

Vpon the DOBUNI Eastward there confined the people, which Ptolomee calleth according to the diversity of copies, CATTIEUCHLANI, CATTIDUDANI, CATHICLUDANI, and Dio CATTUELLANI. Which of these might bee the truest name, I can not easily say. Yet give me leave I pray you in this place to cast forth my conjecture (although it is an abortive) concerning this point. I have bene of opinion that these were in old time called CASSI, that of this Cassii their Prince was named Cassivellaunus or Cassibelinus: (for so wee finde it diversely written. Also that, of Cassivellaunus name, this very people were by the Grecians termed Cattuellani, Cathuellani and Cattieuchlani. For, among the Nations of Britaine, Cæsar reckoneth the CASSI; who that they were seated in these parts it is most certaine: and of whose name a pretty portion of this Tract is at this day called Caithow. And seeing that Cassivellaunus ruled this Country as it appeareth by Cæsar, and in the said name of his this denomination of CASSI doth most plainly bewray it selfe; it may seeme probable enough that Cassivellaunus, was so named, as one would say, The Prince of the Cassii. And unlesse it were so, why should Dio name this Cassivellaunus, Suellan, for Vellan, and Ninnius the Britan, call him, not Cassibelinus, but Bellinus; as though that Bellinus were the proper name either of the Man, or of his Dignity? Neither let it seeme strange, that Princes in old time tooke names of their owne Nations. The Catti in Germanie had their Cattimar, the Teutons their Teutomar, and Teutobochus, the Daci their Decebalus, and the Goths their Gottiso. And what should let, but that our Cassii might have their Cassibelinus? Considering that Belinus hath bene an usual name in this Island: and some have thought, that Cunobelinus who reigned amongst the Iceni, was so called, as one would say, the Belinus of the Iceni. From this Cassivellaunus therefore, if the Greeke writers have not wrested these names Cattuellani and Cattieuchlani, &c. I confesse, that in this matter mine eye-sight fayleth mee altogether, and I see plainly nothing.

But whence this people should come to bee named CASSI, I know not, unlesse happily it were of their Martiall prowesse. For, Servius Honoratus writeth, that the ancient Gaules who spake the same language that Britans did, called called hardy and valiant men, Gessios: Whence Ninnius interpreteth Cethilon (a British word,) The seede of Warriours. Now that these excelled in Warlike prowesse it is manifest: for, before Cæsars comming, they had war-red continually with their Neighbours, they had reduced part of the DOIR-NI under their subjection; the Britans had chosen their Prince, General over all their forces in the Warre against Cæsar, and they had enlarged their Empire and name farre abroad every way; For, all those generally were knowne by the name of CASSII, or CATTIEUCHLANI who now take up three Shires or Counties, to wit, Buckingham-shire, Bedford-shire and Hertford-shire. Of whom I am now to speake in order, and that briefly, because I have not much to say of any of them.

SHIRE

BUCKINGHAM-SHIRE.

Hereas Buckingham-shire is given to bring forth Beech trees plentifully, which the English-Saxons in elder times called Bucken, it may seeme conjecturally that Buckingham the chiefe Towne, and so the whole shire tooke the name from Beech trees. For there is a Country in Germany bearing Beech trees, named Buchonia: and with us, a towne in Norfolke called Buckenham, fruitfull of Beech, as I have beene enformed: This shire carrying but a small bredth, runneth forth in length from the Tamis North-ward. On the South-side it looketh into Barke-shire, severed from it by the river Tamis: on the West, Oxford-shire; from the North it hath Northampton-shire, and from the East first Bedford-shire, then Hertford-shire, and afterward Middle-sex. The Country generally is of a rich plentifull soile, and passing full of Inhabitants, who chiefly employ themselves in graizing of cattell. It is divided into two parts, whereof the one bending into the South and East, and rising into hills, they call Chilterne, in the English-Saxon tongue Clyttern: the other lying under it North-ward is named the Vale.

Chiltern got that name according to the very nature of the soile of Chalky marle, which the ancient English men termed Cylt or Chilt. For, all of it mounteth aloft with whitish hills, standing upon a mixt earth of Clay and Chalke clad with groves and woods, wherein is much Beech, and it was altogether unpassable in times past by reason of trees, untill that Leofstane Abbot of Saint Albans did cut them downe, because they yeilded a place of refuge for theeves. In it, where the Tamis glideth at the foote of those hills with a winding course, standeth Marlow, a pretty towne of no meane credite taking name of the said Chalke commonly termed Marle: which being spred upon Corne ground eaten out of heart with long tillage, doth quicken the same againe, so as that after one yeeres rest it never lieth fallow, but yeeldeth againe unto the Husband-man his seed in plentifull measure.

Chiltern.

Marlow.

Nere unto this, a rill sheaddeth it selfe in the Tamis, making way through low places, and where it turneth hath a towne upon it called High Wickham or Wiccombe rather, which happily thereof tooke the name, considering that the German Saxons terme any winding reach of river and sea, a Wicke, and Combe a low Valle. And very many places wee meet withall in England named in that respect. This towne for largenesse and faire building is equall to the greatest townes in this shire, and in that it hath a Major for the Head-Magistrate worthily to bee preferred before the rest. About the time of the Normans comming in, Wigod of Wallensford was Lord both of the Burgh of Wicomb, and also of the Villa forinsica (I speake according to the Record of the ancient Inquisition) that is, The out Hamlet or Bery. After whose death King Henry the first laid it unto the Crowne. But King John at the length, divided the said Out Bery betweene Robert de Vipont and Alane Bassett. North off Wicomb mounteth up aloft the highest place of this Region, and thereof it retaineth still the British name Pen. For the head or eminent top of a thing is with them called Pen: and hence it is that the Pennine Alpes, the Apennine and many Mountaines among us tooke their names. Nere unto this Wickham or Wicomb is Bradenham seated in a very commodious and wholsome place, which now is become the principall habitation of the Barons of Windsor: (concerning whom I have already spoken in Barke-shire) ever since that in the memory of our fathers William Lord Windsor seated himselfe here, whose father S. Andrew descended from the old stemme of ancient Barons, King Henry the Eighth dignified with the honour of Baron Windsor.

See in Barke-shire.

Tamis having entertained the said Rill commeth downe with a rolling streame by Alton, famous for a Colledge, the nource garden (as it were) or plant plot of good letters, which that most vertuous and godly Prince K. Henry the Sixt, as I have already said, first founded. And some few miles forward the river Cole entreth into Tames, which running here betwene Buckinghamshire and Middlesex giveth name unto the towne Colbroke: which was that Pontes, whereof Antonine the Emperour maketh mention, as the distance on both sides from Wallingford and London doth witnesse: Neither is there any other place else in the way that leadeth from Wallingford to London to which the name of Pontes, that is, Bridges, might be more fully applied. For this Cole is here parted into foure channels, over which stand as many bridges for the commodity of passengers, whereof that it tooketh this name, the very signification of the word doth plainly shew. Like as Gephyra a towne in Boeotia, and another Pontes in France, where the County of Ponthieu, our Tunbridg, and others are called, of Bridges. This County of Ponthieu (to note so much by the way) descended to the Kings of England in the right of Aleanor the wife of King Edward the First, who by her mothers right was sole and entire Heire of the same. Cole by these verall partitions of his streames compasseth in certaine pleasant llands, into which the Danes fled in the yeere of our Lord 894. when Aelfred pressed hard upon them, and there by the benefit of the place defended themselves, untill the English for want of provisions were forced to breake up Siege and leave them. At this divorce and division of the waters Ewre or Ever a little Towne sheweth it selfe, which when K. Richard the First had given unto Sir Robert Fitz-Roger, Lord of Cluring, his younger sonnes of this place assumed their surname, to wit, Hugh, from whom the Barons of Ewre, and Robert from whom the Family of Ewre in Axolme is sprung and spread. Farther within Land, are these places, which I may not passe over, Burnham better knowne by the Hadenes, Lord Huntercombs, and Scudamores, who were Lords thereof and of Beacons-field successively by inheritance, than by it selfe. See Pogeis, so called of the Lords thereof in old time named de Pogeis, and from them hereditarily devolved upon the Hastings: of whose race Edward Baron Hastings Loughborough founded here an Hospital for poore people, making himselfe and their society, and his nephew by the brother Henry Earle of Huntingdon built a faire house: and Fernham, the very same, if I be not deceived, which was the Fernham Roiall: and which in times past, the Barons Furnivall held by feoffment finding their Sovereigne Lord the King upon the day of his Coronation a glove for his hand, and to support the Kings right arme the same day all the while hee holdeth the Verge or Scepter in his hand. From the Furnivalls it came by the daughter of Thomas Nevill, unto the Talbots Earles of Shrewsbury, who although by exchange they surrendered up this Manour unto King Henry the Eighth, yet they reserved this honourable Office still to them and their Heires for ever.

Colbroke.
Pontes.

This Cole carrieth downe with him another riveret also, which somewhat above from the West sheddeth it selfe into it: upon it we saw first Missenden, where stood religious House that acknowledged the D' Ollies their founders and certaine Gentlemen surnamed De Missenden their especiall benefactors upon a vow for escape from ship-wracke. And then in the Vale Amerham, in the Saxon tongue Amerham, which vaunted it selfe not for faire buildings, nor multitude of inhabitants, but their late Lord Francis Russell Earle of Bedford, who being the expresse pattern of true Piety and noblenesse lived most dearly beloved of all good men. But the principall seat of the Earles of Bedford is called Cheneis, standing more Eastward, where both John the first Earle out of this Family, and that noble Francis his sonne lye entombed together. Unto which adjoyneth on the one side Latimers, (so named of the Lords thereof, I meane those more ancient Barons Latimer) before called Ischemsted, where Sir Edwin Sands Knight, who tooke to wife the only daughter of the Baron Sands, dwelt, while he lived in a very faire house, and another Chesham Bois, where, and at Draiton Beauchamp the Family of Cheneis have lately flourished.

From hence I passed scarce three miles North-ward, but I came to the ridge of Chisourne-hills, which divideth the whole region a crosse from the South-west to North-east, passing by many villages and small townes, among which that of gitch

A note is Hamden, which gave name to an ancient and well spread Family in these parts. In the very East corner of these hills Ashridge a retiring house sometime of the kings standeth upon an ascent, where Edmund Earle of Cornwall sonne to Richard King of the Romans founded a religious house for a new Order of religious men in those daies, called * Bon Hommes by him first brought into England: Who professed the rule of S. Augustine, and were according to the manner of the Order of the Eremitans clad in skie coloured garments. From this ridge or edge of the Hills, there is a large prospect every way downe into the Vale beneath, which I said was the other part of the Shire. This almost throughout is a plaine Champion, standing likewise upon a clay-soile, stiffe, tough, and fruitfull, with pasture medowes most plentifull of grasse and fodder, feeding innumerable flockes of sheepe, whose soft and passing fine fleeces are in request even as farre as to the Turkish Nations in Asia. But it is all naked and bare of woods, unlesse it bee on the West side, where among others is Berne wood whose Forresters surnamed de Borsfall were famous in former times. About this Forrest the yeare after Christs Nativity 914. the Danes furiously raged: and then happily it was, that the ancient Burgh was destroyed, whose antiquity Romane coined peeces of money there found doe testifie, which afterwards became the royall house of King Edward the Confessour: But now it is a Country Village, and in stead of Buri-Hill, they call it short, Brill. In this Vale although it be exceeding full of Townes and Villages, yet very few of them are memorable, and those either upon the River Tame or Vsa, that is, Onse. Not far from Tame, which watereth the South part of the Vale, upon the rising of a pretty hill standeth a faire Mercat Towne well occupied, and compassed about with many most pleasant greene medowes and pastures, commonly called Ailesbury, of which, the whole Vale is termed the Vale of Ailesbury. The English Saxons called it Aegleburg, when Cuthwulf the Saxon won it in the yeare of our Lord 571. For the Brittain name, whereby it was knowne before, in continuance of time is utterly lost. Famous it hath bene in times past especially for Ediths sake there fostered, who having obtained of her Father Fremwald this Towne for her Dowry, forthwith by persuation of the religious people had the world and her husband farewell, and taking her selfe to the Vale for opinion of holinesse and devotion in that most pregnant and fruitfull age of Saints, became wonderfully renowned, even as farre as to working of miracles, together with her sister Eadburg: of whose name there is a little Towne among the Hills as yet called Eadburton. In the time of King William the Conquerour it was a Manour of the Kings: and certaine yard-lands were here given by the King, with this condition, that the Possessour or Holder thereof (make ye nice and dainty ones) should finde litter for the Kings bed when the King came thither. In the Raigne of Edward the First, certaine Gentlemen named de Ailesbury, who bare for their Armes Azure, a Crosse Argent, were by report (but I know not how truly) the Lords thereof, certaine it is, they were in those daies men of the better sort and of great good note, and such as by marriage with the daughter and heire of the Calbagnes (who were in times past Lords of Atteden Calbagnes) came to a faire and goodly inheritance, which at last by heires generall came to the Chaworths, the Staffords of Grafon, &c. But now, the greatest name and reputation that it hath is by grazing and feeding of Cattle. Very much beholden also it is unto Justice Baldwin, who not onely adorned it with publique edifices, but also made a passing faire causey to it (where the way was very deepe and cumbersome) for three miles or thereabout in length.

Heere round about in every side flockes of sheepe pasture most plenteously in mighty numbers, laden with fleeces, to the great gaine and commodity of their Masters especially at Quarendon, a Lordship belonging to Sir Henry Lee an honourable Knight of the Order of the Garter, Eythorp, which sometime was the Dishams and now the Dormers Knights, and also Winchindon appertaining to the Family of the Godwins Knights likewise, &c.

Lower wee meet with nothing memorable upon Tame, unlesse Chardesley be (as many thinke it is) the place which was called in the Saxon-tongue Cerdick-lega, of Cerdie

Cerdic the Saxon, who fought a very sharpe and bloody battaile there with the Britans. Neere unto it standeth Credendon, now Crendon, which was the Capitall house belonging to the Honour of Giffard, for so were those lands termed which fell unto Walter Giffard at the Conquest of England, whose sonne the second Earle of Buckingham and Ermingard his wife, built the Abbey of Neteley thereby in the year 1122. But his cozen Hugh de Bolebec, from whom by the females the Earles of Oxford descended, held of him no small possessions in these parts. And the ruines of Bolebec Castle are seene hard by within the Parish of Whitcheburc. Neere unto which is dean, the principall Mansion house of the Dormers from whence descended the Dukes of Feris in Spaine, and others of noble note.

Ufe or Onse, in times past Isa, and the second Isis, which with a soft and still streame passeth through the North part of this Province arising in Northampton-shire and presently from his head, when being yet but small he closely entereth into this Shire, runneth beside Birtlesden, which Robert de Maperishall Lord of the place gave unto Osbert de Clinton Chamberlaine to King Henry the First a powerfull Courtier, that he might not be punished as a Fellow for stealing away one of the Kings Hounds. But he restored it unto him againe with a cozin of his in marriage: yet lost he the same in the hot broile of the civill war under King Stephen; and Ernauld Bois by way of a benefite and courtesie received it at the hands of Robert Earle of Leicester: And in the year of Christ 1127. founded there a little Monastery for the Cisterians. Then Onse saluteth Buckingham the Shire Towne, which, as Marian saith, King Edward the * elder in the year of our Lord 915. fortified with a Rampire and Strong on both banks, against the Invasions and assaults of the Danes. Yet was it of no great name, as it may seeme, in the first age of the Normans, seeing that in the Reign of King Edward the Confessour, (as we read in William Conquerours Domesday booke) it discharged it selfe for one Hide and no more, and had but six and twenty Burgeses. But the Towne it is seated upon a low ground, but the River Onse, very commodiously Mills encircleth it about save onely on the North side. The Castle standing in the midst raised upon a hill cast up, whereof no Reliques in manner are now to be seene, divideth the Towne as it were in twaine. The greater part of the Towne lieth North, wherein standeth the Towne-house, the other toward the South lieth, wherein is the Church, and that of no great antiquity; but in it was the first S. Rumald a child, who being borne in Kings-Sutton a Village thereby was carried by our forefathers for a child-Saint, and much famed with many miracles.

From hence Onse hasteneth faire and softly into the North, and more than a mile from the River, neere unto the woods, ye have a sight of Whaddon, the habitation in times past of the Giffards, who were by Inheritance keepers of Whaddon Church, the Earle of Wiltshire: and from whom it came to the Pigots, who passed it away by sale and alienation. There standeth now a house of the warlike Family of the Barons of Wilton, who held the Manour neere adjoining named Alton, by the jealousy of keeping one Gerfalcon of their Sovereigne Lord the King. Whereupon the family of the Greys hath for their Badge or Cognisance a Falcon Seiant upon a Globe.

Not farre from hence is Thornton an habitation of the Tirelles, and Sutton, which is a faire and lovely house built by Sir John Fortescue a right honourable knight and deeply learned withall, who for his wisdom was Chanceller of the Exchequer, the Duchy of Lancaster, and of the Privie Counsell to Queene Elizabeth, who lived in Tamworth. On the other side of the River and not farre from the banks standeth a house like, Stow a house of the Family of Temple, Leckham was an habitation of the Wates, Lillinstone likewise the seat of the ancient Family De-Hair, common to Daurell, and Luffeld, where in times past was founded a Monastery by Robert of Leicester: but by reason that the Monkes were all consumed with the plague, the house was utterly left desolate. Somewhat higher on the South side of the River upon the very Bank, standeth Stony-Stratford, a Towne of all the best most improved, named so of Stones, The Street way, and a Fourd: For the houses are built of a taine rough stone which is digged forth in great abundance at Caversham hard by.

and it standeth upon the publike Street commonly called Watlingstreet, which was a Militarie high way made by the Romanes, and is evidently to be seene yet beyond the Towne with the banke or causey thereof, and hath a fould but now nothing shallow, and hardly passable. The Towne is of good bignesse, and sheweth two Churches, and in the mids a Crosse, though it be none of the fairest, erected in memoriall of Queene Isabel of Spaine, wife to Edward the First with the Armes of England, Castile and Leon, &c. also of the Earldome of Ponthieu, whereof she was heire: And where sometimes there had been a Fould, the River Onse hath a stone bridge over it, which keepeth in the River that was wont, when it swelled with winter floods, to breake out and overflow the fields with great violence. But upon the banke of the other side which riseth somewhat higher the Towne sometime stood, as the inhabitants themselves report. And there hard by, is Pasham, a place so called of passing over the River, so that it may seeme in times past to have been that passage, which King Edward the Elder kept against the Danes, while he fortified Torchester: But this passage or Ferry became quite forlet after that the Bridge was built at Stony-Stratford. Now if I should guesse that LACTORODVM, which Antonine the Emperour mentioneth stood heere; beside the situation upon the Militarie Highway of the Romanes, and the distance from other places, the signification also of the olde name LACTORODVM fetched out of the British language, maketh for me and favoureth my conjecture. Which name accordeth passing well with this new English name. For, both names in both languages were imposed of Stone, and Fould. From hence Onse runneth hard by Wolverton anciently Woluerington the seat of an ancient familie so surnamed: whose lands are named in Records, The Baronie of Woluerington, from whom it came to the house of the Longvilles of ancient descent in these parts: and by Newport Painell which took that name of Sir Fulcod Painell the Lord thereof, and was from him devolved to the Barons Someries of Dudley, who heere had their Castle. Then, by Terringham, (which gave both name and habitation to a worshipfull house and of great antiquity) it goeth to Onsley a meetly good mercate town. This farre and a little further reacheth the County of Buckingham by Yse the limit and bound thereof.

The first Earle of Buckingham, so farre as hitherto I could observe, was Walter surnamed Giffard, sonne to Osbern de Bolebec, a man of great name and reputation among the Normans: Who in a Charter of King Henrie the First is cited among the witnesses thereto by the name of Earle of Buckingham. After him followed his sonne bearing the same name, who in the booke of Abbingdon Abbay is called Earle Walter the younger, and died issuelesse in the yeere 1164. Afterward in the reign of Henry the Second, that famous Richard Strangbow Earle of Pembroke called Conquerour of Ireland, who derived his descent from the sister and heir of Walter Giffard the second, in certaine publique instruments bare this title. Then for a long time after lay this title as it were out of use and quite lost, untill that in the yeere 1377. King Richard the Second conferred this honor upon his Unkle Thomas of Woodstock, of whom I have already spoken among the Dukes of Gloucester. Of this Thomas his daughter married unto Edmund Earle of Stafford was borne Humphrey Earle of Stafford, created Duke of Buckingham, with an invidious precedence before all Dukes of England by King Henry the Sixt, in whose quarrell he spent his life, fighting most valiantly in the battaile at Northampton. After him succeeded his Grandchild Henry, by his Sonne Humphrey, who made way for King Richard the Third the usurper unto the Kingdome, and streightwaies practised to depose him: for that he would not restore unto him the inheritance of the Bobuns by hereditarie right belonging unto him: but hee being intercepted lost his head for it: and found (but all too late) that Tyrants very often hew downe the staires and steps whereby they ascended: His sonne Edward being restored againe through speciall favour of King Henry the Seventh, by the wicked slights and practises of Cardinall Wolsey fell into disgrace with King Henry the Eighth, and being condemned of high treason, for that among among other matters hee had consulted with a Wizard about succession of the Crowne, was beheaded, a noble man exceeding much missed and lamented of good men. Which when the Emperour Charles the fifth heard, he said, as (it is written in his life) That a Butchers dogge had devoured the fairest Bucke in all England: alluding to the name Buckingham, and the said Cardinall who was a Butchers sonne. Ever since which time the splendour of this most noble family hath so decayed and faded, that there remaineth to their posterity the bare title onely of Barons of Stafford, whereas they were stiled before, Dukes of Buckingham, Earles of Stafford, Hereford, Northampton, and Perce; Lords of Brecknock, Kimbalson, and Tunbridge.

BEDFORD

BEDFORDSHIRE.

BEDFORDSHIRE is one of the three Counties, which we said the Cattieuchlani inhabited: On the East-side and the South it joyneth to Cambridge-shire and Hertford-shire, on the West to Buckingham-shire, and on the North to Northampton-shire and Huntingdon-shire, and by the river Ouse crossing over it is divided into two parts. The North-side thereof is the more fruitfull of the twaine and more woody: the other toward the South, which is the greater, standeth upon a leaner soile, but not altogether unfertile. For it yeeldeth forth abundantly full, white and bigge Barley. In the mids it is somewhat thicke of woods, but Eastward more drie ground and bare of wood.

Ouse, where it entereth into this shire, first visiteth Turvey the Lord Mordants house, who are beholden to King Henry the Eighth for their Barony: For he created John Mordant a wife and prudent man, who had wedded the daughter and one of the coheires of H. Vere of Addington, Baron Mordant; then runneth it by Harwood a Village, in old time called Hareleswood, where Sampson, surnamed Fortis founded a Nunnery, and where in the yeere of our redemption 1399. a little before those troubles and civill broiles wherewith England a long time was rent in peeces, this river stood still, and by reason that the waters gave backe on both sides, men might passe on foote within the very chanell for three miles together, not without wondering of all that saw it, who tooke it as a plaine presage of the division ensuing. Afterward it passeth by Odill or Woodhilk, sometimes Wahull, which had his Lords surnamed also De Wahul, men of ancient Nobility (whose Barony consisted of thirty knights fees in divers countries) and had here their Castle, which is now hereditarily descended to Sir R. Chetwood knight, as the inheritance of the Chetwoods came formerly to the Wahuls. From hence Ouse no lesse full of crooked cranks and windings, than Meander it selfe, goeth by Bletneshe, commonly called Blets, the residence in times past of the Pateshills, after of the Beauchamps, and now of the Honourable family of S. John, which long since by their valour attained unto very large and goodly possessions in Glamorgan-shire, and in our daies through the favor of Q. Elizabeth of happy memory unto the dignity of Barons; when she created Sir Oliver the second Baron of her creation, Lord S. John of Bletneshe unto whom it came by Margaret Beauchamp an inheritrice wedded first to Sir Oliver S. John, from whose these Barons derive their pedigree, and secondly to John Duke of Somerset, unto whom she bare the Lady Margaret Countesse of Richmond, a Lady most vertuous and alwaies to be remembered with praises; from whose loines the late Kings and Queenes of England are descended.

From hence Ouse hastneth by Brumham a seat of the Dives of very ancient parentage in these parts to Bedford, in the Saxon-tongue Beacanfora, the principall towne, and whereof the Shire also taketh name; and cutteth it so through the midst, that it might seeme to be two severall townes, but that a stone bridge joyneth them together. A towne to be commended more for the pleasant situation and ancience thereof, then for beauty or largenesse, although a man may tell five Churches in it. That it was Antonines LACTODORUM, I dare not as others doe, affirme: considering that it standeth not upon the Romans Military road way, which is the most certaine mark to finde out the station and Mansions mentioned by Antonine; neither are there heere any peeces of Romane money ever digged up, as far as I can learne. I have read that in the British tongue it was named Lisfidur or Lettidur; but it may seeme to have been translated so out of the English name. For Lettur in the British language signifieth Common Innes, and so Lettidur, Innes upon a river: like Bedford in English, Beds or Innes at a fowd. Cushwulf the Saxon, about the yeere of our salvation, 572. beneath this towne so vanquished the Britans in an open pitch field that then presently upon it, finding themselves over-matched, yeelded up many townes into his hands. Neither should it seeme that the Saxons neglected it: In Offa the most puissant King of the Mercians choose heere (as we read in Florus) for himselfe a place of sepulture; whose tombe the river Ouse swelling upon it, and carrying a more violent and swifter streame than ordinary in a flood, cleane away. Afterwards also when it was rased downe and lay along by the side of the Danish depredations, * K. Edward the Elder repaired it, and laid upon the South-side of the river a pretty townlet, which in that age, as we find in the py of Hevedon, was called Mikegat. In the time of King Edward the Conqueror, we read in that booke which King William the Conqueror caused to be written when he tooke the survey of England, It defended it selfe for halfe an Hundred years, expeditions, and shipping. The land belonging to this towne was never bided. After that suffered far more grievous calamities under the Normans: For when * Paine de Beauchamp the third Baron of Bedford had built heere a Castle, there arose not any thing of civill war but it thundred upon it so long as it stood. Stephen, when with his oath he intercepted to himselfe the Kingdome of England, first forced the Castle, and with very great slaughter of men won it: afterwards when the Barons taken armes against King Iohn, William de Beauchamp Lord thereof, and one of the chieftaines of their side, surrendered it unto their hands: But a yeere or two after, John de Breant laid siege thereto, and forthwith the Barons yeelded, and the King bestowed it upon him. Yet the unthankfull man raised up a world of warres upon King Henry the third: He pulled downe Churches to strengthen his Castle, and exceedingly damnified the territory adjoining, untill the King besieged it, when after thre score daies he had quelled the stubborn stomackes of these and brought this nest and nourfe of sedition into his owne hands.

It will not be, I hope, distastfull to the reader, if I set downe heere the manner assaunting this Castle out of a writer who then lived, and saw it: to the end we may understand with what devises and engines that age (as wittie well knowne to worke men mischief) used in their sieges of Townes. On the East (saith hee) there was planted one Petrarie and two Mangonells which daily battered the Towre, and on the West-side two Mangonells which battered the old Towre: upon the Mangonell on the South part; and another on the North, which made two briddall enuries in the next walles. Besides these there were two frames or engines of Timber, Carpenters, erected higher above the toppe of the Towre and Castle for shooting, and for discoverers. There were moreover there many frames wherein shotters of pikes and stingers were set in await: furthermore there was a frame or engine there, called Cat, under which the Pioners and underminers had their ingresse and egress, which they digged under the Walles of Towre and Castle. Now, was this Castle taken by force. In the first was the Barbican wonne: in the second, the out Ballic. At the third the Wall downe were the olde Towre by the meanes of the Miners, where, by the chinke or breach with great daunger they became possessed of the inner Ballic: and fourth, the Miners put fire under the Towre, so that the smoke brake forth, and the towre rent asunder, in so much as the cliffs and breaches appeared wide: and then the Miners yeelded themselves. Of these Mangonells, Petraries, Trabucks, Bricks, Engines, and of that which our ancestors termed the Wormes, by which before that they were devised, they discharged volies of mighty huge stones, with great noise, and so brake through strong walles, much might heere be said, were they not side my purpose. But my author proceedeth thus: Salvo remained Edmund *until hee restored unto the King the Castle of Plumpton and Stok-curey, which he had taken, and silver both and such money as that he had: and from thence was led to London, while the Sheriffe had commandement to demolish and rase the Towre and out Ballic for the inward Ballic: when the Bulwarks were cast downe, and both French and English laid levell with the ground, it remained unto William Beauchamp for to dwell in: which were granted unto the Chanons of Newenham and Chaldwell, and of Saint Pauls Church.*

Bedford. Neither yet for all this is there any thing here more worth the seeing, than the remaines of this Castle on the East side of the towne, hanging over the river.

On both sides of Bedford stood two prety and very faire religious houses, Helens now Eustow on the South part, consecrated by Judith wife to Waltheof Earle of Huntingdon unto Helena Great Constantines Mother, and to sacred Virgins: on the East, Newenham, which Rois the wife of * Paine de Beauchamp translated thither from Saint Pauls within Bedford.

Ouse is not gone farre from hence, but he seeth the tokens of a decayed Castle at Eaton, which was another seate of the family de Beauchamp, and bids Bedford-shire farewell hard by Bissemes, where Hugh de Beauchamp, and Roger his brother founded a little Monastery for the Chanons of Saint Austins order, as appeareth by the Popes Bull. These stand on the farther side of Ouse which yet before from the South is augmented with a namelesse * brooke, at whose confluents is to be seene Temsford, well knowne by reason of the Danes standing Campe, and the Castle there, which they then built, when they wintering in Campe, lay fore upon this Country, and threw downe the Britans Fort (as it is thought) The place whereof, now called Chesterfield and Sandie, sheweth oftentimes peeces of Romane coyne, as expresse tokens of the antiquity thereof: Neither doe some doubt by the very situation, but that this was that Salenæ, which Plolomee ascribeth to the Cattieuchlani, if Salndy be the name, as divers have avouched unto me. Heere I overpasse Potton a little mercat towne, because I finde nothing of it, but that John Kinaaston gave it and the Lands adjoining freely unto Thomas Earle of Lancaster. Neither have I reason to make many words of such places as be situate upon this Brooke, to wit, Chickland, where Paine de Beauchamp built a little Monastery. Shelford a mercae, Wardon more inward where was a house of Cisterian monkes, and was mother to the Abbaies of Saultery, Sibton and Tithby, Biglesward much spoken of and frequented for the horse Fayre there, and the stone bridge. From whence Stratton is not farre, the mansion place in times past of the Barons Latimer, afterward of the Enderbeites, and from them hereditarily untill our time of the Pigotts.

Five miles from the head of this brooke in the very heart and middest well neere of the shire, standeth Amphill upon an hill, a parcell of the Barony of Kainbo heere tofore and lately a stately house, resembling a castle, and environed with Parks, built by Sir John Carmale Baron Fanhop, in the reigne of Henry the Sixth with the spoyle wonne from the French; whose goods, as I have read, when Edward the Fourth had confiscated for taking part with the Familie of Lancaster, and indited him, or this house rather, as Fanhop himselfe saith, of high treason; forthwith it was granted unto Edmund Grey Lord of Rushin, and afterwards Earle of Kent: whose grandchild Richard passed both it and Rushin over to King Henry the Seventh, and he annexed the same unto the Kings Sacred Patrimony, as the Civilians terme it, or as our Lawyers use to say, unto the Crowne, and shortly after with the Lands appertaining it was made the Honour of Amphill. From hence more Northward lieth Haughton Conquest, so called of a worshipfull and ancient family, which a long time dwelt therein: Westward is Woburn: where now is a free schoole founded by Francis Earle of Bedford: and where sometime flourished a notable monastery built by Henry de Belesie for Cisterians, who himselfe entred into this order: Under which, at Aspley Gwize, there is a kinde of earth, men say, that turneth wood into stones: and for prooffe and testimony thereof, I have heard say, there was a wooden ladder to be seene in that monastery, that having lien a good while covered all over in that earth, was digged forth againe all stone. More into the East, Tuddington sheweth a faire house, goodly to be seene, which Sir Henry Cheiney made by Queene Elizabeth Baron Cheyne of Tuddington built, and shortly after died Sans-issue, where also in old time Paulin Pever a Courtier, and Sewer to King Henry the Third (as Matthew Paris witnesseth) built a strong house with the hall, chapel, chambers, and other houses of stone, and the same covered with lead, with Orchards also and Parkes to it, in such sort, as it caused the beholders to wonder thereat.

We were not gone forward farre from hence but we came to Hockley in the Field, so named of the miry way in Winter time, very troublesome to Travellers: For the old Englishmen our Progenitors called deepe myre hock, and hocks. So passing along fields smelling sweet in Sommer of the best Beanes, which with their redolent favour doe dull the quicke sent of Hounds and Spaniels not without fuming and chafing of Hunters; we mounted up by a whitish chalkey hill into the Chilten, and streightwaies were at Dunstable.

Dunstable.

This Towne seated in a chalkey ground, well inhabited, and full of Innes, hath four Streets answering to the foure quarters of the world: in every one of which (withstanding the Soile bee most dry by nature) there is a large Pond of standing water, for the publique use of the Inhabitants. And albeit they bee fed only by raine water, yet they never faile nor become dry. As for spring-veines there are none to bee found, unlesse they sinke Wells or pits foure and twenty Cubits deepe. In the midst of the Towne is a Crosse or Column rather to be seene with the Armes of England, Castle and Ponthieu engraven thereon, adorned also with Statues and Images, which King Edward the First erected as he did some others in memoriall of Eleonor his Wife all the way as hee conveyed her Corps out of Lincolnshire with funerall pompe to Westminster. That this Dunstable was the very same Station which the Emperour Antonine in his Itinerary calleth MAGIONINIUM, MAGIOVINIUM and MAGINTUM no man needs to make doubt, or to seek it self where. For, besides that it is situate upon the Romanes high way, there are peeces of the Roman Emperours monies found otherwhiles in the fields adjoyning round about by the Swine-heards, which as yet they terme, Madding money: and within a litle of the very descent of the Chiltern hills there is a military modell raised round with a Rampire and Ditch, such as Strabo writeth the Britans Townes were, containing nine Acres of ground, which the people use to call Madding-burial Madin-bour: in which very name with a litle change MAGINTUM most plainly sheweth it selfe. But when the said MAGINTUM, by the injury of warre or time was decayed, King Henry the First heere reedified a Towne, built a royall house Kings-bury, and planted a Colony to repress the boldnesse of Theeves that here befer the wayes and lay in wait, as the private History of the Priory, that himselfe founded for the ornament of this his Colony, doth evidently beare witness. He heare the very words out of that private History, although they favour of the Barbarisme of that age. Note that the plot of ground where the two high waies Watling and Ikening meet, was first by Henry the elder King of England* cleared, to keepe under and bridle the wickednesse of a certaine most notorious Theefe named Dun, and his Complices, and of that Dun the said place was named Dunstable. The King our Lord built there the Burgh of Dunstable, and made for himselfe a royall Manour, or house where under that place. The King had in the same Towne both Faire and Mercat. Afterwards, hee founded Church, and by authority of Pope Eugenius the Third, placed therein Regular Chanons: and bestowed the said Religious Chanons in the whole Burgh by his Charter, and bestowed upon them very many liberties.

As for Leighton Buzard on the one side of Dunstable, and Luton on the other, neither have I reade, nor scene any thing memorable in them, unlesse I should say that at Luton I saw a faire Church, but the Quieter then Rooselesse, and overgromed with Weedes; and adjoyning to it an elegant Chappell founded by 1. Lord Wullocke, and well maintained by the Family of Rotherham planted heere by Thomas Rotherham Archbishop of York, and Chancellour of England in the time of King Edward the Fourth.

As touching the Lords, Dukes, and Earles of Bedford. First, there were Barons of Bedford out of the Family of Beauchamp: who by right of inheritance were Almanners to the Kings of England upon their Coronation day. Whose inheritance being by females parted among the Mowbraies, Wakes, Fitz-Ottes, &c. King Edward the Third created Engelram de Concy Earle of Suefons in France, sonne to Engelram Lord of Concy, and his Wife daughter to the Duke of Austria, the first Earle of Bedford.

Afterwards King Henrie the Fifth advanced Bedford to the title of a Dukedome: and it had three Dukes: the first was John, the third sonne of King Henrie the Fourth, who most valiantly vanquished the French men in a Sea-fight at the mouth of * Seyne, and afterwards (being Regent of France) slaine in a battaile on land, before Vernoil, who was buried in Roan, and together with him all the Englishmens good fortune in France. At which time he was Regent of France, Duke of Bedford, Alaunson and Anjou, Earle of Maine, Richmond and Kendall, and Constable of England. For so was his stile. Whose Monument when Charles the Eighth King of France came to see, and a Noble man standing by advised him to raise it, Nay answered he, les him rest in peace now being dead, of whom in war while he lived all France had dread. The second Duke of Bedford was George Nevill a very child, sonne to John Marquesse Mont-acute, both whom King Edward the Fourth so soone as hee had raised them to that type of Honours, threw downe againe, and that by authoritie of the Parliament; the Father, for his perfidious disloyaltie in revolting from him; the Sonne, in dislike of his Father: Howbeit there was a colourable pretense made, that his estate was too weake for to maintaine the port and dignity of a Duke: and because great men of high place if they be not wealthy withall, are alwaies grievous and injurious. The third was Jasper of Hatfield, Earle of Pembroch, Honoured with that title by his Nephew King Henrie the Seventh, for that hee was both his Uncle, and had delivered him out of extreame dangers: who being aged and a Bachelor, departed this life, some ten yeeres after his Creation.

But within the remembrance of our Fathers it fell backe againe to the title of an Earledome: what time as King Edward the Sixth created John Lord Russell Earle of Bedford: after whom succeeded his Sonne Francis, a man so religious and of such a noble courteous nature, that I can never speake ought so highly in his commendation, but his vertue will far surpasse the same. He left to succeed him Edward his Nephew by his Sonne Sir Francis Russell, who was slaine a day or two before his Father departed this life by Scottishmen in a tumult upon a Truce-day in the middle marches. 1585.

HERTFORD-SHIRE.

HERTFORD-SHIRE, which I said was the third of those that belonged to the Catticuchlani, lieth on the East and partly on the South side of Bedford-shire: The West side is enclosed with Bedford-shire and Buckingham-shire: The South with Middlesex, the East with Essex, and the North with Cambridge-shire. A rich country in corne fields, pastures, meadows, woods, groves, and cleere riverets. And for ancient townes it may contend with the neighbours even for the best: For, there is scarcely another shire in all England that can shew more places of Antiquities in so small a compasse.

In the very limie thereof Northward, where it boundeth upon Cambridge-shire, standeth Roiston, a towne well knowne, but of no antiquity: as being risen since the Normans daies. For one Dame Rqise, a woman in that age of right great name, *whom some thinke to have been Countesse of Norfolk, erected there about a Crosse in the high way, (which was thought in that age a pious worke to put passengers in minde of Christs passion) whereupon this place was for many yeeres called Crosse-Crosse: untill that Eustach de Marc adjoined thereto a little Monastery in the honour of Thomas of Canterbury: for then, were Innes built, and by little and little it grew to be a towne, which in stead of Roises Crosse was called Roiston, that is, Roises towne: unto which King Richard the First granted a Faire at certaine set times and a mercat; Now, it is very famous and passing much frequented for Malt: For, it is almost incredible, how many buyers and sellers of corne, how many Badgers, yea and Corne-mongers or Regraters flocke hither weekly every mercat day, and what a number of horses laden doe then fill the high waies on every side.

Over Roiston Southward is mounted Tharfield among the high hills, an ancient habitation of the familie of Berners, descended from Hugh de Berners, unto whom in recompence of his valiant service in the Normans Conquest, King William the Conquerour granted faire lands in Eversdon within the County of Cambridge. And in so great worship and reputation flourished his posterity, that Sir John Bourchier, who married the right heire at common law of that familie, being promoted by King Edward the Fourth to the honour of Baron, rooke his addition thereof, and was stiled Baron Bourchier of Berners, and usually Lord Berners.

Upon this confineth Nucelles, belonging in times past to the house of the Rocheffers or Roffes: but all the repute and glory that it hath arose from the inhabitants thereof afterwards, namely the Barons of Scales descended out of Norfolk, but yet the heires of Roffe. For King Edward the First gave unto Sir Robert de Scales in regard of his valourous service in the Scottish warres, certaine lands to the value in those daies of three hundred markes by the yeare, and called him among the Barons to the Parliament. Their Eschocheon Gules with sixe escallops argent is seene in many places: They flourished unto King Edward the Fourth his daies, at what time the only daughter and heire of this family was wedded unto Sir Anthony Wodeville Earle Rivers, whom being advanced by his owne glorious prowesse and the kings marriage with his sister, the malicious hatred and envie of his enemies most villanouslie overwrought, and brought to utter destruction. For, King Richard the Third beheaded him, innocent man as he was. And, when as she died without issue, the inheritance was parted in King Henry the Seventh's time betwene John Earle of Oxford, who by the Howards, and Sir William Tindale knight, who by the Bigods of Felbridge, were found next cousens and coheires. The Manour of Barkway hereby appertained also to those Lords Scales, a well knowne throughfare. Beyond which is Barley that imparted surname to the ancient, and well allied family of the Barleies, and on this side Anestie, which was not long since the inheritance of the house of Ashwell.

To returne, though disorderly, East-ward is Ashwell, as one would say, The well & fountaine among the Ashes: a Country towne of good bignesse and full of houses, situate on a low ground in the very North edge of the shire; where there is a source of springs bubbling out of a stony banke overshadowed on every side with tall ashes, from whence there floweth at certaine veines continually running such store of water, that forthwith being gathered within banks it carrieth a streame able to drive a Mill and all of a sudden, as it were, groweth to a good big river. Of these wells and ashes together, as most certaine it is that the English-Saxons imposed this new name Ashwell: so I have been sometime of this opinion, that the ancient Britans, who, as Gildas witnesseth, heaped divine honours upon hills, rivers, fountains, and groves, from the very fame thing and in the same sense called it Magiorinum, and that it was the same which Antonine named MAGIONINVM. But time hath now discovered a more certaine truth, neither am I ashamed to change mine opinion in this point, seeing I take no pleasure at all in mine owne error. And yet to prove the ancientness of this towne, the large quadrant adjoining, enclosed with a trench and rampire maketh much, which by the Romane peeces of coyne digged up there oftentimes, sheweth whose worke it was, and in that * booke, wherein above 500. yeeres since King William the Conquerour tooke the review and account of all the townes in England, it is in plaine words tearmed a Burgh.

* Domesday.

Southward we saw Merkat-Baldock, situate upon a whitish soile, wherein as John Hitting hard by, we read of no antiquity. Then is there seated in a well-husbanded and good ground Wimandley an ancient and famous Lordship, held by the most honourable tenure with us, which our Lawyers terme Grand-Sergeanty: namely, the Lord thereof should serve unto the Kings of England upon their Coronation, the first cup, and be as it were the Kings Cup-bearer. Which honorable office in regard of this Lordship, certaine Noble Gentlemen called * Fitz-Tek held in the beginning of the Normans reigne; from whom by a daughter it came unto the Argentons. These fetched their name and pedigree from David de Argenton a Norman and a martiall knight, who under King William the Conquerour served in the wars, and they in remembrance heereof gave for their armes Three Cups Argent with Red Gules. But at last, for want of issue male in King Henry the Sixth his daies, Elizabeth Argenton the sole and entier inheritrice, brought it unto her husband William Allington knight, with faire lands thereby and this dignity, from whom Sir John Allington now the heire of this family is the seventh, a young Gentleman right courteous and of a generous nature, who I hope will give some new lustre by his vertues unto the ancient worship of his house.

Hard by and neere unto the roade high-way, betweene Stevenhamb and Northampton the seat of the worshipfull house of the Littons descended from Liton in Devonshire, I saw certaine round hills east up and raised by mans hands, such as the Normans were wont to reare for Souldiers slaine in the wars, of which the Captaine himselfe laied the first turfe. Unless some man would rather say they had a reference to the bounds: For such like little hills in old time were reared to signify the bounds of lands, under which they used to lay ashes, coales, lime, bricke, and the like beaten to powder, &c. as I will shew else-where more at large.

In the County of Northampton.

Beneath this, more Southward, the river Lea, by our forefathers named Fam, bath his head: who with a milde course passeth down, first, by Whetbamsted a town plentifull in wheate, whereof it tooke name; which place, John of Whetbamsted then borne and thereof named, a man in King Henry the Sixth his daies much renowned by his due desert of learning, made of more estimation. From thence running by Brocket Hall, the residence in late time of the Brockers Knights, approacheth neere unto Bishops Hatfield situate upon the fall and hanging of a little hill: in the upper part whereof whereof stood a house of the Kings, now the Earle of Salisbury, in times past belonging to the Bishops of Ely, whereupon it was named Bishops Hatfield, which John Marston Bishop of Ely reedified. For in this place King Edgar gave unto the Church of Ely forty hides of land. Afterwards it passeth under Heriford, which in some Copies of Bede is named Herudford, where he treateth of the Synode there holden in the year of our Salvation 670. which name some interpret: The red Ford, others, The Ford of Harts. This Towne in William the Conquerours time, discharged it selfe for ten hides and in it were 26. Burgeses, and at that time Ralph Limsey a Noble man buile heere a Cell for Saint Albans Monkes. But now it is neither greatly inhabited nor much frequented: and in this respect most of all commended, because it is ancient. For why? it hath given name to the whole County, and is reputed the Shire-towne. A Castle it hath upon the River Lea, built, as men thinke, by King Edward the elder, and enlarged first by the house of Clare, whereunto it belonged. For Gislebert of Clare about King Henry the Second his dayes, was accounted Earle of this Heriford, and Robert Fitz-walter, of the same house of Clare, what time as Stephen seized into his hands all the Castles of England wheresoever, avouched frankly even to Stephen his face, as we read in Mathew of Paris, that the keeping of this Castle by ancient right appertained to himselfe. Afterwards it was laid unto the Crowne: and King Edward the Third granted unto John of Gaunt his sonne, then Earle of Richmond, who afterward was Duke of Lancaster, this Castle with the Towne and honour of Heriford: where (as the very words runne in the Graunt) hee might according to his estate keepe house and decently make his abode.

Bishops Hatfield.

From hence Lea falleth downe forthwith to Ware, so named of a barre or dam made to stay water streames, which our Ancestours called a Weare or Ware. This Towne, even at the very first did much harme unto Heriford, and afterwards by reason it became so greatly hanted, darkened, as it were, the light thereof.

For, when the Barons warre against King John was waxed hote, this Ware presuming much upon their Lord the Baron Wake, turned London high way to it, whereas before it was but a little Village, and knowne by a Friery which hee founded: neither was it lawfull to passe that way with any Carts, considering that the Bridge was chained up, the Keyes whereof were in the custody of the Bailiffe of Heriford. Neere about which time Gilbert Mareſcall Earle of Pembroch a principall and most potent Peere of the Realme, proclaimed heere a disport of running on horsebacke with launces, which they call Tourneaments, under the name of Fortunie, making a scoone of the Kings Authority, whereby such Tourneaments were inhibited. To which place when a great number of the Nobility and Gentry were assembled, it fortuned that himselfe as hee ranne at tilt, by occasion that his slinging horse brake bridle and cast him, was trampled under foote and so pittifully dyed. These Jests or Tourneaments were certaine publique exercises of Armes and more than flourishes, practised among noble Gentlemen, and instituted (if wee beleve Munster) in the year of our Lord 934. having also speciall lawes thereto belonging, which you may finde in the said Munster: and the same exercises were used a long time in such an outrageous manner, and with such slaughter of Gentlemen in all places, but in England most of all, since that King Stephen brought them in, that by divers Decrees of the Church they were forbidden, upon paine that whosoever therein were slaine should want Christian Buriall in Church or Churchyard; and heere with us King Henry the Third by advise of his Sages made an Act of Parliament, that their heires who transgressed in this kinde, should be disinherited. Howbeit, contrary to the said law so good and wholesome, this naughty and wicked custom was practised a great while, and grew not quite out of use before the happy dayes of King Edward the Third.

Tourneaments.

Betwixt these two Townes, Heriford and Ware, distant scarce two miles a sunder, Lea is encreased by two rilles from the North: Afferius termeth them Mimeram and Benefician. I would guesse that to bee Benefician upon which standeth Benington, where the notable family of Benited had in old time a little Castle: and also Woodhall.

Woo & hall.

* hall an habitation of the Butlers, who being branched from Sir Ralph Butler Baron of Wem in Shropshire, and his wife heire to William Pantuliffe Lord of Wem, were Lords of Pulre-bach, and enriched much by an heire of Sir Richard Gobion, and another of Peletot Lord of this place, in the time of King Edward the Third. I take Mimra to bee the other brooke whereupon Pukerich is seated, which by the grant of King Edward the First, at the mediation of William le Blond had a Mercate and Faire granted to it. Whereupon also neighboureth Standon with a seemely house built by Sir Ralph Sadleir Chauncellour of the Dutchy of Lancaster, Privie Counsellour to three Princes, and the last Knight Baneret of England: a man so advanced for his great services, and staied wisedome.

At the backe of Pukerich, Munden Furnivall sheweth it selfe, a place to be remembered if it were but for this, that Geffrey Earle of Britaine gave it to Gerard le Furnivall (of whom also it bare the name) a younger sonne of Furnivall of Shalfeld. But now let us returne to the River Lea and the Towne of Ware, unto which the Danes being come with their light Pinnaces, and Shallops raised a Fort, as the said Affricus reporteth, which when King Alfred could not winne by force, hee by digging three severall Channells, turned aside the water of Lea, that they might not returne with their Vessels; So as ever since it stood the neighbour Inhabitantes in small or no stead; untill being brought of late unto his ancient Chanell, it is become more commodious for the carriages of all commodities, &c. Lea is now gone forward farre from Ware, when he entertaineth a Riveret named Stort from the East, which first runneth downe out of Essex by Bishops Stortford, a small Towne sometime with a little Castle set upon a mount cast up of purpose, within a pretty Island: which Castle King William the Conquerour gave unto the Bishops of London: and of those Bishops it came to be so called; but King John for hatred to Bishop William overthrew it. From thence it maketh his way by Sabridgeworth a pould the Honor of Earle William Mandevile, and sometime the possession of Geffrey, neere Shingle-hall honested by the Owners, the Leventhorpes of ancient Gentry. So on, not farre from Hunsdon forfeited by Sir William Oldball to the Crowne in the time of King Henry the Sixth, which gave a Title of Baron Hunsdon to Sir Henry Cary, through the favour of Queene Elizabeth, unto whom he was Lord Chamberlaine, as who verily, besides his descent from the royall family of the Dukes of Somerset was by his mother Mary Bolen cozen german to the said Queene. Lea having thus submitted into him this Riveret, hasteneth now with a merry glee to the Tamie, under Hodesdon a faire through Faire, to which H. Bourchier Earle of Essex having a faire house at Base thereby (while it stood) procured a Mercat: and then as it were regulatory wise saluteth Theobalds, commonly called Tibaulds, which our Nestor of Britaine, the right honourable Baron Burghley, late Lord high Treasurer of England built: an house if we respect the workmanship none more faire and elegant; if the gardens, Orchards, and walkes bedight with Groves, none more pleasant: unto whom especially this River willingly acknowledgeth it selfe beholden for the recovery againe of his ancient Chanell.

But returne we now to places more within the Country, and of greater antiquity. From Hertford twelve miles Westward, stood VEROLAMUM, a City in times past very much renowned, and as greatly frequented: Tacitus calleth it VERULAMUM, Ptoleme, VEROLANUM and VEROLAMUM, well knowne this in these dayes, neere unto Saint Albans in Calisto Hundred, which the Cassii of whom Cesar maketh mention, in all probability, held and inhabited.

The Saxons named it Wadlinga-certer, of the famous High-way Wallingford, and also Weplam-ceay-ter. Neither hath it as yet lost that ancient name, for commonly they call it Verulam, although there remaineth nothing of it to be seen, beside the few remains of ruined walles, the checkered pavements, and peeces of Roman Coine other whiles digged up there. It was situate upon the gentle declivity side of an hill Eastward, fenced about with passing strong wals, a double Rampire and deepe Trenches toward the South: and Eastward watered with a Brooke, which in old time made a great Meere, or standing Poole. Whereby it was guessed that this was the very same towne of Cassibelaunus fortified with woods and marishes, which Cesar wan: For there was not to be seene any other Poole or Meere in this Tract, to my knowledge. In Nero his time it was counted a MUNICIPIMUM: whence it is that in Plinius his Catalogue of Cities, it is named Caer-Municip. So that probable it is, that this was the very same CAER MUNICIPIUM, which Hubert Golizius found in an old Inscription. These Municipia were Townes endowed with the right of Romane Citizens, and this name came A Muneribus capiendis, that is, of publique Offices and charges in the Common-wealth: and they had for their States and De-grees, Decurians, that is, Gentlemen, and Commons: for their publique Councell, a Senate and People: For their Magistrates and Priests, Duum-viri, Trium-viri to sit in judgement and minister justice, CENSORS, AEDILES, Quaestors and Flamins. But whether this Municipium or towne enfranchised were with suffrages or without, a man cannot easily affirme. A Municip with suffrages they termed that which was capable of honourable Offices: like as that other they called without suffrage, which was not capable. In the Raigne of the same Nero, when Boudicca or Boadicia Queene of the Scenes in her deepe love of her Country, and conceived bitter hatred against the Romans, raised bloody and mortall Warre upon them, it was rased and destroyed by the Britans, as Tacitus recordeth. Hence it is that Suetonius wrote thus: Totius mischiebes so great proceeding from the Prince, there happened (to mend the matter) a grievous losse in Britaine, wherein two principall Townes of great importance, with much slaughter of Romane Citizens and Allies, were put to the sacke and spoiled. Nevertheless it flourished againe and became exceeding famous and passing well frequented: yea and I have seene old Antiquities of money stamped, as it seemeth heere, with this inscription, TAS CIA, and on the reverse VER. Which that learned searcher of venerable antiquity David Powell, Doctor in Divinity, interpreteth to be The Tribute of Verulamium. For Tase, as he teacheth me in the British or Welsh tongue sounderth as much as Tribute, Tascia, A Tribute Penny, and Tascyd the chiefe Collector of Tribute. But loe heere is the very peece of money portraied for you to see, which heerefore also I have exhibited.

Some would have this money to bee coined before the comming in of the Romans: but I beleve them not. For I have alwaies thought them to bee Tribute money, which being imposed upon the poll and the lands were yeerely exacted and gathered by the Romans, as I have said before. For before that the Romans came, I can scarce beleve the Britans coined or stamped any money. Yet I remember what Cesar writeth of them: And they use, saith he, brasse money or rings of iron weighed to a certaine poise. Where the ancient bookes have Lanceis Ferreis, for which the Criticks put in Laminis Ferreis, that is, plates of iron. But let my pen returne againe to the matter proposed, for my meaning is not heere to weave the same web still. As for Verulam, it was famous for nothing so much as for bringing forth Alban a Citizen of singular holinesse and faith in Christ, who when Dioclesian went about by exquisite torments to wipe Christian Religion quite out of the memory of men, was the first in Britaine that with invincible constancy and resolution suffered death for Christ his sake. Whereupon hee is called our Stephen, and the * Protomartyr of Britaine, yea and Fortunatus Presbyter the Poet wrote thus of him,

Albannus

Albanum egregium secunda Britannia profert.

Fruitfull Britaine bringeth forth

Alban a Martyr of mickle worth.

And Hiericus a Frenchman, who flourished 700. yeeres agoe, of the same Alban and his executioner miraculously stricken blinde, made these verses,

Milia pœnarum Christi pro nomine passus,

Quem tandem rapuit capitis sententia cæsi,

Sed non letiori cessit res tunc superbo,

Usque caput Sancto, ceciderunt lumina seruo.

Thousands of torments when he had endur'd for Christ his sake

At length he dyed by dome thus given. [his head away to take]

The Tortor proudly did the feat, but cleere he went not quite,

That holy Martyr lost his head, this cruell wretch his sight.

In reproch of this Martyr and for the terrour of Christians as wee finde in an old
* Agon of his, the Citizens of Verulam engraved his Martyrdome in a Marble stone, and inserted the same in their walles. But afterwards when the blood of Martyrs conquered Tyrants cruelty, the Christians built a Church, as Bede saith, of workmanship in memoriall of him : and Verulam carried with it so great an opinion of Religion, that therein was holden a Synode or Council in the yeere of the worlds Redemption 429. when as the Pelagian Heresie, by means of Agricola Towne to the Bishop Severianus had budded forth a fresh into this Island, and polluted the English Churches so, as that to averre and maintaine the truth they sent for German Bishop of Auxerre, and Lupus Bishop of Troies out of France: who by refuting this heresie gained unto themselves a reverend account among the Britans: but chieflie German who hath thoroughout this Island many Churches dedicated to his memory. And now unto the ruined wals of this rased city, there remaineth yet a Chappell bearing Saint mans name still, although it be put to a prophane use: in which place he openly the Pulpit preached Gods word, as the ancient records of S. Albans church doth shew.

Which German (as Constantinus flourishing in that time writeth in his life) commanded the Sepulchre of Saint Albane to be opened : and therein bestowed, various Reliques of Saints, that whom one heaven had received, should also in one Sepulchre be gather lodged. Thus much I note by the way, that yee may observe and consider fashions of that age. Not long after, the English Saxons wonne it : but Uther the Britan, firnamed for his serpentine wisedom, Pendragon, by a sore siege and along recovered it. After whose death, it fell againe into their hands. For, we may easily gather out of Gildas words, that the Saxons in his daies were possessed of this City.
God, saith hee, hath lighted unto us the most cleere Lamps of holy Saints, the Sepulchres whose bodies, and places of their Martyrdome, at this day (were they not taken away) the woefull disfigurement which the barbarous enemy hath wrought amongst us, for our many grievous sinnes) might kindle no small heat of divine charity in the mindes of the beholders.
Saint Albane of Verulam, I meane, &c. When Verulam by these warres was utterly decaied, Offa the most mighty King of the Mercians built just over against it about the yeere of our Lord 795, in a place which they called Holmeburie, a very goodly and large Monastery in memory of Saint Alban, or as wee read in the very Charter thereof, Unto our Lord Iesus Christ, and S. Alban Martyr, whose Reliques Gods grace hath revealed in hope of present prosperity, and future happinesse : and forthwith with the Monastery there rose a Towne, which of him they call Saint Albans. This King Offa and the succeeding Kings of England, assigned unto it very faire and large possessions, and obtained for it at the hands of the Bishops of Rome as ample privileges, which I will relate out of our Florilegium, that yee may see the profuse liberality of Princes toward the Church. Thus therefore writeth he. Offa the most puissant King gave unto Saint Alban the Protomartyr, that Towne of his ancient Demesne which standeth almost twenty miles from Verulam and is named * Uineflaw, with as much round about, as the Kings written Deedes at this day doe witness, that are to be seen in the for-said Monastery : which Monastery is privileged with so great liberty, that it daunteth quite from paying that Apostolicall custome and rent, which is called Rom Scot: whereas neither King nor Archbishop, Bishop, Abbat, Prior, nor any one in the Kingdome is freed from the payment thereof. The Abbat also, or monke appointed Archdeacon under him, hath pontificall Jurisdiction over the Priests and Lay-men of all the possessions belonging to this Church, so as he yeel-eth subjection, to no Archbishop, Bishop, or Legate, save only to the Pope of Rome. This likewise is to be knowne, that Offa the Magnificent King granted out of his Kingdome a set rent or imposition called * Rom Scot to Saint Peters Vicar, the Bishop of Rome, and himselfe obtained of the said Bishop of Rome that the Church of Saint Alban the Protomartyr of the English nation, might faithfully collect, and being so collected, reserve to their proper use, the same Rom Scot throughout all the Province of Hertford, in which the said Church standeth. Whence it is, that the Church is selfe hath from the King all royall privileges, so the Abbot of that place for the time being hath all Pontificall ornaments. Pope Hadrian also the fourth who was borne hard by Verulam granted this indulgence unto the Abbats of this Monasterie (I speake the very words out of the Priviledge) that as Saint Alban is distinctly knowne to be the Protomartyr of the English nation: so the Abbat of this Monastery should at all times among other Abbats of England in degree of dignitie be reputed first and principall. Neither left the Abbats ought undone that might serve either for use or ornament : who filled up with earth a mighty large poole under Verulam, which I spake of. The name whereof yet remaineth still heere in a certaine street of the towne named Fish-poole- street. Neere unto which streete, because certaine ankers were in our remembrance digged up, divers have verily thought (induced thereunto by a corrupt place in Gil- das) that the river Tamis sometimes had his course and chanell this way. But of this Meere or Fish-poole, have heere what an old Historian hath written. Abbot Alfrike for a great peece of money purchased a large and deepe pond, (an evill neighbour and hurtfull to Saint Albans Church) which was called Fish-poole, appertaining to the Kings: And the Kings officers and fishers molested the Abbat, and burdened the Monkes thereby. Out of which poole be the said Abbot in the end drained and derived the water, and made it dry ground.

If I were disposed upon the report of the common people to reckon up what great store of Romane peeces of coine, how many cast images of gold and silver, how many vessels, what a sort of modules or Chapiters of pillars, and how many wonderfull things of antique worke, have been digged up, my words would not carry credit :
The thing is so incredible. Yet take with you some few particulars thereof, upon the credite of an ancient Historiographer. Ealred the Abbot in the reigne of King Eadgar, having searched for the ancient vaults under ground at Verulam, overthrowed all. About the yeere of Christ 960. and stopped up all the waies with passages under ground, which were strongly and artificially arched over head : For, they were the lurking holes of whores and thieves. He levelled with the ground the ditches of the Citie and certaine dens, into which malefactours fled as unto places of refuge. But the whole tiles, and stones which he found fit for building, he layed aside. Neere unto the banke they did light upon planks of oke with nailes driven into them, cemented with stone-pitch: also the tacking and furniture of Ships as anchors halfe eaten with rust, and ores of irre. A little after he writeth. Eadmer his successor went forward with the worke that Ealfred began, and his pioners overthrowed the foundations of a Pallace in the mids of the old Citie, and in the hollow place of a wall as it were, in a little closet, they hapned upon bookes covered with oken boards and silken strings at them : whereof one contained the life of Saint Albane written in the British tongue, the rest the ceremonies of the Heathen. When they opened the ground deeper, they met with old tables of stone, with tiles also and pillars, likewise with pitchers and pots of earth made by Potters and Turners worke : vessels moreover of glasse containing the ashes of the dead, &c. To conclude, out of these remaines of Verulam, Eadmer built a new Monasterie to Saint Albane. Thus much for the antiquity and dignity of Ve- rumlam : now have also with you for an over-deale in the commendation of Verulam an * Hexastich of Alexander Neckam, who 400. yeeres since was there borne.

Saint Albans.

Verolamiam at this day being turned into fields: The towne of Saint Alban out of the ruins thereof flourisheth; a faire towne and a large, and the Church that Monastery remaineth yet for bignesse, beauty and antiquity, to be had in relation: which when the Monkes were thrust out of it, was by the Towne deemed with the sum of 400. pounds of our money, that it might not be buried with the ground, and so it became converted into a parish Church: and having a very goodly Font of solid brasse, wherein the Kings children of Scotland were to be Baptized, which Font, Sir Richard Lea Knight, Master of the Pioneers, brought as a spoile out of the Scottish warres, and gave unto the said Church, with this and arrogant inscription.

When Leeth a Towne of good account among the Scots, and Edinbrough their chiefe Cittie were on fire: Sir Richard Lea Knight saved me from burning, and brought me into England. And I being mindefull of this so great a benefit, whereas before I was wont to serve for Baptizing of none, but Kings Children, have now willingly offered my service even to the meanest of the English Nation. Lea the victor would have it so. Farewell. In the yeere of our Lord, M. D. XLIII. and of the Reigne of King Henrie the Eighth, XXXVI.

But to the matter. As antiquitie consecrated this place to be an Altar of Religion: so Mars also may seeme to have destined it for the very place of bloudie battail: For, to let other particulars goe by, when England under the two Houses of Lancaster and Yorke berest, as it were, of vitall breath was ready through Civil Warre to sink downe and fall in a sound, the chiefe Captaines of both sides joyned battail twice with reciprocal variety of fortune in the very Towne. First, Richard Duke of Yorke gave the Lancastrians heere a sore overthrow, tooke King Henry the Sixth captive, and slew many Honourable personages. Four yeeres after the Lancastrians under the conduct of Antony Mary wonne heere the field, put the house of Yorke to flight, and restored the King to his former liberty.

About this towne (that Imray let passe the mount or fortification which the common sort useth to call O. Hills and I take to have been the Campe of Donna the famous Lieutenant of Britaine) the Abbates in a pious and devout intent erected a little Nunnery at Sopwell, and Saint John's Spittle for Lepres, and another named Saint Mary de pre for diseased women: neere unto which they had a great Mannour named Grunbury: where Sir Nicholas Bacon Lord Keeper of the Great Seale of England built an house befitting his place and calling. To this adjoyneth Redborn, which is by interpretation Red water, and yet the water running thereby (from Mergate sometime a religious house, now a seat of the Ferrers out of the house of Groby) is no more red than is the Red sea. This Redborne in times past was a place renowned and resorted unto in regard of Amphibalus the Martyrs reliques heere found, who instructed Saint Alban in the Christian faith, and for Christs sake suffered death under Dioclesian. At this day well knowne, for that it is seated upon that common and Military high-way which we call Watling Street, and hath hard by Wenmer called also Wenmer a brooke that never breaketh out and riseth, but it foretellet dearth and scarcity of corne, or else some extremity of dangerous times, as the vulgar people doe verily beleve. Neere unto this Redborn I have some reason to thinke that the Station Duro-Co-Brive stood, whereof Antonine the Emperor maketh mention, although the distance of places gaine faith in it. For, as Redborn in our language, so Dur-coch in the British is all one in signification, with Redwater. And verily the truest conjectures that we can make of ancient places, are from antique inscriptions from the lying of Journeies every way, from the analogie and similitude of their names, and from rivers and lakes adjoining: although they answer not just to the exact account of miles betweene place and place, considering that the numbers may very soone be corruptly put downe, and the waies for shorter passage are as easily altered.

Certes it cannot otherwise be, but that Duro-Co-Brive stood where that Roman Mm Rode.

Redborn.

Duro-Co-Brive.

Rode-way passeth over this water, to wit under Flamsted: for even there, by the high way side, there is a good big spring breaking out of the ground about seven Italian miles from Verlam: (for which seven, through the careless negligence of the transcribers, twelve hath crept in.) Which brooke presently, whiles it is yet but small cutteth the high way crosse; and although it carry here no name at all, yet beneath S. Albans town it is called Cot, which is neere to the name Co. As for that Briva, which is an addition to many names of places, it signified, as I suppose, among the old Britans and Gauls, a bridge, or a passage, seeing it is found onely where there are rivers. In this land there was one or two Durobriva, that is to say, if I be not deceived Water passages; in Gauls, Briva Isara now Pontaise, where in times past they passed over the river * Isara, Briva Oderi, where they passed over Oderum, and Samarobria (for this is the true name) where there was passage over the river Soma.

Somewhat above, Flamsted sheweth it selfe upon the hill, which in the time of King Edward the Confessor, Leostane the Abbat of Saint Albans gave unto three knights, Turbot, Waldest and Turman, for to defend and secure the country thereby against theeves. But William the Conqueror tooke it from them, and gave it to Roger of Tadeney or Tory, a noble Norman, whose possession it was, but by a daughter it was transferred at length to the Beauchamps Earles of Warwick.

From hence I went downe Southward to Hempstead, a little mercate towne called Heban, Hamsted (when King Offa gave it unto the monastery of Saint Albans) lying among the hills by a riveret side, which floweth anon into another, that runneth downe by Berkhamsted. Where the Nobles of England, who devised hereby might shake off the new yoke of the Normans, assembled themselves together the persuasion of Frederike Abbat of Saint Albans: and unto whom William the Conqueror repaired (as we read in the life of the same Frederike) fearfully should loose the Kingdome with shame, which he had gotten with the blood so much blood. And after much debating of matters in the presence of the Archbishop Laufank, the King for the preservation of his peace swore upon the reliques of Saint Albans Church, and by laying hand upon the Holy Gospel, that he would approve ancient lawes of the kingdome, which the holy and devout King of England his predecessors, and King Edward especially ordained. But most of the Peeres and Nobles he forthwith evill entreated, turned out of all their possessions, and bestowed this Towne upon Robert Earle of Moriton, and Cornwall his half brother: Who fortified the castle heere with a duple trench and rampier: In which Richard King of the Romanes, and Earle of Cornwall full of honors and riches, ended this life for a better. For default of whose issue and offspring King Edward the Third in the end made over this Castle with the Towne unto Edward Blacke sonne, that most warlike Prince, whom he created Earle of Cornwall. Now the Castle is nothing else but broken walls and a rude heape of stones: above which Sir Edward Cary Knight, and Master of the Kings Jewell-house descended from the family of the Carys in Devonshire, and the Beauforts Dukes of Somerset built of late very goodly and most pleasant house. In the very Towne it selfe nothing in which fight save only the schoole, which John Ince Deane of Pauls in London, and of this place founded.

More into the South standeth Kings Langley, sometime the Kings house, in which was borne, and thereof tooke name Edmund of Langley King Edward the Thirds Sonne, and Duke of Yorke: where there was a small cell of Friers preachers, in which that silly and miserable Prince King Richard the Second, after he had been wickedly deprived both of Kingdome and life, was first buried, and soon after translated to Westminster; requited there by way of amends with a brazen tombe for the losse of a Kingdome. Just in a maner over against this, there is another Langley also, which because it belonged to the Abbats of Saint Albans is called Abbate Langley: wherein was borne Nicholas surnamed Break-speare, afterwards Bishop of Rome.

Rome, knowne by the name of Pope Hadrian the Fourth: who was the first that taught the Norwegians to the Christian Faith, and repressed the Citizens of Rome aspiring to their ancient freedome, whose stirrup also as hee alighted from his horse, Frederik the First Emperor of the Romanes held, and whose breath was stopped in the end with a flie that flew into his mouth. Somewhat lower I saw Wasford and Richemansworth, two mercate townies: concerning which I have read nothing of greater antiquity than this; that King Offa liberally gave them unto Saint Albans, as also Caishobery next unto Wasford. In which place Sir Richard Morison Knight, a great learned man, and who had been used in Embassages to the mightiest Princes, under King Henry the Eighth and King Edward the Sixth began to build an house, which Sir Charles his Sonne finally finished.

More into the East, the Romanes Military high way went directly from London to Verlam by Hamsted-beath, Edgeworth and Ellestre: neere unto which at the very same distance where Antonine the Emperour in his Itinerarie placeth S v L LONACIA, to wit, twelve miles from London and nine from Verlam, there remaine yet the marks of an ancient Station, and much rubbish or rammell is digged up at an hill which in these dayes they call Brockley-hill. But when the Romanes Empire ceased in this Island, as Barbarisme by little and little crept in, whiles all partes smoked with the Saxons warre, this, as every thing else, lay a great while relinquished, untill that a little before the Normans comming in, Leostane Abbat of Saint Albans restored it. For hee, as wee finde written in his life, *Causeth the thicke and shady Woods, which lie from the edge of * Chiltern unto London, especially where the Kings high way called Waslingstretre lay to be cut up, the rugged places to be levelled, Bridges to be built, and the uneven waies to be made plaine and safer for passage*. But about three hundred yeeres since, this way was after a sort againe forsaken, by reason that another way through licence of the Bishops of London was laied open through High-gate and Bernet. This Bernet, for the beast mercat there kept, beginneth now to be famous, but it was more renowned for a field there fought, when in the warre betwene the two Families of Lancaster and Yorke, England dared to doe against her owne bowells, whatsoever ambitious treachery and disloyaltie would command. For, upon Gledesmore hard by, even on Easter day in the morning there was a bloody battaile most fiercely fought, and that with variable fortune for a great while, by reason that a most thicke mist covered the face of the ground. But in the end the victorie fell happily unto King Edward the Fourth, by occasion that Richard Nevill Earle of Warwick was there slaine, whom as the favourable indulgence of Fortune made over-stout and bold, yea and dangerous unto Kings: so his death freed England from all feare of civill Warres. Bernet hath for his neighbours Mimmes a seat of a Worshipfull Family of the Coningsbies descended to them by Frewick from the Knolles, ancient possessours thereof; and North-hall, where Ambrose Dudley last Earle of Warwick raised a stately house from the foundations.

This County of Hertford had Earles out of the Familie de Clare, who notwithstanding were oftener called Earles of Clare, from Clare in Suffolke their principall seat. The first to my knowledge was Gilbert, who under the title of Earle of Hertford is put downe as a witness in a Charter of King Stephens. Likewise Roger de Clare in the time of King Henry the Second is in the Red-booke of the Exchequer named Earle of Hertford.

Likewise his successors, whom you may see in their places. But seeing both by right of inheritance, and also through the Princes favour they attained to the Earldome of Gloucester, they bare both titles joyntly, and were called unto Parliaments by the name of Earles of Gloucester and Hertford. And Richard de Clare who died in the yeere of our Lord 1262. is in plaine termes by Florilegus of Westminster called Earle of Gloucester and of Hertford, where he reporteth this Epitaph composed for him in that age, to his great commendation.

But not long since King Henry the Eighth honoured Sir Edward de Saint John or Seymer with the title of Earle of Hertford, who also was created Duke of Somers by King Edward the Sixth. After whom succeeded in this Earldome his Sonne bearing the same name, a right Honourable personage, and a singular lover of Learning.

TRINO BANTES.

They, whom Cæsar calleth TRINO BANTES, Ptolomee and Tacitus, TRINOANTES, were next neighbours to the Cattieuchlani, inhabiting in those countries, which now having changed their names are commonly termed Middlesex and Essex. Whence that ancient name sprung, I dare not verily so much as guesse, unless it come of the British word Tre-Nant, which is as much as Townes in a vale. For this whole region in a maner lieth low in a valley upon the Tamis. But I doe not greatly please my selfe in this my conjecture. And yet they that inhabited Galloway in Scotland, lying altogether lowe in vallies were of old time in the British tongue called Noantes and Novantes, and in the Vaile of Rhine, in French named Le Vaule, the people in old time called Nantuates, had both their abode and their name thence: so that this conjecture of mine may seeme as probable as that of others, who over curiously have derived Trinobantes, of Troy, as a man would say Troia Nova, that is, New Troy. But I wish them well, and that heerein they may please themselves. These were in Cæsar's time of all these countries well neere the strongest City or State (for, evermore he termeth by the name of Civitas, a whole people living under the same lawe) and their King in those daies, was Immanuentius, who being slaine by Calsibelinus, his sonne Mandubratius saving his life by flight, went into Gaule to Cæsar, and putting himselfe under his protection returned with him into Britaine. At which time these Arinobantes petitioned Cæsar by their Ambassadors, that he would defend Mandubratius from the injuries of Calsibelinus, and resend him to the State, that he might be Governour and beare rule over them: which being done, they gave forty Hostages, and were the first of all the Britanes that yielded themselves under his allegiance. This Mandubratius, that I may note so much by the way, is evermore called by Eutropius, Bede, and the later writers, Androgeus. But whence this diversitie of the name should arise, I am altogether ignorant: unless that be true, which I have learned from a very skilfull man in the British history and language both, that this name Androgeus was given unto him for his lewdnesse and perfidious treason. For, the signification of wickednesse doth most plainly shew it selfe in it: And in the Booke of Triades, among the three Traitors of Britaine, he is counted the most villanous; in that he was the first that made way to bring the forraigne Romanes into Britaine, and betrayed his Country. After Mandubratius, rius, when as now by reason of bothe ciuill warres, Britaine was neglected of the Romanes and left unto his owne Princes and lawes, certaine it is that Cunobelinus ruled as King in these parts, of whose coine I exhibit heere unto you two peeces, although I have already shewed the very same and others beeing

Festus Capitolinus.

Admimus this mans Sonne banished by his Father fled with a small retinue about him to the Romane Emperour Caius Caligula, and yeelded himselfe. With so puffed up the young Emperours minde, that as if all the Island had absolutely and wholly yeelded into his hands, he sent glorious letters to Rome, admittinge oftentimes the bearers thereof not to deliuer them unto the Consuls, but in the Temple of Mars, and in a frequent assembly of the Senate. When Cunobelinus was dead, Aulus Plautius by commission from Claudius the Emperour came into this Country. One of Cunobelinus his Sonnes named Togodumnus he slew, and another called Catagratius he overthrew in the field, over whom also, as we finde in the Capitollin Record of the Romane Triumphes, he rode Ovar in triumph: and that, with so great honour as Suetonius writeth, that Claudius the Emperour went side by side with him both in his going to the Capitoll and also in his returne from thence. And he himselfe shortly after transporting his forces hither, brought these parts within few Moneths into the forme of a Province. Thenceforth the Trinobantes rested a while in peace, but that under the Empire of Nero they privily entered into a conspiracy with the Icteni to shake off the Romanes yoke. But Suetonius Paulinus, as Tacitus recordeth, quickly quenched this flame of sedition with a great effusion of Britanes blood. When the Romane Empire was at length come to an end in Britane, Vortigern the Britane, gave to the Saxons (who kept him prisoner) for his ransom the Country with others, as Ninnius writeth: and it had his peculiar Kings for a long time together, but such as held by homage sometimes of the Kentish King, sometimes of the Mercians. Among whom Sebert in the yeere 603. was the first that became a Christian: and Suthred the last King, who being vanquished by Egbert in the yeere 804. left the Kingdome unto the West-Saxons: But heereof else where more largely: Now let us survey the very Country.

PARTE OF BERKSHIRE

MIDDLESEX.

MIDDLESEX taketh name of the Middle-Saxons, because the Inhabitants thereof were in the middest betwene East-Saxons, West-Saxons, South-Saxons, and those whom that age called Mercians. It is severed from Buckingham-shire by the River Cole which the Britans called Co, on the West-side, from Hertford-shire on the North-side by a knowne crooked limite, from Essex on the East with the River Lea, from Surrey and Kent on the South by the Tamis. It being comprised within short Bounds lyeth out in length, where it is longest twenty miles, and in the narrowest place it is scant twelve miles over. For aire passing temperate, and for Soyle fertile, with sumptuous houses and prety Townes on all sides pleasantly beautified: and every where offereth to the view many things memorabile. By the River Cole, where it entreth first into this Shire, wee saw Breakespeare an ancient house belonging to a Family so surnamed, out of which came Pope Hadrian the Fourth, of whom erewhile I spake: then, Haresfeld, in old time Herefelle, the possession in King William the Conquerours daies of Richard the * sonne of Counte Gislebert. More Southward, Uxbridge anciently Woxbridge a Towne of later time built, and full of Innes, stretcheth out in length. Beneath which is Draiton, reedified by the Barons Paget; Colham, which from the Barons Le Strange came to the Earles of Darby: and Stanwell ever since the Normans comming in, unto our fathers dayes the habitation of the Family of Windsore. And not farre from hence, Cole after it hath made certaine scattering medow Islands, at two small mouthes falleth into Tamis. Along the side whereof, as a Germane Poet in this our age pretily verified,

*Tot campos, Sylvas, tot regia tella, tot hortos
Artifici dextra excultos, tot uidimus arces, Ut nunc Ausonio Tamisis cum Tybride certet.*

So many fields and pleasant woods, so many princely Bowres,
And Palaces we saw besides, so many stately Towres,
So many gardens trimly dres'd by curious hand which are,
That now with Romane Tyberis the Tamis may well compare.

At the very first entrance, Stanes in the Saxon tongue & tana offereth it selfe to our sight, where Tamis hath a wooden Bridge over it. This name it tooke of a meere-stone heere in times past set up to marke out the jurisdiction that the City of London hath in the River. Neere unto this stone is that most famous Medow Runingmead commonly called Renimed: in which the Baronage of England assembled in great number in the yeere 1215. to exact their Liberties of King John. Whereof in the marriage of Tame and Isis the Poet wrote thus, speaking of the Tamis that runneth hard by.

*Subiit hic pratum, quod dixit Renimed Anglus, Quo sedere duces armis annisque verendi,
Regis Joannis cuperens qui vertere sceptrum,
Edwardi Sancti dum leges juraque vellens
Principe contempto tenebroso è carcere duci:
Hinc sonnere tuba plusquam civilia bella,
Venit ex hinc refugus nostras Lodovicus in oras.*

Hence runnes it hard by Medow Greene, in English RENIMED,
Where close in counsell sat the Lords, as well for armour dred
As ancient yeeres right reverend: who sought their foveraigne King
John to depose from regall Throne: Whiles that they ment to bring (Contemning Prince) S. Edwards lawes and liberties againe,

Hence more than civill Warres, aloud the trumpets ganne to found.

Hence Lewis of France, who soone retid, set foot on English ground.

From thence it passeth by Coway-stakes at Lalam, where we said that Casa croce over the Tamis, and the Britans fenced the banke and Fould against him with whereof it had the name. Tamis passing downe from thence seeth above it the highest hill of all this Country, under which Southward there lie for a together exceeding rich and fruitfull fields, especially about Hellon a small that yeeldeth so fine floure for manchet that a long time it hath served for the mouth. Within a little of it is Hanworth, where stands a pretty house of the which King Henry the Eighth tooke exceeding delight in, as being a residence for his solace and voluptuous pleasure. Afterwards it runneth hard by Court a royall Palace of the Kings, a worke in truth of admirable magnificence out of the ground by Thomas Wolsey Cardinall, in ostentation of his riches for very pride, being otherwise a most prudent man, hee was not able to rule his minde. But it was made an Honour, enlarged and finished by King Henry the Eighth so amply, as it containeth within it five severall inner Courts passing envired with very faire buildings wrought right curiously, and goodly to behold. Of which Leland writeth thus:

*Est locus insulso rerum splendore superbus,
Altiturque vaga Tamisini fluminis unda,
Nemine ab antiquo jam tempore dictus Avona.
Hic Rex Henricus talis Olearius ades
Exerxit, qualem toto Sol aureus orbe

Fortune on him had pour'd her gifts full fast,

But Fortunes Blisse, Alas, prov'd Balc at last.

And now with a winding reach the River bendeth his course Northwardly Gisleworth, for so was that called in old time, which now is Thistleworth. Where sometime stood the Palace of Richard King of Romans and Earle of Cornwall, which the Londoners in a tumultuous broile burnt to the ground.

From hence Sion sheweth it selfe, a little Monastery so named of the most holy Mount Sion: Which King Henry the Fifth, when he had expelled thence the Moors aliens, built for religious Virgins to the honor of our Saviour, the Virgine Mary, and Saint Briget of Sion: like as he founded another on the Rivers side over against it the Carthusian Monkes, named Jesu of Bethlehem. In this Sion, hee appointed to the Glory of God so many Nunnes, Priests, and lay brethren divided a part within their severall wals, as were in number equal to Christ his Apostles and Disciples upon whom when he had bestowed sufficient living he provided by a law, that concerning themselves themselves therewith, they should take no more of any man: but what overplus forever remained of their yearly revenue, they should bestow it upon the poore. But after that in our forefathers time those religious Virgines were cast out, and it became a rectory house of the Duke of Somerset, who plucked downe the Church, and there began a new house. Under this the small water Brent issueth into the Tamis, which springing out of a Pond vulgarly called Brownswell, for Brenwell, that is, in old English Frog-well, passeth downe betwene Henlon, which Archbishop Dunelm gave for the advancement of Monkes, purchased for some few golde Bizantium, which were Imperiall peeces of Gold coined at Bizantium or Constantinople, and gave to the Monks of Saint Peter of Westminster: and Hamsted-bills (from whence you have a most pleasant prospect to the most beautifull City of London, and the lovely Country about it.) Over which the ancient Roman military way led to Vernon or Saint Albans by Edge-worth, and not by High-gate as now, which new way was opened by the Bishops of London about some 300. yeares since. But to returne, Brent into whom all the small Rilllets of these parts resort, runneth on by Brentfreat, an Hamlet to whom it imparted his name, watereth Hanger-wood, Hanwell, Oysterly Park, where Sir Thomas Gresham built a faire large house: and so neere his fall into the Tamis giveth name to Brentford a faire thoroughfaire, and frequent Mercat.

Neere which in the yeare 1116. King Edmond surnamed Ironside, so fiercely charged upon the Danes whom hee compelled by force to retire from the Siege of London, that as fast as their horses could make way, they fled, not without their great losse. From Stanes hitherto, all that lyeth betwene London highway (which goeth through Hounslow) and the Tamis was called the Forrest or Warren of Stanes, untill that King Henry the Third, as in his Charter we reade, Disforrested and diswarrened it. Then by the Tamis side is Fulham, in the English Saxon tongue pullonham, that is, The place of Fowles: the greatest credit and honour whereof is the Bishop of London's house standing there conveniently, not farre from the City, albeit not so healthfully. Also Chelsey, so named of a shelve of Sand in the River Tamis as some suppose, but in Records it is named Chelche-hish: a place garnished with faire and stately houses, by King Henry the Eighth, by William Powlet the first Marquesse of Winchester, and by others.

But LONDON, the Epitome, or Breviary of all Britaine, the seat of the British Empire, and the Kings of Englands Chamber, so much overtoppeth all these, as according to the Poet, inter viburnum Cupressus, that is, the Cypresse-tree amongst the Viornes. Tacitus, Ptolome, and Antonine call it LONDINIUM, and LONGIDINIUM: Ammianus LUNDINIUM and AUGUSTA; Stephen in his Cities ATNAONTON, our Britans Lundeyn, the old Saxons London-cear-dep, London-býrig, London-pýc: Scrangers Londra and Londres: the inhabitants London: Fabulous writers Troja nova, that is, New Troy, Dinas Belin, that is, Belins City, and Caer Lud of King Lud, whom they write to have reedified it and given it the name. But these few names and original derivations together with Erasmus his conjecture, who deriveth it from Lindum a City in the Isle Rhodes I willingly leave to such as well like it. For mine owne part; seeing that Casar and Strabo doe write that the ancient Britains called those Woods and groves by the names of Cities and Townes, which they had fenced with trees cast downe and plashed to stoppe up all passage: seeing also I have understood that such woods or groves are in the British tongue named Llwyn, I incline a little to the opinion that London thence tooke name, as one would say, by way of excellency The City, or A City thick of trees. But if heerein I faile of the truth, let me with good leave give my conjecture (and heere would I have no man to charge me with inconsistency while I disport in conjecture) that whence it had the same, thence also it tooke the name, even from ships, which the Britains in their language call Llong: so that Londinium may seeme to sound as much as a ship-Rode, or City of ships. For, the Britains teame a City Dinas, whence the Latines have fetcht their Dinum. And hence it is, that elsewhere it is called LONDINIUM, and in the funerall song or Dump of a most ancient British Bard, Llong-porth, that is, an harbour or haven of ships, and by this this very terme Bononia, or Belen in France, which Ptolomee calleth Gessiorum Uale, in the British Glossarie is named Bolung-long. For, many Cities have their names from Ships, as Nampatus, Nantastmus, Nauplia, Navalia, Angli, ven, than our London. For, in regard of both Elements, most blessed and happy, as being situate in a rich and fertile Soile, abounding with plentiful store of all things, and on the gentle ascent and rising of an hill, hard by the Tamis side, the most Merchant, as one would say, of all things that the World doth yeeld which flourish at certaine set houres with the Ocean-tides, by his safe and deepe channell, making that it striveth at this day with the Mart-townes of Christendome for the second place, and affoordeth a most sure and beautifull Roade for shipping. A man would thinke the shipping there, that it is, as it were, a very Wood of trees disbranching to make glades and let in light: So shaded it is with masts and sailes.

Who was the first founder, is by long time growne out of knowledge, and in very few Cities there are that know their own first founders, considering they owe to their greatnesse by little and little. But as other Cities to this of ours, which is originall upon the Trojans, as verily believing that Brutus the Nephew in the descent of Great Æneas was the builder thereof. But whosoever founded it, the happy and fortunate estate thereof hath given good proofe, that built it was in an hour and marked for life, and long continuance. And that it is for an honourable, Ammianus Marcellinus giveth us to understand, who called it Juliana, and that was 1200. yeares agoe, an old towne: and Cornelius Tacitus in like manner, who in Nero his daies 1540. yeares since, reported it to have been a place congruous for fresh Trade, concourse of Merchants, and great store of victuals and all things.

This onely at that time was wanting to the glory thereof, that it had the name of Free City nor of Colony. Neither verily could it have stood with the Roman profit, if a City flourishing with merchandize should have enjoyed the name of Colony or Free City. And therefore it was, as I suppose, that they ordained it a Prefecture: for so they termed townes where Marts were kept and Justice was done: yet so as that they had no Magistrates of their owne, but rulers were sent thither to governe in them, and for to minister Law, which in publique matters, taxes, tributes, tolles, customes, warfare, &c. they should have from the Senate at Rome. Hence it cometh that Tacitus the Panegyrist, and Marcellinus call it onely Juliana. And although it was not in name loftier, yet in welch, riches and prosperity it was shined as much as any other, yea and continued in manner alwaies the same, until the dominion of Romans, English, Saxons, and Normans, seldom or never afflicted it with any great calamities. In the Raigne of Nero, when the Britains had conspired to cover and resume their liberty under the leading of Boadicia, the Londoners, not with all their weeping and teares hold Suetonius Paulinus, but that after he levied a power of the Citizens to aide him, hee would needs dislodge and drive from thence, leaving the City naked to the enemy: who forthwith surprised and slew some few, whom either weaknesse of sex, feeblenesse of age, or weakness of the place had detained there. Neither had it sustained lesse losse and misery at the hands of the French, if it had not suddenly and beyond all expectation by Gods providence beene relieved. For when C. Allectus had by a deceitfull wile made C. Carausius a Chive-lander, who taking vantage of our rough seas, of Diolepis in gerous warres in the East, and withall presuming of the French, and most valiant Mariners and servitors at sea, had withheld to himselfe the rewenes of Britain, Holland, and borne for the space of six yeares the title of Emperour. Augustus, who coins very often found heere doe shew: when M. Aurelius Alectandrus liued in a battaile slain Allectus in the third year now of his usurpation of the imperiall people and state, those French, who remained alive after the fight, hasting to London forthwith would have sacked the City, had not the Tamis, which never faileth to helpe the Londoners, very fitly brought in the Roman souldiers, who by reason of fogge at Sea were severed from the Navie. For, they put the Barbarians to the sword all the City over, and thereby gave the Citizens not onely safety by the slaughter of their enemies, but also pleasure in the beholding of such a sight. And then it was, as our Chronicles record, that Lucius Gallus was slaine by a little Brookes side, which ran through the middle almost of the City, and of him was in British called Nant-Gall, in English Walbrooke: which name remaineth still in a Street, under which there is a sewer within the ground to ride away filth; not farre from London-stone, which I take to have beene a Milliary, or Milemarke, such as was in the Mercate place of Rome: From which was taken the dimension of all journies every way, considering it is in the very midst of the City, as it lyeth in length. Neither am I perswaded that London was as yet walled. Howbeit within a little while after, our Histories report, that Constantine the Great at the request of his mother Helena, did first fence it about with a Wall made of rough stone and British bricke, which tooke up in compasse three miles or thereabout: so as it enclosed the modell of the City, almost foure square but not equall on every side, considering that from West to East it is farre longer, than from South to North. That part of this Wall which stood along the Tamis side is by the continuall flowing and washing of the River fallen downe and gone. Yet there appeared certaine remains thereof in King Henry the Seconds time, as Fitz-Stephen, who then lived, hath written. The rest now standing is stronger toward the North, as which not many yeares since was reedified by the meanes of Joceline Lord Mayor of London, became of a sodaine new, as it were, and fresh againe. But toward East and West, although the Barons in old time during their warrs repaired and renewed it with the Jewes houses then demolished, yet is it all throughout in decay. For Londoners, like to those old Lacedemonians laugh at strong walled Cities, as coorte boules for Women, thinking their owne City sufficiently fenced when it is fortified with men and not with stones. This Wall giveth entrance at seven principall Gates, (for wittingly I omit the smaller) which as they have beene newly repaired, so they have had also new names given unto them.

On the West side there be two: to wit Lud-gate of king Lud, or Flud-gate, as Le-lund is of opinion, of a little floud running beneath it (like as the Gate Fluminaria in Rome) built againe of late from the very foundation: and Newgate the fairest of them all, so called of the newnesse thereof, where as before it was termed Chamber-lane-gate, which also is the publique Goall or Prison. On the North side are foure, Alders-gate of the antiquity, or as others would have it, of Aldrich a Saxon: Creples-gate, of a Spire of lame Creples sometime adjoyning thereunto: Moor-gate of a moory ground hard by, now turned into a field and pleasant Walkes: which Gate was first built by Falconer Lord Mayor in the yeare of our Lord 1414. and Bishopsgate of a Bishop, which Gate the Dutch Merchants of the Stillyard were bound by Covenant, both to repaire and also to defend at all times of danger and extremity. On the East side there is Aldgate alone, so named of the oldnesse, or Elbegate, as others terme it, which at this present is by the Cities charge reedified. It is thought also that there stood by the Tamis beside that on the Bridge two Gates more, namely, Belings-gate, a Wharfe now, or a key for the receipt of Ships, and Douregate, that is, The Water-gate, commonly called Dowgate.

Where the Wall enderth also toward the River there were two very strong Forts or Bastilions: of which the one Eastward remaineth yet, usually called, The Towre of London, in the British tongue, Bringwin, or Tourgwin of the whitenesse. A most famous and goodly Citadell, encompassed round with thicke and strong Walles, full of lofty, and stately Turrets, fenced with a broad and deepe ditch, furnished also with an Armory or Magazine of warlike Munition, and other buildings besides: so as it resembleth a big towne: and a man may truly suppose, that those two Castles which King Stephen recorded to have beene at the East side of this City went both to the making of this one. The other Fort was on the West side of the City, where Fleete, a little Riveret (whence Fleete-streete tooke name) now of no account, but in times past able to beare Vessels, as I have read in the Parliament Rolls, sheddeth it selfe into

The Temple of Diana.

Sacrifice of Bulls.

That there stood of old time a Temple of Diana in this place some have conjectured, and arguments there are to make this their conjecture good. Certaine old houses adjoining are in the ancient records of the Church called Dianas Chamber: and in the Church-yard, while Edward the First reigned, an incredible number of Osse heads were digged up, as wee finde in our Annals, which the common sort at that time made a wondering at, as the Sacrifices of Gentiles: and the learned know, that Tanrapolia were celebrated in the honour of Diana. I my selfe also when I was a boy, have seene a stagges head sticking upon a speare-top, (a ceremony fitting well with the sacrifices of Diana) carried round about within the very Church in solemn pompe and procession, and with a great noise of Horne-blowers. And that Scagge Hart which they of the house of Bawde in Essex did present for certaine land there held, as I have heard say, the Priests of this Church arrayed in their sacred vestiments, and wearing Garlands of flowers upon their heads, were wont to receive at the steps of the quire.

Now whether this were in use before those Bawds were bound to exhibite such Stagges, I wote not: but surely this rite and ceremony may seeme to smell of heathen's worship and the Gentiles errors, more than of Christian Religion. And yet no man neede to doubt, that from them certaine strange, and foraine and heathenish rites crept into Christian religion. Which Ceremonies the first Christians (as mankind is naturally a pliant Sectary to superstition) either admitted, or at the first tolerated, thereby to traine and allure the Heathen, from Paganish little and little to the true Service and Worship of God.

But ever since this Church was built, it hath beene the See of the Bishops of London: and the first Bishop that it had under the English (about fifty yeares that Theon of the British Nation was thrust out) was Melitus a Roman, consecrated by Austin Archbishop of Canturbury. In honour of which Austin against the Decree of Pope Gregorie the Great, the Ensignes of the Archbishopricke, and the Metropolitan See, were translated from London to Canterbury. Within this Cathedral Church, (to say nothing of Saint Erkenwald, and the like) there lye buried Sebba King of the East Saxons, who gave over his kingdom to serve Christ; Etheldred or Egeldred, who was an Oppressor rather than a benefactor to his Kingdome, cruell in the beginning, wretched in the middle, and shameful in the end: so outrageous hee was in his connivency to a Parricide committed, so infamous flight and effeminacy, and so miserable in his death.

Henry Lucy Earle of Lincoln; John of Gaunt Duke of Lancaster, Sir Burke a right noble Knight of the Garter executed by encroched Authority without the kings assent, Sir John de Beauchamp, Lord Warden of the Cinque Ports, the Lord Latimer, Sir John Mason knight; William Herbert Earle of Pembroke, Sir Thomas Cholas Bacon Lord Keeper of the Great Seale of England, a man of a deep judgement and exquisite judgement; Sir Philip Sidney, and Sir Francis Walsingham, famous knights, &c. and Sir Christopher Hatton Lord Chancellour of England, whose perpetuall memory Sir William Hatton his Nephew by sister, desired from the ancient Family of the Newports, whom hee adopted into the family of Hatton, dutifully erected a sumptuous monument, well becomming the greatness of his adoptive father.

Beside this Church, there is not to my knowledge any other worke of the English Saxons extant in London to bee seene: for why? they continued not long in perfect peace; considering that in short space the West-Saxons subdued the East-Saxons; and London became subiect to the Mercians. Scarcely were there three yeares that the vill Warres hush, when a new Tempest brake out of the North: I mean the Danes, who piteously tore in peeces all this Country, and shooke this City. For the Danes brought it under their Subjection: but Alfred recovered it out of their hands, and after he had repaired it, gave it unto Aetheldred Earle of the Mercians.

who had married his daughter. Yet those wastefull depopulators, did what they could afterwards many a time to winne it by Siege; but Cannike especially, who by digging a new Chanell attempted to turne away the Tamis from it. Howbeit evermore they lost their labour; the Citizens did so manfully repulse the force of the enemy. Yet were they not a little terrified still by them, untill they lovingly received and saluted as their King, William Duke of Normandy; whom God destined to bee borne for the good of England against those Spoilers. Presently then, the windes were laid, the clouds disparcled, and golden dayes indeed shone upon it: Since which it never sustained any great calamity to speake of: but through the speciall favour and indulgence of Princes obtained very large and great Immunities, beganne to bee called The Kings Chamber, and so flourished a new with freestrade and traffique of Merchants; that William of Malmesbury who lived well neere about that time, termed it, A noble and wealthy City, replenished with rich Citizens, and frequented with the commerce of Occupiers and Factors, coming out of all lands. And Elizabeth living also in those dayes, hath left in writing; that London at that time counted an hundred and twenty two Parish Churches, and thirteene Covenants of religious Orders: also that when a Muster and shew was made of able men to beare Armes; they brought into the Field under their Colloours forty thousand footmen, and twenty thousand horsemen.

Then was it enlarged with new buildings; and the spacious Suburbs stretched forth from the gates a great length on every side: but Westward especially which are the greatest, and best peopled: In which are twelve Innes, ordained for Students of our Common law: whereof foure being very faire and large belong to the judicall Courts, the rest to the Chauncery: besides two Innes moreover for the Serjeants at Law. Herein such a number of young Gentlemen doe so patiently ply their bookes, and study the Law, that for frequency of Students, it is not inferior either to Angiers, Caen, or Orlean it selfe, as Sir John Fortescue in his small Treatise of the Lawes of England doth witnesse. The said foure principall houses, are The Inner Temple, the Middle Temple, Graves Inne, and Lincolns Inne. Those two former named, stand in the very place where in times past, during the Reigne of King Henry the Second, Heraclius Patriarch of Jerusalem consecrated a Church for Knights Templars, which they had newly built according to the forme of the Temple, neere unto the Sepulchre of our Lord at Hierusalem. For, at their first institution about the yeare of our Lord 1113, they dwelt in part of the Temple hard by the Sepulchre, whereof they were so named, and vowed to defend Christian Religion, the Holy Land, and Pilgrimes going to visite the Lords Sepulchre, against all Mahometans, and Infidels; professing to live in chastity and obedience; whereupon all men most willingly and with right loving hearts embraced them: so that, through the bounteous liberality of Princes and devout people, having gotten in all places very faire Possessions, and exceeding great wealth, they flourished in high reputation for Piety and Devotion: yea and in the opinion, both of the holiness of the men, and of the place King Henry the Third, and many Noble men desired much to bee buried in their Church among them. Some of whose Images are there to bee seene, with their legges acrosse. For, so they were buried in that Age that had taken upon them the Crosse (as they then termed it) to serve in the Holy Land, or had vowed the same. Among whom was William Marshall the elder a most powerfull man in his time, William and Gilbert his sonnes Marshalls of England and Earles of Penbroch. Upon William the elder his Tombe I some yeares since read in the upper part Gomes Penbrochi; and upon side this Verse:

Miles eram Martis, Mars multos vicerat armis.

Of Mars I was a doughty Knight,
Mars vanquished many a man in fight:

But in proceffe of time, when with insatiable greedinesse they had hoorded great wealth by withdrawing tith's from churches, appropriating spiritual livings to themselves, and other hard meanes; their riches turned to their ruine. For thereby their former piety was after a manner stifled, they fell at jarre with other religious orders, their professed obedience to the Patriarch of Ierusalem was rejected, envy among the common sort was procured, which hope of gain among the better sort so emboldened, that in the yeere of our salvation 1312. this order was condemned of impiety, and by the Popes authority utterly abolished. Howbeit their possessions were by authority of the Parliament assigned to the Hospitalier Knights of S. Iohn of Ierusalem, least that such Lands given to pious and good uses, against the Donours will should be alienated to other uses. And yet it is apparent out of ancient writings, that this place, after the expulsion of the Templars, was the seat and habitation of Thomas Becket, Lancaſter, and of Sir Hugh Spenser King Edward the Second his minion: afterwards of Sir Aimer de Valence Earle of Pembroke, and in the end turned into two Colleges or Innes of Lawyers. Of the rest of these Innes, I have found nothing at all by reading: But the generall voyce goeth, that the one was the dwelling house of the Lord Greies of Wilton, and the other of the Earles of Lincolne.

Nere unto this K. Henry the third erected betwene the New and the Old Town a house of Convers, for the maintenance of those that were converted from Iudaism to the Christian Truth: which King Edward the Third appointed afterwards in rolls and records to be kept therein, and thereof at this day it is called The Roul.

These Suburbs with houses standing close together, and stately habitations of Nobles and great Men of the Land along the Tamis side, reach out as far as Westminster. Among which these are the most memorable here: Bride-wel, which King Henry the Eighth built a royall house for the entertainment of Charles the Fifth Emperour: but now it is an House of Correction: Buckburſ house, or White Friars, belonging sometimes to the Bishops of Salisbury: the White Friars, or White Friars: The Temple whereof I speake: Then without the Bars Effingham built by the Lord Pages: Arundel house before called Hampton place, and Somerſet house built by Edward Somer Duke of Somerset: The Savoy, so named of Peter Earle of Savoy, who there dwelt, which Queene Eleonor wife to King Henry the Third purchased of the fraternity of Monti-jovis, and gave it to her Sonne Edmund Earle of Lancaster. Whose Posterity dwelt in it a long time untill that King Henry the Second dedicated it as an Hospitall for the Poore: Worceſter house, late Bedford house, the bury house, Durham house, built by Antony Becke Bishop of Durham, and Palmer of Jerusalem, and thereby the onely ornament of this part the Briſtain Barke, built by the Earle of Salisbury, and so named by King James: York house in times past, the house, and Northampton house now begunne by Henry Earle of Northampton. In what meane I to name these places?

By this Suburbs Westminster, which sometime was more than a mile distant, conjoynd so close unto the City of London, that it seemeth a member thereof: whereas it is a City of it selfe, having their peculiar Magistrates and Privileges. It was called in times past Thorney, of Thornes: but now Westminster, of the Westminster on, and the Monastery. Most renowned it is for that Church, the Hall of Justice, and the Kings Palace.

This Church is famous especially by reason of the Inauguration and Sepulture of the Kings of England. Sulcard writeth, that there stood sometimes a Temple of Apolo in that place, and that in the dayes of Antoninus Pius Emperour of Rome it fell down with an Earth-quake. Out of the remaines whereof, Sebert King of the East-Saxons erected another to Saint Peter, which beeing by the Danes overthrowne, the shoppe Dunſtane reedified, and granted it to some few Monkes. But afterwards

A King Edward furnamed the Confessour with the tenth penny of all his revenewes built it new for to be his owne sepulture, and a Monastery for Benedictine Monkes; endowing it with Livings and Lands lying disperſed in diverse parts of England. But listen what an Historian saith who then lived: *The devout King destined unto God that place, both for that it was nere unto the famous and wealthy City of London, and also had a pleasant situation amongst fruitful fields, and greene grounds lying round about it: and withall the principall River running hard by, bringing in from all parts of the world great variety of Wares and Merchandize of all sorts to the City adjoining. But chiefly for the love of the chiefe Apostle, whom he revered with a speciall and singular affection: He made choise to have a place there for his owne Sepulchre: and thereupon commanded, that of the tenths of all his Rents, the worke of a noble edifice should be gone in hand with, such as might beseme the Prince of the Apostles: To the end, that he might procure the propitious favour of the Lord after he should finish the course of this transitory Life, both in regard of his devout Piety, and also of his free oblation of Lands and Ornaments, wherewith hee purposed to endow and enrich the same. According therefore to the Kings commandement, the worke nobly begonne and happily proceeded forward: neither the charges already disbursed or to be disbursed are weighed and regarded, so that it may be presented in the end unto God and Saint Peter worth their acception. The forme of that ancient building read if you please out of an old Manuscript booke: The principall plot or ground-worke of the building supported with most lofty Arches is cast round with a foure square worke and semblable joyns. But the compasse of the whole, with a double Arch of Stone on both sides is enclosed with joyned worke firmly knit and united together every way. Moreover the Crosse of the Church which was to compasse the middle Quire of those that chaunted unto the Lord, and with a two-fold supportance that it had on either side to uphold and beare the lofty toppe of the Tower in the midst, simply riseth at first with a low and strong Arch: then mounteth it higher with many winding Staires artificially ascending with a number of steps: But afterward with a single wall it reacheth up to the roofe of Timber well and surely covered with Lead. But after an hundred and threescore yeeres King Henry the Third subverted this fabricke of King Edwards, and built from the very foundation a new Church of very faire workmanship, supported with sundry rowes of Marble pillars, and the Rowse covered over with sheets of Lead: a peece of worke that cost fifty yeeres labour in building, which Church the Abbots enlarged very much toward the West end: and King Henry the Seventh for the buriall of himselfe, and his children adjoynded thereto in the East end a Chappell of admirable artificiall elegancy (The wonder of the World) Leland calleth it: for a man would say that all the curious and exquisite worke that can be devised, is there compacted: wherein is to be seene his owne most stately magnificall Monument all of solide and masse Copper. This Church when the Monkes were driven thence from time to time was altered to and fro with sundry changes. First of all it had a Deane and Prebendaries: soone after one Bishop and no more, namely T. Thurleby, who having wasted the Church Patrimony surrendered it to the spoile of Courtiers, and shortly after were the Monks with their Abbot set in possession againe by Queene Mary: and when they also within a while after were by authority of Parliament cast out, the most gracious Prince Queene Elizabeth converted it into a Collegiate Church, or rather into a Seminary and nurse-garden of the Church, appointed twelve Prebendaries there, and as many old Soldiers past service for Almshouses, forty Scholers, who in their due time are preferred to the Universities, and from thence sent forth into the Church, and Common-weale, &c. Over these she placed D. Bill Deane, whose successour was D. Gabriel Goodman, a right good man indeede and of singular integrity, an especiall Patron of my Studies. Within this Church are entombed (that I may note them also according to their dignity and time wherein they died) Sebert the first of that name, and first Christian King of the East-Saxons: Harold the bastard son of Cnutus the Dane, King of England: S. Edward King and Confessour, with his wife Edith: Maud, wife to King Henry the First, the daughter of Malcolme King of Scots: King Henry the Third, and his son, King Edward the First with Eleonor his wife, daughter to Ferdinando the first King*

But alas, how litle is that Monument in regard of so Noble and worthy a Lady: Who of her selfe is her owne Monument and that right magnificent.

Dukes, Earles, and other Nobles entombed in Westminster.

France in England, bestowed within a small guilt Urne over a Pyramid. Sir Charles Blount Earle of Devonshire, Lord Lieutenant Generall of Ireland. And (whom in no wife wee must forget) the Prince of English Poets Geoffry Chaucer: as also he that for pregnant wit and an excellent gift in Poetry of all English Poets came neere unto Edmund Spenser. Beside many others of the Clergy, and Gentlemen of quality.

There was also another College or Free-chapell hard by consisting of a Deane, and twelve Chanons, dedicated to Saint Stephen: which King Edward the Third in his princely Magnificence repaired with curious workmanship and endowed with faire possessions, so as he may seeme to have built it new what time as he had with his victories overrun and subdued all France, recalling to minde (as we read the Charter of the foundation) and pondering in a due weight of devout consideration the exceeding benefits of Christ, whereby of his owne sweet mercy and pity he preventeth us in all occasions, delivering us, although without all desert, from sundry perils, and defending us gloriously with his powerfull right hand against the violent assaults of our adversaries with victorious successes: and in other tribulations and perplexities wherein wee have exceeding much benee encombrd, by comforting us and by applying, and in-powering remedies upon us beyond all hope and expectation. There was adjoyning hereto a Palace, the ancient habitation of the Kings of England from the time of King Edward the Confessor: which in the Raigne of king Henry the Eighth, was burnt by casual fire to the ground. A very large, stately, and sumptuous Palace this was, and in that age for building incomparable, with a wawmure, and bulwarks for defence: The remaines whereof, are the Chamber, wherein the King, the Nobles, with the Counsellors and Officers of State, doe assemble at the high Court of Parliament, and the next unto it, wherein anciently they were wont to beginne the Parliaments, knowne by the name of Saint Edwards painted chamber, because the tradition holdeth that the said king Edward therein dyed.

But how finfull an Act, how bloody, how foule, how hainous, horrible, hideous, and odious both to God and man, certaine brute and savage beasts in mens shape enterprised of late, by the device of that Arch Traitor Robert Catesby, with undermining, and placing a mighty deale of gunpowder under these Edifices against their Prince, their Country and all the States of the Kingdome, and that under an abominable pretence of Religion, my very heart quaketh to remember and mentions nay, amazed it is and affonied but to thinke onely into what inevitable darknesse, confusion and wofull miseries, they had suddenly in the twinkling of an eye plunged this most flourishing Realme and Common wealth: But that which an ancient Poet in a smaller matter wrote, we may in this with grieve of minde utter:

*Excitat illa dies avo, ne postera credant
Secula, nos cervice taceamus, & obruta multa Nolle tegi propria patiamur crimina gentis.*

That cursed day forgotten be: no future age beleeve
That this was true: let us also at least wise now that live
Conceale the same, and suffer such Designes of our owne Nation
Hidden to be and buried quite in darknesse of oblivion.

Adjoyning unto this is the Whitehall, wherein at this day the Court of Requests is kept. Beneath this is that Hall, which of all others is the greatest, and the very Prætorium or Hall of Justice for all England. In this are the Judiciall Courts, namely: The Kings Bench, the Common Pleas, and The Chancery: And in places neere thereabout, The Star-Chamber, the Exchequer, Court of Ward, and Courts of the Dutchy of Lancaster, &c. In which at certaine set times (wee call them Termes) yearely causes are heard and tryed: whereas before king Henry the Third his dayes, the Court of common Law and principall Justice was unsetled and alwaies followed the kings Court. But he in the Magna Charta made a law in these words: Let not the Common Pleas follow our Court, but bee holden in some certaine place. Which notwithstanding some expound thus: That the Common Pleas from thenceforth bee handled in a Court of the owne by its selfe selfe a part, and not in the Kings Bench, as before. This Judgement Hall which we now have, king Richard the Second built out of the ground, as appeareth by his Armes engraven in the stone-woke, and many arched beames (when he had plucked downe the former old Hall that king William Rufus in the same place had built before) and made it his owne habitation. For kings in those daies sat in Judgement place in their owne persons: And they are indeed the ΔΙΚΑΣΤΗΡΑΙ, that is, Judges, whose mounth (as that Royall Writer saith) shall not erre in Judgement. But the foresaid Palace, after it was burnt downe in the yeare of our Lord 1512. lay desolate, and king Henry the Eighth translated shortly after the kings Seat from thence to an house not farre off, which belonged but a while before to Cardinall Wolsey, and is called White Hall. This house is a Princely thing: enclosed of the one side with a Park that reacheth also to another house of the kings named S. James (where anciently was a Spittle for Maiden Lepres) built by king Henry the Eighth, on the other side with the Tamis. A certaine Poet termed the foresaid House according to the English name thereof Leucaum in Latine, as appeareth in these Verfes:

— Regale subintrant
*Leucaum Reges (dederant memorabile quondam Atria, quæ nivo candebant marmore, nomen)
 Quod Tamisifis prima est cui gloria pascere cygnos Ledæos, rauco pronus subierat ætina.*

To Royall Palace Kings enter in, sometime LEUCUM high.

(This famous name those Courts it gave that shone with marble white)
 Hard under it with low-sound streame Tamis downe apace doth glide,
 A River feeding Swannes, wherein he takes especiall pride.

The Mues.

Hard by, neere unto the Mues so called, for that it serued to keepe Hawkes, at now is become a most faire Stable for the kings horses, there remaineth a monumēt in memoriall of that most pious and kinde Queene Aleonor, erected by king Edward the First her most dearly beloved husband: and certes the memory of her loving kindnesse shall remaine worthy to be consecrated to æternity. For she, the daughter of Ferdinand the Third, king of Castile, being given in marriage to the first king of England, accompanied him into the Holy Land: where, when she was secretly forelaid, and by a certaine Moore wounded with an envenomed sword, all the remedies that Physicians could devise was not so much eased as afflicted: she made to a cure strange I must needs say and never heard of before, howbeit full of love and affection. For, her Husbands wounds infected with the poison, and which by reason of malignity thereof could not bee closed and healed, shee day by day licked with her tongue, and sucked out the venomous humour which to her was a most sweet liquor. By the vigour strength whereof, or to say more truly, by vertue of a wifes lovely fidelity shee drew out all the substance of the poison, that the wounds being closed, and cicatrized, bee became perfectly healed, and shee caught no harme at all. What then can bee heard more rare, what more admirable than this womans faithfull love? That a wifes tongue thus annointed, all may say, with faith and love to her Husband, should from her well beloved draw those poisons, which by an approved Physician could not bee drawne: and that which many and the most exquisite medicines effected not, the love onely and piety of a Wife performed. Thus much Westminster joyntly with London (although as I have said, it is a City by itself, and hath a severall jurisdiction from it) because with continued buildings it is joyneth thereto, that it may seeme to be one and the same City.

Holborne.

Moreover, at the West end of the City, other Suburbs runne a great way in length, with goodly rowes of houses orderly ranged, as namely Holborne or rather more truly Oldborne: wherein stood anciently the first house of the Temple (now in the place now called Southampton house). But now there stand certaine houses, or Colleges of Students in the Common Law: and a City-habitation of the shops of Ely, well becoming Bishops to dwell in: for which they are beholden to John de Hotham Bishop of Ely under king Edward the Third.

At the North side likewise there be Suburbs annexed to the City, wherein Jerusalem

Briget a man very wealthy and devout built an house for the Knights Hospitallers of Saint Iohn of Ierusalem, which grew in time so great, that it resembled a Palace: and had in it a very faire Church and a Towre-steeple raised to a great height with so fine workmanship, that while it stood, it was a singular beauty and ornament to the City. These Knights Hospitallers at their first institution, about the yeare 1124. and long after, were so lowly all the while they continued poore, that their Governour was stiled Servant to the poore Servitors of the hospitall of Ierusalem, like as the Master of the Templars, who shortly after arose, was termed The humble Minister of the poore Knights of the Temple. This religious Order was instituted shortly after Geffery of Bollem had recovered Hierusalem. The Brethren whereof ware a white Crosse upon their upper blacke Garment, and by solemne Profession were bound to serve Pilgrimes, and poore people in the Hospitall of Saint Iohn at Hierusalem, and to secure the passages thither, they charitably buried the dead, they were continuall in prayer, mortified themselves with watchings and fastings, they were courteous and kinde to the poore whom they called their Maistres, and fed with white bread, while themselves lived with browne; and carried themselves with great austeritey. Whereby they purchased to themselves the love and liking of all sorts; and through the bounty of good Princes and private persons admiring their piety, and prowesse, they rose from this low degree to so high an estate, and great riches, that after a sort they wallowed in wealth. For they had about the yeare of our Lord 1240. within Christendome nine-reene thousand Lordships or Manours: like as the Templars nine thousand (the Revenues and rents whereof in England fell afterwards also to these Hospitallers). And this Estate of theirs growne to so great an height made way for them to as great honours, so as their Prior in England was reputed the * Prime Baron of the Land and able with fulnesse and abundance of all things to maintaine an honourable Port, untill that King Henry the Eighth advised by them, which respected their private profit, gat their lands and livings into his owne hands, like as hee did of the Monaisteries also. Albeit it was then declared that such religious places being of most pious intent consecrated to the Glory of God, might have beene according to the Canons of the Church, bestowed in exhibition and Almes for Gods Ministers, redreede of the poore, redemption of Captives, and repairing of Churches. Neere unto it, where now is to be scene a sightly circuit of faire houses, was the Charter-house, founded by Sir Walter Mauny of Henauke, who with singular commendation served under King Edward the Third in the French warres: and in that place heretofore was a most famous Cemetary, or buriall place in which in a plague time at London, were buried in the yeare 1349. more than 50000. persons: a thing recorded to posterity by an inscription which continued there a long time engraven in Brasse.

On this North-West side likewise London hath other great Suburbs, and there stood in old time a * Watchtowre or military Forefense, whence the place was of an Arabicke word called Barbacan, and by the gift of King Edward the Third became the dwelling house of the Vissords, from whom by the Willoughbbies it came to Sir Pengrine Bersey, Lord Willoughbbey of Eresby, a man noble and generous, and one of Mars his broode.

Neither lesse Suburbs runne out on the North-East and East. In the fields of which Suburbs, while I was first writing these matters, there were gotten out of the ground many urnes, funerall vessels, little Images, and earthen pots, wherein were small peeces of money coined by Claudius, Nero, Vespasian, &c. Glasse vials also and sundry small earthen vessels, wherein some liquid substance remained which I would thinke to bee either of that sacred oblation of Wine and Milke, which the ancient Romanes used when they burnt the dead, or else those odoriferous liquours that Saint mentioneth.

— Pharijque liquores Arfuram lavere comam.

And liquid baulmes from Egypt-land that came,
 Did wash his haire that ready was for flame.

This

This place the Romanes appointed to burne and bury dead bodies, who according to the law of the xij. Tables carried Coarles out of their Cities, and entered them by the high waies sides, to put Passengers in minde that they are, as those were, subject to mortality: Thus much of that part of the City which lieth to the Land.

Now for that side where the River runneth, toward the South banke thereof, the Citizens made a Bridge also over the Water reaching to that large Burrough of Southwarke, whereof I have already spoken: First, of wood in that place where before time they used for passage a ferry boat in stead of a Bridge. Afterwards, under the Raigne of King John they built a new Bridge with admirable workmanship of stone hewen out of the Quarry, upon 19. Arches, beside the draw-bridge, and furnished it on both sides with passing faire houses joyning one to another in manner of a Street, that for bignesse and beauty, it may worthily carry away the praise from all the Bridges in Europe.

In this Burgh of Southwarke, to speake onely of things memorable, there sometime a famous Abbay of Monkes, of Saint Benedict Order, called Burrough, consecrated in times past unto our Saviour, by Aldwin Childe Citizen of London: also a stately house built by Charles Brandon Duke of Suffolke, which having seen his turne but a small time, was shortly after pulled downe.

These are extant, Saint Thomas Hospitall, reedified or founded rather by the Citizens of London, for the sustenance of feeble and impotent persons: The Priory of the blessed Virgin Mary, called Saint Mary Over Rhe because it standeth beyond the River of Tamis in regard of London, erected by William Pont del Arche a Nunn for blacke Chanons. The Bishops house of Winchester built by William Gifford shop, for his Successours, about the yeare of our Lord 1107. From which along the Tamis banke there runneth Westward a continued ranche of dwelling houses, within our fathers remembrance was the Bordello or Lupanarie, for soche Latin terme those little roomes or secret chambers of harlots wherein they filthily polluted their bodies to sale, because they after the manner of ravening the-wolves hold of filly wretched men and plucke them into their holes. But these were prohibited by King Henry the Eighth, at which time England was growne to such lasciviousnesse and riot, which in other Nations are continued for gaine, under specious shew of helping mans infirmity: Neither, of these Strumpets and houses, doe I thinke that this place in our tongue tooke the name Stewes, but that Ponds or Stewes, which are heere to feed Pikes and Tenches far, and to scowm from the strong and muddy fennish taste. Heere have I scene Pikes panches opened with a knife to shew their fatnesse: and presently the wide gashes and wounds come together againe by the touch of Tenches, and with their glutinous slime perfectly healed up. Among these buildings there is a place in manner of a Theatre baiting of Beares and Bulls with Dogges: and certaine kenels appointed severally for Band-Dogges or Mailives, which are of that strength, and so sure of bit, that none of them are able to take and hold downe a Beare, and foure a Lion: so that the Poet in old time reported truly of our Dogges, in these words:

Tanrorum fracturi colla Britanni.

The British Dogges are able well,
To breake the neckes of Bulls so fell.

Like as he that said, they were more fierce than the Dogges of Arcadian kinde, which are thought to be engendred of Lions.

What time as the Bridge was thus made betweene London and this Burrough the City was not onely enlarged; but also an excellent forme of Common wealth was therein ordained, and the Citizens reduced into certaine distinct Corporations and Companies. The whole City divided into six and twenty Wards, and the Council of the City consisted of as many ancient men, named of their age in our tongue Aldermen, as one would say, Senatours, who each one have the overseeing and rule of his severall Ward: and whereas in ancient time they had for their Head-Magistrate, * Portreeve, that is, a Governour of the City, King Richard the First ordained two lives: in stead of whom soone after King John granted them liberty, to chuse by their voices yearly out of the twelve principall Companies a Major for their chiefe Magistrat: also two Sheriffes, whereof the one is called the Kings, the other the Cities Sheriffe. This forme of Common wealth being thus established it is incredible to tell how much London grew, and groweth still in publike and also private buildings, whiles all the Cities of England besides decreafe. For, to say nothing of that beautiful peece of worke, the Senate house named Guild Hall, built by Sir Thomas Knowles Major: Leaden Hall, a large and goodly building, erected by Simon Eire, to bee a common Garner in time of dearth to pull downe the price of Corne; the Merchants meeting place standing upon Pillars, which the common people call the Burse, and Queene Elizabeth with a solemne ceremony named The Royall Exchange, for the use of Merchants, and an ornament to the City, set up by Sir Thomas Gresham Citizen and knight; a magnificent worke verily, whether you respect the modull of the building, the resort of Merchants from all Nations thither, or the store of wares there. Which Sir Thomas Gresham, being withall an exceeding great lover of learning, consecrated a most spacious house his owne habitation to the furtherance of learning, and instituted there Professours of Divinity, Law, Physicke, Astronomy, Geometry, and Musicke, with liberall salaries and stipends; to the end that London might be a place not onely furnished with all sorts of Traffique, but also with the liberall Arts and Sciences. To passe over the House of the Society of the Hanse, commonly called the Stylard, as the Easterlings yard, and the waters conveyed by pipes under the ground, into all parts of the City, and very goodly conduits or cisternes castellated to receive the same: also the new conveyance of water devised by the skillfull travell of Pier Maurice a German, who by meanes of a forcer or wheele, with pipes placed at a certaine levell, brought water of late out of the Tamis into a great part of the City: To omit all these, I say, it is so adorned every where with Churches, that RELIGION and GODLINESS seem to have made choise of their residence herein. For the Churches therein amount to the number of one hundred twenty and one, more verily than Rome it selfe (as great and holy as it is) can shew. Besides Hospitals for diseased persons, it maintaineth also fixe hundred Orphane children or thereabouts, in Christ Church Hospitall, and poore people upon contribution of Almes about 1300. Be: A long time it would aske to discourse particularly of the good lawes and orders, of the laudable government, of the port and dignity of the Major and Aldermen, of their forward service and loyalty to their Prince, of the Citizens courtesie, the faire building and costly furniture, the breed of excellent and choise wits, their gardens in the Suburbs full of dainty arbours, and banquetting roomes, stored also with strange herbes from forraigne countries, of the multitude, strength and furniture of their ships, the incredible store of all sorts of Merchandise (two hundred thousand broad-clothes, beside other Wanerp alone hath received from hence every yeare) and of the superabundance of all things which belong to the furniture or necessity of mans life. For, right truly wrote that Hadrianus Junius in his Philippeis:

*Tectis opibisque repletum
Londinur; & si fas, numero so cibus superbam;
Larga ubi secundo rerum unda capta cornu.*

Thicke built with houses London is, with riches stuffed full;
Proud, (if we may so say) of men that therein live and dwell,
Wherein most plenteous wise abound all things that tongue can tell.

And Jul. Scaliger in his Poem of Cities.

LONDINUM gemino procurrit litore longè
 Æmula materna tollens sua lumina Troia
 Clementer surgente jugo dum tendis in ortum :
 Urbs per amena situ, caloque soloque beata.
 Urbs pietate potens, numeroſe cive ſuperba,
 Urbsque Britannorum quæ digna BRITANNIA dici.
 Hæc nova doctriſis Lutetia, mercibus Ormus, Aliera Roma viris, Chryſea ſecunda metallis.

Along both bankes out ſtretched farre the Citie LONDON lies Reſembling much her mother Troie, aloft ſhe liſts her cics, Whiles on agentle riſing hill ſhe beareth toward Eaſt :
 A City pleaſant for her ſite, in aire, and ſoile much bleſt.
 Religious, and populous : and hence ſhe looks on hie,
 And well deserves for to be cal'd the Britans Britannie.
 For learning new Lutetia, Ormus for Traffique mich,
 A ſecond Rome for valiant men, Chryſe for metals rich.

In this manner likewise verified Henry of Huntingdon in praise of London, King Stephen reigned, about foure hundered yeares ſince :

*Ibis & in noſtros dives Londonia verſus, Quæ nos immemores non finis eſſe iuſ.
 Quando tuas arces, tua memia mente retræſo,
 Quæ vidi, videor cuncta videre mihi.
 Fama loquax & nata loqui, moritura ſilendo,
 Laudibus erubuit fingere falſa iuſ.*

Thou alſo ſhalt of Verſes ours Rich London have thy part,
 For why? we cannot thee forget, ſo great is thy deſart.
 When I thinke of thy ſtately Towres, thy faire and ſpacious Wall
 Which I have ſcene, me thinkes therewith I ſee no * leſſe thanall.
 This praizing fame, that's borne to prate, and talk'd ſhe not would dye,
 In all the praife that goes of thee hath baſſ'd to tell one lye.

Another Poet in like manner pleaſantly played upon London in this ſort:

*Hæc Urbs illa potens, cui tres tria dona miniſtrant Bacchus, Apollo, Ceres, pocula, carmin, ador.
 Hæc Urbs illa potens, quam luno, Minerva, Diana Mercibus, arce, ſeris, ditat, adornat, aliis.*

This is that City ſtrong to which three gifts are given by three,
 By Bacchus, Ceres, and Phœbus, Wine, Whear, and Poetree.
 This place ſterne Palus, luno Queene, Diana Hunters-teer Adorn's, enricheth, and doth feed, with towres, with wares, with deer.

But in a more grave note and ſerious ſtile, a friend of mine and a praiſe worthy ſon, Maſter Iohn Iſton, Profeſſor of Divinity in the Kings Univerſity of S. Andrews.

*URBS AUGUSTA, cui calumque, ſolumque, ſalumque Cuique ſavens cunctis cuncta elementa bonis.
 Mitius haud uſquam calum eſt, uberrima Tellus
 Fundit inexhausti germina læta ſoli.
 Et pater Oceanus Tamisio gurgite miſſus, Convulſis immenſus totius orbis opes.*

*Regali cultu; ſedes clarifſima Regum Gentis præſidium, cor, anima, atque oculus.
 Gens antiqua, potens virtute & robore belli,
 Artium & omnigenium nobilitata opibus.
 Singula contemplare animo, aſſentiſque tuere,
 Aut Orbem aut Orbis dixeris eſſe caput.*

This City well AUGUSTA call'd, to which (a truth to ſay) Aire, Land, Sea, and all Elements, ſhew favour every way.
 The weather no where milder is, the ground moſt rich to ſee,
 Doth yeeld all fruits of fertile ſoile, that never ſpent will bee.
 And Ocean, that with Tamis ſtreame his flowing tyde doth blend Conveys to it commodities, all that the world can ſend.
 The noble ſeat of Kings it is for port and roialty,
 Of all the Realme the fence, the heart, the life, and lightſome ey.
 The people ancient, valorous, expert in chivalry,
 Enriched with all ſorts and meanes of Art and myſterie.
 Take heedfull view of every thing, and then ſay thus in brieſe,
 This either is a world it ſelfe, or of the world the chiefe.

But of theſe and ſuch like particulars Iohn Stowe Citizen of London, and a famous Chronicler hath diſcourſed more at large, and more exactly in that his Survey of London, which he lately published.

Now will I take my leave of my deere native Country, and bid London a diew, after I have given this onely note, that the Pole is here elevated ſittie one degrees, and foure and thirty ſcruples, and the Meridian diſtant from the fartheſt Weſt-poynt three and twenty degrees and five and twenty ſcruples. That the * Fidicula ſymbolizing in nature with Venus and Mercurie, is the Tropick ſtarre which glanceth upon the Horizon, but never ſetteth; and the Dragons head is reputed by Aſtronomers to be the Vertical ſtarre over head.

* From London, the Tamis watering Redcliffe, ſo called of the Red-cliffe, a prety fine Towne and dwelling place of Sailers, as he fetcheth almoſt a round compaſſe with a great winding reach, taketh into him the River Lea at the eaſt bound of this Countie, when it hath collected his divided ſtreame and cheriſhed fruitfull Mariſh-meadowes. Upon which there ſtanderh nothing in this ſide worth the ſpeaking of. For, neither Edmuntſon hath ought to ſhew, but the name derived of Nobility; nor Waltham, unleſſe it be the Croſſe erected there for the funerall pompe of Queene Eleonor Wiſe to King Edward the Firſt, whereof alſo it tooke name. Onely Enſeld a houſe of the Kings is here to be ſcene, built by Sir Thomas Lovel knight (of the order of the Garter and one of King Henry the Seventh his Privy Counſell) and Durance neighbour thereunto a houſe of the Wrotheſ of ancient name in this Countie. To Enſeld-houſe, Enſeld-chace is hard adjoining, a place much renowned for hunting: the poſſeſſion in times paſt of the Magnavils Earles of Eſſex, afterwards of the Bohuns who ſucceeded them: and now it belongeth to the Duchie of Lancaſter, ſince the time that Henry the Fourth King of England eſpouſed one of the daughters and coheires of Humfrey Bohun Earle of Hereford and Eſſex of that ſurname. And there are yet to be ſcene, in the middeſt well nere of this Chace, the ruubiſh and ruines of an old houſe, which the vulgar ſort ſaith was the dwelling place of the Magnavils Earles of Eſſex. As for the title of Middleſex, the Kings of England have vouchſafed it to none, neither Duke, Marquis, Earle, or Baron.

In this County, without the City of London, are reckoned Pariſhes much about 73.

Within the City, Liberties, and Suburbes. 121.

E S S E X.

E HE other part of the Trinobantes, toward the East called in the English Saxon tongue Eapto-beaxa, and Eapto-sex-ripe, in the Norman language Exsessa, of the situation toward the East, and the Saxons which inhabited it, and commonly Essex, is a Country large in compasse, fruitfull, full of Woods, plentifull of Saffron, and very wealthy: encircled, as it were, on the one side with the maine Sea, on the other with fishfull Rivers, which also doe afford their peculiar commodities in great abundance. On the North side, the River Stour divideth it from Suffolke, on the East the Ocean windeth it selfe into it: On the South part, the Tamis being now growne great secludeth it from Kent like as in the West part the little River Ley from Wiltshire, and Stort or Stour the lesse which runneth into it, from Hertfordshire. In describing of this Country, according to my methode begunne, first I will speake of the memorable places by Ley and the Tamis, afterwards of those that bee further within, and upon the Sea-coast.

C By Ley, in the English Saxon Tongue Lýgean, there stretcheth out a great way in length and breadth a Forest serving for game, stored very full with Deere, that for their bignesse, and fatnesse withall, have the name above all other. In times past called it was by way of excellency Foresta de Essex, now Walsham Forest, of the towne Walsham, in the Saxons speech Wealo-ham, that is, A wilde or woody habitation. This standeth upon Ley, where, by dividing h is Chanell hee maketh divers Eights or Islands, and is not of any great Antiquity to make boast of. For, when the Kingdome of the Saxons beganne to decay, one Towie, a man of great wealth and authority, as wee reade in the private History of the place, The Kings Staller, that is, Standard bearer, for the abundance of wilde beasts there, first founded it, and planted three-score and sixe indwellers therein. After his death Arhelstane his sonne quickly made a hand of all his goods and great estate: and King Edward the Confessor gave this Towne to Harold Earle Goodwins sonne: and freightwayes an Abbay was erected there, the worke and Tombe both of the said Harold. For, he being crept up by the error of men and his owne ambition to regall Dignity built this Abbay in honour of an Holy Crosse found farre Westward, and brought hither, as they write, by miracle. Heerein made he his prayers and vowes for victory when hee marched against Normans, and being soone after slaine by them, was by his mother, who had with most suppliant suite craved and obtained at the Conquerours hands his Corps, here entombed. But now it hath a Baron, namely Sir Edward Denny, called lately unto that honour by King James his Writ. Over this Towne upon the rising of an Hill standeth Copthall, and yeeldeth a great way off, a faire sight to feed mens eyes. This was the habitation in times past of Fitz-Ancher, and lately of Sir Thomas Henage Knight, who made it a very goodly and beautifull house. Neere unto this River also was seated, no doubt, Durolitum, a Towne of antique memory, which the Emperour Antonine maketh mention of, but in what place precisely, I am not able to shew. For, the ancient places of this County, (I tell you once for all before hand) lye hidden so enwrapped in obscurity, that I, who elsewhere could see somewhat, heerein, am heere more than dim-lighted. But if I may give my guesse, I would thinke that to have beene Durolitum, which retaining still some marke of the old name, is called at this day Leyton: that is, The Towne upon Ley, like as Durolitum in the British Tongue signifieth, The water Ley. A small Village it is in these daies, inhabited in scattering wise, five miles from London, for which five, through the carelesse negligence of transcribers is crept into Antonine xv.

That there was a common passage heere in times past over the River, a place nigh unto it called Oldfourd seemeth to proove, in which when Queene Maud wife to King Henry the First hardly escaped danger of drowning, shee gave order that a litle beneath, at Stretford, there should bee a Bridge made over the water. There, the River brancheth into three severall streames, and most pleasantly watereth on every side the greene meadowes: wherein I saw the remains of a litle Monastorie which William Montfichet, a Lord of great name of the Normans race built, in the yeere of our Lord 1140. and forthwith Ley gathering it selfe againe into one chanell mildely dischargeth it selfe in the Tamis, whereupon the place is called Leymouth.

The Tamis which is mightily by this time encreased, doth violently carry away with him the streames of many waters, hath a sight (to speake onely of what is worth remembrance) of Berking, which Bede nameth Berecing, a Nunnery founded by Kenwald Bishop of London, where Roding a little River entrencheth into the Tamis. This running hard by many Villages imparteth his name unto them, as Heigh Roding, Eithorp Roding, Leaden Roding, &c. of the which, Leefwin a Nobleman gave once two in times past, to the Church of Ely, for to expiate and make satisfaction for the wicked act hee had committed in murdering his owne mother: then, by Angre, where upon a very high Hill are the tokens of a Castle built by Richard Lay Lord Chiefe Justice of England in the Raigne of Henry the Second: of which Family, a daughter and one of the heires, King Iohn gave in marriage to Richard Rivers, who dwelt hard by at Stranford Rivers.

So it passeth by Lambourn Manour, which is held by service of the Wardliffe, viz. to carry a load of strawe in a Cart with sixe horses, two ropes, two men in barrowe wach the said Wardliffe when it is brought to the Towne of Aisbridge, &c. and then by Wansted Parke, where the late Earle of Leicester built much for his pleasure. In the mouth of this Roding, this Tamis hasteneth through a ground lying very flat low, and in most places otherwhiles overflowne, (whereby are occasioned fumes and unwholsome vapours exceeding hurtfull to the health of the neighbours inhabitants) to Tilbury: neere unto which there bee certaine holes in the rising of a chalky Hill, sunke into the ground tenne fathome deepe, the mouth whereof are narrow, made of stone cunningly wrought, but within they are large and spacious, in this forme, which hee that went downe into them described unto mee after this manner.

Of which I have nothing else to say, but what I have delivered already. As for Tilbury, (Bede nameth it Tilaburgh) it consisteth of some few cottages by the Tamis side, yet was it in ancient time the seate of Bishop Chad, when about the yeare of our Salvation 630. hee ingrafted the East-Saxons by Baptisme into the Church of Christ. Afterwards, this River passing by places lying flat and unwholsome, with a winding returne of his Water, severeth the Island CONVENNON, which also is called COUNOS, (whereof Ptolomee maketh mention) from the firme land. This hath not yet wholly foregone the old name, but is called Canvey. It lyeth against the Coast of Essex, from Leegh to Hole Haven, five miles in length: some part whereof appertaineth to the Collegiat Church of Westminster. But so low, that oftentimes it is quite overflowne, all save hillocks cast up, upon which the Sheepe have a place of safe refuge. For, it keepeth about foure hundred Sheepe, whose flesh is of a most sweet and delicate taste, which I have seene young lads taking womens function, with stooles fastened to their buttockes to milke, yea and to make Cheeses of Ewes milke in those dairy sheddies of theirs, that they call there Wiches.

There adjoyne to this Island along in order, first Beamsfleet, fortified with deepe and wide Trenches (as saith Florilegus) and with a Castle, by Hasting the Dane, which King Elfred wonne from them: Then Hadleigh, sometime the Castle of Hubert de Burgo, afterwards of Thomas of Woodstocke Duke of Glocester, now defaced with ruines: and in the last place Leegh, a proper fine little Towne and very full of stout and adventures Sailers: with Pritlewel fast by where Sveno de Essex built long since a Cell for Monkes. And here the land shooteth forward to make a Promontory, which they call Black-saile Point, and Shobery Nesse of Shobery a Village situate upon it; which sometime, was a City an Haven named Sceobirig. For, in old Annales of the English-Saxons wee read thus, The Danes being driven from Beamsfleet, goe to a City (called in East-SEX, called in the English Tongue Sceobirig, and there built themselves a sure and strong Fort. Heere by reason that the banks on both sides shrinke backe, the Tamis at a huge and wide mouth rowleth into the sea. This doth Ptolomee terme Estuarium TAMESÆ, and corruptly in some other Copies TAMESÆ, and we commonly, the Tamis Mouth.

More inward is Rochford placed, that hath given name to this Hundred: Now, it belongeth to the Barons Rich, but in old time it had Lords of ancient Nobility firnamed thereof: whose inheritance came at length to Builer Earle of Ormond and Wiltshire, and from them to Sir Thomas Bullen, whom King Henry the Eighth created Vicount Rochford, and afterward Earle of Wiltshire, out of whose Progeny sprung that most gracious Queene ELIZABETH, and the Barons of Hunsdon.

Heere I have heard much speech of a Lawlesse Court (as they called it) holden in a strange manner about Michaelmasse, in the first peepe of the day upon the first cocke crowing, in a silent sort; yet with shrowde fines eftsoones redoubled, if not answered, which servile attendance, they say was imposed upon certaine Tenants thereabout for conspiring there at such unseasonable time, to raise a commotion. But I leave this knowing neither the originall, nor the certaine forme thereof. Onely I heard certaine obscure barbarous rhymes of it. Curia de Domino Rege tenetur sine lege. Ave ornum solis, luceat, nisi polus, &c. not worth remembring.

Leaving the Tamis Banke, and going farther within the countrey, yea from West to East, these places of name above the rest standing thus in order shew themselves.

Havering an ancient retiring place of the Kings, so called of a Ring, which in that place a Pilgrime delivered as sent from S. J. Baptist (for so they write) unto K. Edward the Confessor: Horn Church, named in times past Cornutum Monasterium, that is, the horned Minister, for there shoot out at the East end of the Church certaine points of leade fashioned like hornes: Rumford, the glory whereof dependeth of a swine mercat; and Giddy-hall, an house adjoyning to it, which belonged to that Sir Thomas Cooke Major of London, whose great riches hoorded up together wrought him his greatest danger.

For, being judicially arraigned, (innocent man as he was) of high treason, and through the incorrupt equity of Judge Markham acquit in a most dangerous time, yet was he put to a very grievous fine, and stript in manner of all that he was worth: Brentwood called by the Normans Bou arse, in the same sense, and by that name King Stephen granted a Mercat and a Faire there, to the Abbat of S. Osib; and many years after Isabell Countesse of Bedford daughter to King Edward the Third build a Chappell to the memory of S. Thomas of Canterbury, for the ease of the Inhabitants: Engelstone a Towne of note for nothing else but the Mercat and Innes for Travellers.

Heere am I at a stand, and am halfe in a doubt whether I should now slip as an abortive fruite that conjecture, which my minde hath travailed with. Considering there hath beene in this Tract the City CÆSAROMAGUS, and the same doubtfull in the Romanes time of especiall note, and importance; for, the very name, if there were nothing else, may evince so much, signifying as it doth Cæsars City, as Drusus the City of Drusus, which also should seeme to have beene built in the honour of Cæsar Augustus. For, Suetonius writeth thus, Kings, that were in unity and league, founded every one in his owne Kingdome Cities named Cæsarea in honour of Augustus. What if I should say that CÆSAROMAGUS did stand neere unto Brentwood, would not a learned Reader laugh at me, as one Soothsayer doth when he speaketh another? Certes, no ground I have nor reason to strengthen this my conjecture from the distance thereof, seeing the numbers of the miles in Antonine be most corruptly put downe, which nevertheless agree well enough with the distance from COLONIA and CANONIUM. Neither can I helpe my selfe with any prooffe by the situation of it upon the Roman high-way, which in this enclosed country is no where to be seene. Neither verily there remaineth heere so much as a shadow or any twinkling shew of the name CÆSAROMAGUS, unlesse it be (and that is but very slender) in the name of an Hundred, which of old time was called Cæsarford, and now Cheasford Hundred. Surely, as in some ancient Cities the names are a little altered, and in others cleane changed: so there be againe, wherein one syllable or two are most bee remaining: thus CÆSARAUGUSTA in Spaine is now altered to be ragosa; CÆSAROMAGUS in France, hath lost the name cleane and is called Reims, and CÆSAREA in Normandy, now Cherbourg, hath but one syllable left of it. But what meane I thus to trifle, and to dwell in this point? If in this quarter hereby, there be not CÆSAROMAGUS, let others seeke after it for me: If I please my wit, I assure you, to finde it out, although I have diligently laid forth to meet with it with net, and toile both of cares and cics.

Beneath Brentwood I saw South-Okinon: where dwelt the Bruins a Family famous as any one in this Tract: out of the two heires female whereof, being many times married to sundry husbands, Charles Brandon Duke of Suffolke, the Tro Berners, Harlestones, Heveninghams and others descended. And of that house there males yet remaining in South-hampton-shire. Also, Thorndon, where Sir John Knight raised a goodly faire house, who now was by our Sovereigne King James created Baron Petre of Whittle. That Thorndon was in times past the dwelling place of a worshipfull Family of Fitzlewis: the last of which name if we may beleieve common report, by occasion that the house happened to be set on fire in the time of his wedding feast, was pitiously himselfe therein burnt to death, Burghsted and now short Bursted, that is, the place of a Burgh, which name our forefathers used to give unto many places that were of greater antiquity. This I once supposed to have been CÆSAROMAGUS: and what ever it was in old time, it is at this day but a good country Towne neere unto Bylricay, a Mercat towne of very good resort. Likewise Ashdowne, sometimes Affandun, that is, as Marian interpreteth it, the Mouth of Aff, where long since a bloody battaile was fought, in which King Edmund himselfe had at the beginning a good hand of the Danes and put them to rout, but straight waies the fortune of the field turning about, he was so defeated that he lost a great number of the English Nobility. In memoriall of which battaile we read that King Canutus the Dane built a Church afterward in that place, what time as upon

upon remorse and repentance for the blood that he had shed, hee erected Chappels in what part soever he had fought any field, and shed Christian blood.

Not farre from thefe, is Ralegh, a prety proper towne: and it seemeth to be Ragancia in Domesday booke, wherein is mention made of a Castle that Suenus heere built, in which also we read thus: There is one Parke and sixe Arpennes of Vineyard, and it yeeldeth twenty Modij of wine if it take well. Which I note the rather, both for the French word Arpen and also for the wine made in this Isle. This Suenus was a man of great name and of noble birth, the sonne of Robert, sonne of Wimarc, but father to Robert of Essex: whose son was that Sir Robert de Essex, who in right of inheritance was the Kings Standard bearer, and who for that in a light skirmish against the Welsh, hee had not onely cast off his courage, but also cast away his Standard, being chalenged for treason, vanquished in duell, or combat, and thereof thrust into a Cloystre, forfeited a goodly patrimony, and livelod, which was confiscate to King Henry the Second, and helped to fill his Coffers. As for the Barony, it lay dead from that time a great while in the Kings hands, untill Sir Hubert de Burgh obtained it of King John.

Above this the shores retiring backe by little and little admit two creekes of the Ocean entering within them: the one, the neighbour inhabitants call Crouch, the other Blackwater (which in old time was named Pant.) In the said Crouch, by reason of the waters division, there lie scattered foure Islands carrying a pleasant greene hew, but by occasion of inundations, growne to be morish and fenny, among which these two bee of greatest name, Wallos and Foulenesse: that is, The Promontory of Fowles, which hath a Church also in it: and when the sea is at the lowest ebbe, a man may ride over to it. Betweene these Creekes lieth Dengy Hundred, in ancient times Dannung, passing plentifull in grasse, and rich in Cattaille, but Sheepe especially where all their doing is in making of Cheefe: and there shall ye have men take the womens office in hand and milke Ewes: whence those huge thicke Cheefes are made that are vented and sold not onely into all parts of England, but into forraigne nations also, for the rustical people, labourers, and handicraftes men to fill their bellies, and feed upon. The chiefe Towne heereof at this day is Dengy, so called as the Inhabitants are perwaded, of the Danes, who gave name unto the whole Hundred: Neere unto which is Tiltingham, given by Ethelbert the first Christian King of the English-Saxons, unto the Church of Saint Paul in London: and higher up to the North shore, flourished sometimes a City of ancient Record, which our forefathers called Ishancester. For, Ralph Niger writeth thus out of S. Bede. Bishop Chad baptized the East-Saxons nere to Maldon in the City of Ishancester, that stood upon the banke of the River Pant, which runneth hard by Maldon, in Dengy Province; but now is that City drowned in the River Pant. To point out the place precisely I am not able, but I nothing doubt that the River called Freshwell at this day, was heerebefore named Pant: seeing that one of the Springs thereof is called Pantswell, and the Monkes of Coggeshall, so termed it. Doubtlesse, this Ishancester was situate upon the utmost Promontory of this Dengy Hundred, where in these daies standeth Saint Peters upon the wall. For, along this shore much a doe have the inhabitants to defend their grounds with forced banks or walls against the violence of the Ocean, ready to intrude upon them. And I my selfe am partly of this minde, that this Ishancester was that OTHONA where a Band of the Fortenses with their Captaine, in the declination of the Roman Empire, kept their station or Guard under the Comes or Lieutenant of the Saxon-shore, against the depredations of the Saxon Rovers: For the altering of OTHONA to ITHANA, is no hard straining: and the situation thereof upon a Creeke into which many Rivers are discharged, was for this purpose very fit and commodious, and yet heere remaineth a huge ruine of a thicke Wall, whereby many Romanes Coines have beene found.

It seemeth not amisse to set downe, how King Edward the Confessour graunted by a brieft Charter the keeping of this Hundred to Ranulph Peperking, which I will willingly heere annex, to the end that wee, who sit every pricke and accent of the law, may see the upright simpliciry and plaine dealing of that age. And thus goeth the the tenour of it, as it was taken forth of the Kings Records in the Exchequer, by often exemplifying and copying it out, some words are mollified and made more familiar.

Iche Edward Koning
Have given of my Forrest the keeping.
Of the Hundred of Chelmer and Dancing,
To Randolph Peperking and to his kindling :
With heorte and hinde, doe and bocke,
Hare and Foxe, Cat and Brocke,
Wild Fowell with his stocke,
Partrich, Fesant hen, and Fesant cocke :
With green and wilde stob and stocke.
To kepen and to yemen by all her might,
Both by day and eke by night
And Hounds for to hold
Good and swift and bolde :
Four Greahounds and six racches,
For Hare and Foxe, and wild Cattes.
And therefore ich made him my booke :
Witnesse the Bishop Wolston
And booke ylered many on,
And Swein of Essex our Brother
And taken him many other,
And our Steward Howelin
That by fought me for him.

This was, the plaine dealing, trueth, and simplicitie of that age, which make all their assurances whatsoever, in a few lines, and with a few gilt Circles. For, before the coming in of the Normans, as wee read in Ingulpbus, writing obligatory were made firm with golden crosses and other small signes or markes: but the men began the making of such Bills and Obligations, with a Print or Seale in wax, to which every ones speciall Signet under the expresse entituling of three or foure Witnesse, before many houses and land thereto passed by grant and bargain without script, Chartres, or book, onely with the Landlords sword or helmes, with his borne or cup. Tea and many Tunnals were demised with a spurte, or horse-cury-combe, with a bowe, and some with an arrow.

In the Creeke of Blackwater, which as I said, closeth the North side of this hundred, and is stored with those dainty Oysters, which wee call Wassell Oysters, be run two Rivers that water a great part of the Shire, Chelmer and Frohmell. The Chelmer flowing out of the inner part of the country which is woody, runneth the first by Thaxted a little Mercate Towne seated very pleasantly upon an high hill; also by Tihey, where Maurice Fitz-Gilbert founded in times past a small Abbey, unto Estantes ad Turrim, now Esston, which noble Gentleman surnamed De Turrim inhabited, as descended from Godfrey of Louaine brother to Henry the Sixth, the name Duke of Brabant, who being sent hither to keepe the Honor of Eye, his person flourished among the Peeres of this Realme to the time of King Edward the Third, when the heire generall was married into the house of Bourchier.

Thence it glideth downe to Dunmow, of old time called Dunmaw, and in the Tax booke of England Dunmaw, a Towne pleasantly situate upon an hill with a very gentle fall. Where, one Juga founded a Priory in the yeare 1111. But William de Ward, of whom Juga held (thus we finde it written in the private history of this Church) the Village of little Dunmow, by felony lost his Barony, and King Henry the First gave the same to Robert, sonne to Gislebert Earle of Clare, and to his heires, who had the honour of Bainards Castle in London: which Robert at that time was King Henrys brother. These be the very words of the Author: neither doe I thinke it lawfull for me to alter or reforme them otherwise than they are, although there be in them some anachronisms that is, a putting or mistaking of one time for another, a thing that we meet with otherwhiles in the best Historiographers. For, there had not beene, as then any Earle of Clare in the family of Clare.

Now let us for a while digresse and goe aside a little on either hand from the River. Not farre from hence is Plaist seated, so called in French of Pleasant, in times past, named Espre, the habitation both in the last yeeres of the English Saxons, and also afterwards, of the great Constables of England, as witnesseth Ely booke. At this towne the first William Mandevidill Earle of Essex beganne a Castle, and two Princes of great authority, Thomas of Woodstocke Duke of Glecester and Earle of Essex who founded heere a College, and John Holland Earle of Huntingdon brother to King Richard the Second by the mothers side, deprived of lost honorable title of Duke of Excester, when they could not keepe a meane betweene froward stubbernesse and servile obsequiousnesse, found thence their subversion. For Thomas, upon his rash and headstrong contumacy was on a sudden violently carryed from hence to Calice and there smothered: and John, for a sedicious conspiracy was beheaded in this place by King Henry the Fourth, that hee might seeme to have beene justly punished by way of satisfaction for the said Thomas of Woodstocke, of whose death hee was thought to bee the principall practiser, and procurer. From thence passeth Chelmer downe not farre from Lez, a little Abbay of old time founded by the Gernons, which at this day is the chiefe seat of the Barons Rich, who acknowledge themselves for this dignity beholden to Richard Rich a most wise and judicious person; Lord Chancellor of England under King Edward the Sixth, who in the first yeere of his raigne created him Baron Rich. A little beneath, standeth Hatfield Peverell, so denominated of Randolph Peverell the owner thereof, who had to wife a Lady of incomparable beaurty, in those daies, the daughter of Ingelricke a man of great nobility among the English Saxons: This Lady founded heere a College, which now is in manner quite plucked downe, and in a window of the Church, whereof there remaineth still a small part, lyeth entombed. She bare unto her husband William Peverell Castellane of Dover, Sir Peter Peverell Lord of Brus in the County of Cambridge: and unto King William the Conqueror whose Paramore shee was, William Peverell Lord of Nottingham. But now returne we to Chelmer, which by this time speedeth it selfe to Chelmerford commonly Chenisford (where, by the distance of the place from CAMALODUNUM, it may seeme that old CANONIUM sometimes stood). This is a good bigge Towne situate in the heart of the Shire betweene two Rivers, who as it were, agreed heere to joyne both their streames together: to wit Chelmer from the East, and another from the South, the name whereof if it be Can, as some would have it, we have no reason to doubt, that this was CANONIUM.

Famous it was within the remembrance of our fathers in regard of a small religious house built by Malcome King of Scots, now of note onely for the Assises (for so they call those Courts of Iustice wherein twice a yeere the causes and controversies of the whole County are debated before the Judges.) It beganne to flourish, when Maurice Bishop of London, unto whom it belonged, built the Bridges heere in the Raigne of Henry the First, and turned London way thither, which lay before through Writtle, a Towne right well knowne for the largenesse of the Parish: which, King Henry the Third granted unto Robert Brus Lord of Anandale in Scotland: (whose wife was one of the heires of John surnamed Scot, the last Earle of Chester) for that hee would not have the Earldome of Chester to bee divided among the distaves: and King Edward the Third, when as the posterity of the Bruses forsooke their allegiance, bestowed it upon Humphrey Bobun Earle of Hereford and of Essex. But now of late, when King James at his entrance to the Kingdome bestowed Barones bountifullly upon select persons, hee created Sir John Petre a right respective Knight, Baron Petre of Writtle. Whose father Sir William Petre a man of approved wisdom and exquisite learning, memorable not so much for those most honourable places and offices of State which hee bare, (as who was of the Privie Counsell to King King Henry the Eighth, King Edward the Sixth, Queene Mary, and Queene Elizabeth, and sent oftentimes in Embassage to forreigne Princes) as for that being bred and brought up in good learning, he well deserved of learning in the University of Oxford, and was both pitifull and bounteous to his poore neighbours about him and at Egerstone, where he lyeth buried.

Froshwell the River, more truly called Pant, and neere to his mouth, Blackwell issuing out of a small spring about Radwinter that belonged to the Barons of Colchester, after it hath gone a long course and scene nothing but Bocking a far Parsonage, commeth to Cogeshall, a Mercate Towne, well knowne in times past for a Priory, Cluniacke Monkes built by King Stephen, and the habitation of ancient Kings thence surnamed De Cogeshall, from whose heire generall marryed into the old family of Tirell, there branched farre a faire propagation of the Tirells in this land and elsewhere. Then goeth on this water by Easterford, some call it East-Surford, and leaving some mile of Whitbam a faire through-faire and built by King Edward the elder, in the yeere 914. which also afterward was of the Honour of Earle of Balden; meeteth at length with Chelmer. Which now passing on which one channell not farre from Danbury mounted upon an high Hill, the habitation a time of the family of the Darcies, runneth hard by Woodham-walters, the ancient seate of the Lords Fitz-Walters: who being nobly descended were of an ancient race, derived from Robert the younger sonne of Richard sonne to Earle Godbert: but in the age more lately foregoing, translated by a daughter into the hands of the Ratcliffes, who being advanced to the Earldome of Sussex dwell now here from hence in New Hall, a stately and sumptuous house. This New Hall appeared sometime to the Buslers Earles of Ormond, and then hereditarily to Sir Thomas len Earle of Wiltshire, of whom King Henry the Eighth getting it by way of change, enlarged it to his exceeding great charges, and called it by a new name, lien, which for all that was never currant among the people. After this, Chelmer with other waters running with him, being divided by a River-Island, called that name, and now being called of some Blacke-water and of others Pant, Blackwell that ancient Colony of the Romanes CAMALODUNUM, which many hundred yeeres since adorned this shore. Ptolemee tearmeth it CAMUDOLANUM, Antonine CAMULODUNUM and CAMOLUDUNUM: But, Pliny, Dio, and an old marble stone, induce us to beleeeve that CAMALODUNUM is the right name. In the seeking out of this City, good God, how dim-sighted have some been: whereas it bewraied it selfe by the very name and situation; and shewed it selfe cleerely to them that are halfe blinde: A number have searched for it in the West part of this Isle, as that good man, who thought himselfe to carry, as one will say, the Sunne of Antiquity in his owne hand: others in the furthest part of England: others wholly addicted in opinion to Leland affirmed it to bee Calden: when as (the name scarce any whit maimed) it is called at this day, in stead of CAMALODUNUM, Maldon, in the Saxon Tongue Walesune, and Walesune the greater part of the word remaining yet entire and in use. Neither hath the expense remaine of the name onely perswaded me to this, but also the distance seldome in Pliny from Mona, and the very situation in the ancient Itinerary Table doe afford a most evident prooffe thereof. That this name was imposed upon CAMALODUNUM, of the God CAMULUS, I hardly dare imagine. Howbeit the Lords was worshipped under this name Camulus, both an old stone at Rome in the Colostians, and Altars discovered with this Inscription CAMULO DEO SANCTO ET FORTISSIMO, that is, TO CAMULUS THE HOLY AND MOST MIGHTY GOD, doe joyntly proove. And in an antique Coine of Obobellinus, whose royall Palace this was, (as I have already said) I have seene the portrait stamped of an head having an helmet on it, also with a speare, which may seeme to be that of Mars, with these letters, CAMV. But seeing this peece of money is now ready at hand to shew, I exhibite here unto you other expresse portraits of Obobellinus his peeces, which may be thought to have reference to this Camalodunum.

Camulus a God.

This Camobelin governed this East part of the Isle in the time of Tiberius the Emperour, and seemeth to have had three sonnes, Admimus, Togodannus, and Cassius. Admimus by his father banished, was entertained by Caius Caligula the Emperour what time as he made his ridiculous expedition into Batavia, that from thence he might blow, and breath out the terrour of his owne person over into Britaine. As for Togodannus, Aulus Plautius in a set battaile defeited and slew him, and over Cassius, whom, as I said, he discomfited and put to flight, hee rode ovan in petty triumph. This is that Plautius, who at the perswasion of C. Verisus, the Britaine a banished man (for there never want quarels one or other of Warre) was the first after Iulius Caesar that attempted Britaine under Claudius: whom Claudius himselfe, having shipped over the Legions, followed in person with the whole power of the Empire, and with Elephants (the bones of which beasts being found, have deceived very many) hee passed over the Tamis and put to flight the Britans, who upon the bank received and encountered him as he came toward them; and wonne with ease this Camalodunum the Kings seat. For which exploit after hee had named his sonne BRITANNICUS, and beene himselfe oftentimes saluted Imperator, within fixe months after he set first forth in his voyage, returned to Rome. But heereof have I have written before more at large, neither list I to iterate the same in this place.

Claudius in Britannia.

When Camalodunum was thus brought under the Romanes subjection, Claudius planted a Colony there with a strong Band of old tried Souldiers, and in memoriall beereof ordained peeces of money to be stamped with this Inscription: COL. CAMALODUN. Out of which it is gathered, that this happened in the xii. yeere of his Empire, and in the yeere 52. after the Birth of Christ. And in regard of those old experienced souldiers of the fourteenth Legion called Gemina Martia Victrix, whom Tacitus tearmeth the Subduers of Britaine, brought thither and placed in it, it was named COLONIA VICTRICENSIS, and the Inhabitants Cives Romanes, that is, Citizens of Rome, in an old Inscription, which I heere present to you.

Servius.

A Colony (if it may be materiall to know so much) is A Company of men that have brought into one certaine place, built with houses to their hands, which they have and hold by a certaine right. For the most part, old souldiers that had served long, were brought to such a place, both that themselves might be provided for, and maintained, and also be ready in all extremity to helpe against Rebels, and enforce withall the Provincials in their duties by law required. These Colonies also were of great estimation, as being pety resemblances and images, as it were, of the City of Rome. Moreover they had their peculiar Magistrates both superior and inferior, of which because others have written sufficiently, I neede not to stand either upon them, or such like points. In this first Colony that the Romanes planted in Britaine, there was a Temple built unto * Divus Claudius, Tacitus tearmeth it, The Altar of small dominion, Whereof Seneca maketh mention in his Play, after this manner. A good matter it is, faith hee, and not sufficient, that Claudius hath a Temple in Britaine which the Barbarous Nation adores, and prayeth unto, as to a God. There were Priests also elected in honour of him, by name Sodales Augustales, which under a shew of Religion lavishly consumed the Britans goods. But after ten yeeres, fortune turned her wheel, and downe went this Colony. For, when those old souldiers brought into the territories which they had won, exercised extreame cruelty upon these filly people, by burning broiles of Warre which before were quenched brake out into flames, with greater flashes. The Britans under the leading of Boudnica, who also is called Boadicea, by maine force sacked and set on fire this Colony, lying unfortified and open all fence, and within two daies wonne the said Temple whereinto the souldiers had thronged themselves. The Ninth Legion comming to aide, they put to flight, and in one word slew of Roman Citizens and associates together threescore and three thousand. This slaughter was foretold by many Prodigies. The Image of Minerva in this City was turned backward and fallen downe: In their Senate house strange noises were heard: The Theater resounded with howlings and yellings: Hausum seene under the water of Tamis, and the Arme of the sea beneath it overthrew the bankes as red as blood to see to, which now (for what cause I know not) we call Blacke water, like as Pisilome termed it DUMANUM, under which name he ched a signification of Blacknesse: for, Tdu, in the British tongue soundeth much like Blacks. Yet, out of the very embers, the Romans raised it againe: For, Antonine the Emperour made mention of it many yeeres after. Howbeit in the English Saxon government it is scarce mentioned: Onely Marianus hath writtten, that Edward the sonne of Alfred repaired Maldun when it was fore shaken by the furious rage of the Dines, and then fortified it with a Castle. William the Norman, Conquerour of England, as we reade in his * Commentary, had in this Towne 180 houses in the time of occupation of Burgesses, and 18. Mansions wasted. But at this day, for the want of the Inhabitantes, and the bignesse, it is worthily counted one of the principal Townes in all Essex, and in Records named, The Burgh of Maldon.

It is a Haven commodious enough, and for the bignesse very well inhabited, being but one especiall street descending much about a mile in length. Upon the top of an hill answerable to the termination of Dunum which signified an high, and the situation, wherein I saw nothing memorable, unless I should mention two filly Churches, a desolate place of White Friars, and a small pile of Bricke built not long since by R. Darcy, which name hath bene respective heereabout.

Hence passing downe over the blackish water divided into two streames, by Higbbridge, I sought for an ancient place which Antonine the Emperour placed five miles from Camalodunum, in the way toward Suffolke, and called it Ad ANSAM.

This I have thought to have bene some Bound belonging to the Colony of Camalodunum, which resembled the fushion of Ansa, that is, The handle or ear of a pail. For, I had read in Siculus Flaccus, The Territories lying to Calanias were limited with drivers and sundry markes: In the limits there were set up for bound markes heere and there, and there another: in one place little Images, in another long earthen Vessels: here you should have little sword-blades, three square stones or Lozenges pointed, and elsewhere

The bounds of Colonies.

A writing to Vitalis and Arcadius; they were mere stones like flagons and small wine pipes: why might not therefore a stone fashioned like the handle of a pot bee set for a bound? Seeing that Antonius according to his wonted manner called it Ad Ansam, and not Ansa? But how religiously and with what ceremoniall complements, these bound-markes were in old time set, I will by way of digression set downe heere out of the same Siculus Flaccus. When they were to place their bound markes, the very stones themselves they did set upon the firme ground, hard by those places wherein they ment to pitch them, in pits or holes digged for the purpose, they annointed them and with wailes and goads bedecked them. This done, in those pits wherein they were to put them, after sacrifice made, and an unsported beast killed, upon burning firebrands covered over in the grave, they dipped in bloud, and thereupon they threw Frankincense and corne, Hony combs also and wine with other things, as the manner is to sacrifice unto gods of bounds and limits, they threw after the rest into the said pit. Thus when all these Vlands were consumed with fire, they pitched the said bound markes upon the hot ashes thereof, and so with carefull diligence fastened them strongly, and rammed them round about with fragments of stones, that they might stand the surer. But in what place soever this Ad Ansam was, I betake my selfe againe to my former opinion for the signification of the word: namely, that Ad Ansam was either a bound marke, or onely, a resting place or some Inne by the high way side under such a signe: and that I collect by the distance to have bene neere unto Cogeshall. Neither were they any things else but bound markes or Innes, that in the Romane age were named after the same forme of speech, Ad Columnam, Ad Fines, Ad vires, Tabernas, Ad Rotam, Ad septem Frates, Ad Aquilam minorem, Ad Herculem, &c. that is, At the Pillar, At the Bounds, At the three Taverns, At the Wheele, At the seven Brethren, At the lesse Eagle, At Hercules, &c.

Cogeshall.

And therefore to search more curiously into these matters, were nothing else but to hunt after the windes. Yet I will heere impart what I incidently happened upon in a private note, while I was inquisitive heereabout for Ad Ansam. In a place called Westfield three quarters of a mile distant from Cogeshall and belonging to the Abbey there, was found by touching of a plough a great brasen Pot. The Ploughmen supposing it to have bene hid treasure, sent for the Abbot of Cogeshall to see the taking up of it, and hee going thither met with Sir Clement Harleston; and desired him also to accompany him thither. The mouth of the Pot was closed with a white substance like paste or clay, as hard as burned bricke, when that by force was removed, there was found within it another Pot but that was of earth; that being opened there was found in it a lesser Pot of earth of the quantity of a Galkon covered with a matter like Velvet, and fastened at the mouth with a silke-lace. In it they found some whole bones and many peeces of small bones wrapped up in fine silke of fresh colour, which the Abbot tooke for the Reliques of some Saints, and layed up in his Vestuary. But this by way of digression, leaving it to your consideration.

From Malden the Shores drawne backe interraine the Sea in a most large and pleasant Bay, which yeeldeth exceeding great store of those Oysters of the best kinde, which we call Wasseles. And (that our Coasts should not be defrauded of their due fame and glory) I take these to bee those very Shores, which, as Pliny saith, served the Romanes Kitchens: seeing that Mutianus giveth unto British Oysters the third place after those of Cizicum; in these very words of his: The Oysters of Cizicum be greater than those that come from Lucrinum, and sweeter than they of Britaine.

But neither at that time, nor afterwards, when Sergius Orata brought those Lucrine Oysters into such name and great request, did the British Shores, as hee saith, serve Rome with Oysters. So that hee may seeme to have given the chiefe price unto British Oysters. Neither thinke I were those Oysters other than these which Aulus called Adra, that is, Wonderfull, in this Verse to Paulinus.

Lib. 9. cap. 54.

Mira Caledonius nonnunquam desegit astus.

The British Tides sometimes lay bare,
Those Oysters huge, that wonderous are.

But

But, of these Oysters and of their pits or stewes in this Coast I will give thee leave to write, who being deinty toothed are judicious Clerkes in Kitchentry.

Into this Creeke, beside other Rivers, Coln sheddeth himselfe, which groweth to an head out of divers Springs in the North part of this Countrey, passeth by the Towne of Hedningham or Hengham, commonly called Heningham, where was a goodly faire proper Caste in times past, and the ancient habitation of the Earles of Oxford who procured a Mercat thereunto. Over against which, upon the other side of the River standeth Sibble Heningham, the place, as I have heard say, wherein was borne Sir Iohn Hawkwood (the Italians corruptly call him Ancutbus) whom they highly admired for his warlike prowesse, that the State of Florence in regard of his notable demerites adorned him with the statue of a man of Armes and an honorable Tombe, in testimony of his surpassing valour and singular faithfull service to their state. The Italians reſound his worthy Acts with full mouth, and Paulus Iovius in his Elogia commendeth him. But for my part it may suffice to adde unto them this Tetrasticon* of Inlius Feroldus.

Hawkwood Anglorum decus, & decus addite genti Italica, Italico presidiumque solo.

*Ut tumuli quondam Florentia, sic simulacri,

The glory prime of Englishmen, then of Italians bold,
O Hawkwood and to Italy a sure defensive hold:
Thy vertue Florence honoured sometime with costly grave,
And Iovius adorn's the fame now with a statue brave.

This renowned Knight thus celebrated abroad, was forgotten at home, for that some of his kinde souldierly followers founded a Chantery at Castle Hengham for him and for two of his military Companions, Iohn Oliver and Thomas Kene Equires.

From hence the River Coln, holding on his course by Hawsted, which was of the Family of the Bauchiers, whence came Robert Bauchier Lord Chamberlain of England in the time of King Edward the Third, and from him sprang a noble Progeny of Earles and Barons of that name. Thence by Earles Coln (so called of the Sepulture there of the Earles of Oxford) where Aubrey de Vere in the time of King Henry the First founded a little Monastery and became himselfe a religious Monke, it comes to Colonia, whereof Antonine the Emperour maketh mention, and which he noteth to bee a different place from the Colony Casualodunum. Whether this tooke name of a Colony hither brought, or of the river Coln, which selfe had neede to tell us: I would rather derive it from the river, seeing, that many little Townes situate upon it, are named Coln. A Earles Colne, Walden Colne Engaine, Whites Colne, bearing the names all of their Lords. The Britons led this Caer Coln, the Saxons Colceaster, and wee Colchester. A proper Burrough it is, well traded and pleasantly seated, as being situate upon the bank of an hill, stretching out from West to East, walled about, beautified with 15. Churches besides that large and stately one, without the walles, which Enda Senn in the time of King Henry the First consecrated unto Saint Iohn, now ruined, and converted into a private dwelling house. In the midst of the Towne, there is a Castle now ready to time ready to fall: which as our Historians write, Edmund the sonne of Alfred raised from the ground, what time as he repaired Colchester defaced with walle long after Maud the Emperesse gave it to Alberic Vere to assure him to her Party.

The infinite deale of ancient Coine daily gotten out of the ground there doth most plainly shew that this flourished in the Roman time in happy estate. Yet have light of no peeces more ancient than of Gallienus. For the most were such as had upon them the Inſcriptions of the Tetrici, and the Victorini, of Posthumus, C. Causus, Constantine, and the Emperours that followed him. The Inhabitants affirme, that

Flavia Julia Helena the mother of Constantine the Great was borne and bred there, being the daughter of King Coch, and in memory of the Crosse which shee found, they give for their Armes a Crosse enrailed betweene foure Crownes: whence it is, that our Neckham as touching her, and this place came out with these Verses, although Apelle was not greatly his friend therein,

Effulsiſt sydus visæ, Colceſtria lumen

Septem Climatis lux radiosa dedit.

Sydus erat Constantinus, decus imperiale

Servij huic flexo poplite Roma potens.

From out of thee, O Colchester, there shone a Starre of life,
The raies whereof to Climats seven gave great and glorious light,
This Starre was Constantine the Great, that noble Emperour, Whom Rome in all obedience lay prostrate to adore.

Verily shee was a woman of life most holy, and of invincible resolution and constancy in propagation of Christian Religion: Whereupon in ancient Inſcriptions she is every where named PIISSIMA, and VENERABILIS AUGUSTA, that is, Most Devout, and VENERABLE EMPRESSE. Beneath this, where the River Coln runneth into the Sea, standeth to be seene Saint Osbert, a little Towne, whose ancient name, which was Chic, is growne out of use by reason of Osib the Virgin of royall Parentage, who being wholly devoted to the Service of God, and stabbed there to death by the Danish Pirates, was of our Ancestours honoured for a Saint: and in her memoriall Richard Bishop of London about the yeare 120. built a religious house, of Regular Chanons. But now it is the chiefe seate of the right honourable Lords Darcy, called De Chic, whom King Edward the Sixth advanced to the honour of Barons when hee created Sir Thomas Darcy his Counsellour, Vice chamberlaine, and Captaine of the Guard, Lord Darcy of Chic.

From hence the Shore shooting out, buncheth forth as farre as to the Promontory Nesse, which in the English-Saxon tongue is called Eadulphes merr. What hath beene found in this place, have heere out of the words and credit of Ralph the Monke of Coggeshall, who wrote 350. yeares agoe. In King Richard's time, on the Sea shore, as a Village called Eadulphesse, were found two teeth of a certaine Giant, of such a bignesse, that two hundred such teeth as man have now a daies might bee cut out of them. These saw I as Coggeshall (quoth hee) and not without wondering. And such another Giantlike thing (I wot not what) as this, was in the beginning of Queene Elizabeth's Raige digged up by R. Candish a Gentleman, neere unto this place. Neither doe I deny, but there have beene men, that for their huge bodies, and firme strength were wonderful to behold: whom God, as S. Austin saith, would have to live upon the earth, thereby to teach us, that neither beauty of body, nor staleness of stature, are to be counted simply good things, seeing they bee common as well to Infidels as to the godly. Yet may we very well thinke, that which Suetonius hath written, namely, that the huge limmes of monstrous Sea-creatures else where, and in this Kingdome also, were commonly said and taken to have beene Giants bones.

From this Promontory, the shore bendeth backe by little and little to the mouth of Stowe, a place memorable for the battaile at Sea there fought betweene the English and Danes in the yeare 884. where now lyeth Harewich a most safe Road, whence it hath the name: For, hæp in the English-Saxon tongue, betokeneth a Station, or a creeke where an Army encamped. The Towne is not great, but well peopled, fortified by Art and Nature, and made more sensible by Queene Elizabeth. The salt water so creeke about it, that it almost insulateeth it, but thereby maketh the Springs so brackish, that there is a defect of fresh water, which they fetch some good way off.

This is the Stowe, that running betweene Essex and Suffolke serveth as a bound to them both, and on this side watereth nothing else but rich and fruitful fields:

But not farre from the head thereof standeth Bumhead, which the Family of Barony held by Barony, from whom the Wentworths of Gosfield are descended.

And what way this Country looketh toward Cambridge-shire Barlow Barlow it selfe, well knowne now, by reason of foure little hills or Barries cast up by mans hand: such as in old time were wont to be raised (so some would have it) as Tombes for Soldiers slaine, whose Reliques were not easie to be found. But when a fifth and sixth of them were not long since digged downe, three troughes of stone were found, and in them broken bones of men, as I was informed. The country people say that they were reared after a field there fought against the Danes. For, Danes which with bloud-red berries, commeth up heere plenteously, they still call by another name than Dane-bloud, of the number of Danes that were there slaine, yearly beleiving that it blometh from their bloud.

A little below standeth upon a hill Walden of Saffron, called Saffron Walden, among the fields looking merrily with most lovely Saffron. A very good Merchetowne incorporated by King Edward the Sixth with a Treasurer, two Chamberlaines and the Commonalty. Famous in times past it was for a Castle of the Magnavilles (which now is almost vanished out of sight) and an Abbey adjoyning, founded in the very commodious in the year 1136: wherein the Magnavilles founders thereof were buried. Geffrey de Magnavilla was the first that gave light and life (as it were) to this place. For Maude the Empreſſe in these words (out of her very Patent they) gave unto him Newport (a good bigge Towne, this is hard by). For John a beaumas wont to pay that day whereon (as her words are) my father King Henry was slaine dead: and to remove the Mercat from Newport into his Castle of Walden, with all the flomes that before time in better manner appertained to that Mercat, to wit in Toll, pay and other customes, and that the waies of Newport were unto the water banks be straight according to the old custome into Walden, upon the ground forfeited unto us: at that the Mercat of Walden be kept upon Sunday and Thursday: and that a Fair be kept at Walden to begin on Whitsunday even, and to last all the Whitsun weeke. (And from that time, by occasion of this Mercat, for a great while it was called Cheping Walden, as it is in the Booke of Walden Abbey, but the said Geffrey appointed Walden to be the principall place and seat of his honour and Earldome for him and his Successors. Whith where hee built the Abbey had plenty of waters, which rising there continually detoured never faille. Late it were the Sunne riseth and shineth there, and with the foonest beards for carry away his light, for that the hilles on both sides stand against it.

That place now they call Audley End, of Sir Thomas Audley Lord Chancellor of England, who changed the Abbey into his owne dwelling house. This Time, created by King Henry the Eighth Baron Audley of Walden, left one sole daughter at heire Margaret, second wife to Thomas Howard Duke of Norfolk, of whom descended Lord Thomas, Lord William, Lady Elizabeth, and Lady Margaret. The said Thomas employed in sundry Sea-services with commendation Queene Elizabeth Queen by Writ unto the High Court of Parliaments, among other Barons of the Realm, by the name of Lord Howard of Walden. And King James of late girded him with the sword of the Earldome of Suffolke, and made him his Chamberlaine: Whith place hath begunne a magnificent Building. Neere to another house of Whith Sturford, there was a Towne of farre greater antiquity, hard by Walden, in the border of the Shire, which now of the old Burgh, the rustick people call Burrow Bank, where remaine the footings onely of a Towne lying in Walden, and the manifest tract of the very walles. Yet will I not say, that it was Walden FAUSTINI, which Antonine the Emperour placeth in this Tract: and Antonine Ingrata hand leti spacia destinet campi, Sed rure vero, barbarique latantur.

It takes not up large ground that yeelds no gaine,

But Country like, is homely rude and plaine:

Yet dare not I once dreame that this is that Villa Faustini, which in these and other Verses is by that pleasant and conceited Poet Martiall, depicted in his Epigrams. The fieldes heere on every side (as I said) smell sweetly, and smile pleasantly with Saffron, a commodity brought into England in the time of King Edward the Third. This in the moneth of July every third yeere, when the heads thereof have been plucked up and after twenty daies spitted or set againe under mould, about the end of September they put forth a whitish blew flower, out of the middle whereof there hang three redde fillets of Saffron (we call them Chives) which are gathered very early in the morning before the Sunne rising, and being plucked out of the flower, are dried at a soft fire. And so great increase commeth heereof that out of every acre of ground there are made fourescore or an hundred pounds weight of Saffron, while it is moist: which being dried yeelds some twenty pound in weight. And that, which a man would marvell more at, the ground which three yeeres together hath borne Saffron, will beare abundance of Barley eightene yeeres together without any dunging or manuring, and then againe beare Saffron as before if the inhabitants there have not misinformed me, or I misconceived them.

More into the South is Clavering seated, which King Henry the Second gave unto Sir Robert Fitz-Roger (from whom the family of Evers are issued.) The posterity of this Sir Roger, after they had a long time taken their name of their fathers forename, or Christen-name according to that ancient custome, as John Fitz-Roger, Robert Fitz-John, &c. afterwards, by the commandement of King Edward the First, they assumed from hence the name of Clavering. But of these I am to speake in Northumberland. Stansted Montfitchet heere also putteth up the head: which I will not passe over in silence, considering it hath been the Baronic or habitation in times past of the family De Monte Fixo, commonly Montfitchet, who bare for their Armes three Chevrons Or, in a shield Gules, and were reputed men of very great nobility. But five of them flourished in right line: and at the last three sisters were seized of the inheritance, Margaret wife of Hugh De Boleber, Aveline wedded to William De Foribus Earle of Amurle, and Philip wife to Hugh Playz. The posterity male of this Hugh flourished within the remembrance of our great Grandfathers, and determined in a daughter married to Sir John Howard Knight, from whose daughter by Sir George Vere, descended the Barons Laimir, and the Wingfeldes.

And a little below, is Hastingsbury to be seene, the residence of the Barons Mortley: of whom I shall speake more in Norfolk. And close to this, standeth an ancient Fort or Military tenſe thereof named Walbery: and more East-ward Barrington Hall, where dwelleth that right ancient Family of the Barringtons, which in the Raigne of King Stephen the Barons of Montfitchet enriched with faire possessions, and more ennobled their house in our fathers remembrance by matching with one of the daughters and coheires of Sir Henry Pole, Lord Montacute, sonne of Margaret Countesse of Salisbury, descended of the Bloud Royall.

Neither is Hatfield Regis, commonly called of a broad spread Oke, Hatfield Brad-oke to be omitted, where Robert Vere Earle of Oxford built a Priory, and there lieth entombed crosse-legged with a French inscription, wherein he is noted to be first of that name Robert, and third Earle of Oxford.

After the coming of the Normans, Maude the Empreſſe, Lady of the English (for so shee stiled herselfe) created Geffrey De Magnavilla, usually called Mandeville, son to William by Margaret daughter and heire of Endo the Steward or Shewar, the first Earle of Essex, that shee might so by her benefits oblige unto her a man both mighty and martiall. Who in those troublesome times under King Stephen depoyled of his estate made an end of his owne turbulent life with the sword. And heeverily for his wicked deeds (as I finde in an old Writer) justly incurred the worlds censure and sentence of excommunication: in which while hee stood, hee was deadly wounded in the head at a little Towne called Burwell. When he lay at the point of death ready to give his last gaspe there came by chance certaine Knights Templars, who laid upon him the habit of their religious Profession signed with a red Crosse, and afterwards when hee was full dead, taking him up with them, enclosed him within a Coffin of Lead, and hunge him upon a tree in the Orchard Orchard of Old Temple at London. For in a reverent awe of the Church they durst not bury him, because he dyed excommunicated. After him succeeded Geffrey Fitz-Pierre, who was restored by Henry the Second to his fathers honours and Estate for himself and his heires; but he having no children left them to his brother William, who by his wife was also Earle of Albemarle, and dyed likewise in his greatest glory and lesse. Some yeares after K. John promoted Geffrey Fitz-Pierre, Justicer of England, wife and grave Personage unto this honour in consideration of a great masse of money and Title by his wife Beatrice the eldest daughter of William de Say, who was the sisters sonne of that great Geffrey de Magnavill, the first Earle of Essex. The Fitz-Pierre, a man (as an old Authour writeth) *Passing well monied had formerly with the Bishop of Ely the Kings chiefe Justicer, for a great peece of money presently paid by intreaty beside; and then claimed, and demanded the Earledome in his wifes right, giving the daughter of William Say eldest brother to Geffrey Say. Who gave him full satisfaction thereof, (against Geffrey Say) and required the money that hee promised: which within short time hee received of him every penny well and truly paid, for so hee brought into the Kings coffers. Thus being admitted, and confirmed by the Kings Letters Patent, hee boldly possessed taking Homage of all that held of him in Knights service. And so was given the sword of the Earledome of Essex by King John at the solemnity of his Coronation. This Geffrey Fitz-Pierre was advanced to the high estate of Justicer of England, King Richard the First, when hee removed Hubert Archbishop of Canterbury from that Office by the Popes peremptory command: for that Bishops ought not to intermeddle in secular affaires. This Place the said Geffrey Fitz-Pierre executed with great commendation preserving by his wisdom the Realme from that confusion which it after fell into by King Johns unadvised carriage. His two Sonnes Geffrey and William, assumed unto them the surname of Magnavill or Mandevill, and enjoyed this honour successively. As for Geffrey, hee by his wife was Earle of Gloucester also, and being a young man lost his life at a Turnement. William tooke part with Lewis France against King John, and departed out of this World without issue. Their being thus dead childlesse, their sisters sonne Humphrey de Bohun Earle of Hertford and high Constable of England, succeeded in their roome.*

Of this mans Posterity male, there succeeded many yeares together one after another, Earles of Hertford and of Essex: of whom I will speake among the Earles of Hertford, seeing that they wrote themselves Earles of Hertford and of Essex. Eleonor the eldest daughter of the last of these Bohuns, being given in marriage together with the Title of Essex unto Thomas of Woodstocke Duke of Gloucester, bare me to him a daughter named Anne, who had for her first Husband Edmund Earle of Stafford, from whom came the Dukes of Buckingham: and for her second Sir William Bourchier, unto whom King Henry the Fifth gave the Earledome of Essex in Normandie. This William of her body begat Henry Bourchier, whom King Edward the fourth invested in the Dignity of the Earledome of Essex, in regard hee had married his Aunt, and was descended from Thomas of Woodstocke. Hee had to succede him another Henry, his Grand-childe, who being cast out of the saddle by a flying horse, lost his life, leaving behinde him one onely daughter Anne, who being then little respected, King Henry the Eighth presently and all at once made Thomas Cromwell, (whom hee had used as his Instrument to suppress and abolish the Popes authority) Earle of Essex, Lord Great Chamberlaine of England and Knight of the Order of Saint George: whom before for his reaching politique head, hee had made Baron Cromwell of Okeham, The Kings Vicer general in Spiritual matters, and Lord of the Privie Seal: and all these honours were heaped upon him within the compasse of five yeares.

But in the fifth moneth after hee was Earle, hee lost his head and so had the interlude of his life a bloody Catastrophe, as most of these have, who are busied in matters of the greatest affaires. And then the same King thought Sir William Parr, upon whom hee had bestowed in marriage Anne the onely daughter and heire of the foresaid Henry Bourchier, worthy also to be entituled Earle of Essex.

But at the last, after Parr was dead without issue, Walter D'Essex Vicount Hertford, whose great Grandmother was Cecilie Bourchier Sister to Henry Bourchier whom I named right now, through the gracious favour of Queene Elizabeth, received this dignitie of the Earledome of Essex, and left it to his Sonne Robert. Who being adorned with singular gifts of nature, and supported besides with the speciall favour of his most gracious Prince, grew so fast unto such honour, that all England conceived good hope hee would have fully equalled, yea and farre surpassed the greatest vertues and praises of all his Progenitours. But (alas) whiles he was carried away with popularity, and made hast to out goe his hopes, hee cast himselfe headlong into destruction: as many more have done, who despising that which might come by patience with security, have made choise to hasten thereto before time with their finall overthrow.

But our most gracious Sovereigne King James of his Royall benignitie hath restored his Sonne Robert to his blood; and honours by Parliament authority.

ICENI.

ICENI.

He Region next unto the Trinobantes which afterwards was called East-England, and containeth Suffolke, Norfolk, and Cambridge-shire with Huntingdon-shire, was inhabited in times past by the ICENI, called elsewhere amisse TIGENI: and in Ptolomee more corruptly SIMENI: whom also I have thought becomen have been in Cæsar by a confused name, termed CENIMAGNI: and in thinke induced I was, partly by that most neere affinity betwene these names ICENI, and CENIMAGNI, and in part by the consent of Cæsar and Tacitus together. For Cæsar writeth that the Cenimagni yielded themselves unto the Romans: which Tacitus recordeth that the Icenii likewise did, in these words: They willingly joyned in amity with us. But (the which maketh most to the clearing of this poynt) in a Manuscript old booke in CENIMAGNI, we finde written with the word divided in twaine, CENI AGNI. For which if I might not be thought somewhat too bold a Critick, I would reade instead thereof ICENI, REGNI. Neither verily can you finde the Cenimagni elsewhere in all Britain, if they be a diverse people from the Icenii and Regni. But of this name ICENI, there remaine in this tract very many footings, if I may so tearme them, as Ikensthworth, Ikensthorpe, Ikbortow, Iken, Ikening, Ichlingham, Eike, &c. Yea and that high street-way, which went from hence, the Historians of the former age every where name Ichenild-Street, as one would say, the Icenies street.

Ichenild-Street.

What should be the reason of this name (so love me Truth) I dare not say, unless one would fetch it from the Wedge-like-forme of the country, and say lieth Wedgewise upon the Sea. For the Britans in their language call a Wedge Iken, and for the same cause a place in Wales, by the Lake or Meere Lhannigid, is of that forme named Lhan-yken, as Welsh-Britans enformed me: and in the very same sense a little country in Spaine (as Strabo writeth) is called SPHEN, that is, The wedge, and yet the same seemeth not to resemble a wedge so neere, as this of ours doth.

Spben.

A mighty nation this was, as saith Tacitus, and after they had taken themselves to the protection of the Romans, never shaken nor troubled until Claudius his time. For then, when as Ostorius the Romane Lieutenant raised fortifications upon the rivers and disarmed the Britans, they assembled their forces and made head against him: but after that the Romanes had broke through the rampier, where with they had fenced themselves, they were com-

A shed not without great slaughter. In which fight verily, they performed many worthy acts, and M. Ostorius the Lieutenants sonne wonne the honour of saving a Citizens life. When this warre was thus hushed, scarce 12. yeeres had gone over their heads, when a new tempest of warre arose upon these occasions. Prasutagus King of these Icenii, to secure (though it were with the hurt of his own private estate) his kinred from calamity, ordained by his last will and testament Nero the Emperor to be his heire, supposing that by this obsequious service of his (let Tacit. speak for me a while) his Kingdom and house both should be safe from all injury; which fell out cleane contrary: so that his Kingdome was wasted by the Centurions, and his house by slaves, as if they had been subdued by force. And now first of all, his wife Boodicia, who also is called Boudicca was whipped, and her daughters deflowered. All the principall men of the Icenii, as though they had received the whole Country in free gift were stript of their goods, and turned out of their ancient inheritances: those also of the Kings stocke and blood accounted no better than bondslaves. By occasions of which grievous injuries and for fear of greater indignities (for so much they had been reduced into the forme of a province) in all hast they tooke armes, having withall solicited the Trinobantes to rebellion, and others also who had not as yet been inured to bondage: These by privie conspiracies agreed to resume their libertie, being incensed with most bitter and deadly hatred against the old souldiers planted at Maldon above said. Thus began a most dangerous warre to kindle, which was set more on a light fire by the greedy covetousnesse of Seneca, who about that time exacted with extremitie 400000. Sesterces, an hundred times told, (which amount to three hundred thousand pounds of our money) so increased by his biting usurious contracts.

Seneca his usury in Britanny.

In this warre, that I may be brieve, that Boodicia, whom Gildas seemeth to call the crafty Lionesse, wife to Prasutagus, slew outright of Romanes and their associates fourescore thousand, raised Caimalodunum their Colonie, and the free to the Verulamium. The ninth Legion she discomfited, and put to flight Catus Decianus the Procuratour: but at length she being put to the worst by Suetonius Paulinus in a pitched field, with an invincible courage and resolution died (as Tacitus writeth) by drinking a cup of poison; or as Dio saith, by sicknesse. In the heat of this war, Xiphilinus recordeth out of Dio, that the Britans especially worshipped the Goddesse VICTORIE under the name of ANDARTES, which the Greeke booke in another place calleth Andraestes: also that in her sacred grove, they sacrificed prisoners alive in most barbarous and savage manner. And yet the Britans in these daies acknowledge no such name of Victorie, neither know I what the meaning of it should be, unless, as the Latins have called Victorie Victoriam, a vincendo, that is, of winning: the Sabins acunam, ab Vevacuando, that is, of emptying and making rid-dance: and the Grecians NIKHN, that is, of not yeelding or giving backe: so the Britans named it Anaraith, of overthrowing; For, so they terme a mischievous and deadly overthrow. But thus much slightly by the way. From those times ever since no mention is there in authors of the Icenii, neither can any thing by reading be found, but that the Romans, when their Empire went apace to decay, did set a new officer over the sea coasts along these and other countries to restraine the piracies and robberies of the Saxons, whom, as I have said heeretofore, they called * Comes of the Saxons shore along Britaine.

But when the English Saxons now had established their * Heptarchie in this Iland, this province became part of the Kingdome of East Angles, which of the site thereof Eastward they named in their language, East-angle-þyre, that is, The Kingdome of East English: and it had for the first King thereof, Vffa, whence his successors were a long time called Vff Kines, who seem to have been Vassals sometimes to the Kings of Mercia, and sometimes to the Kings of Kent. Whose offspring being come to an end in S. Edmund; the Danes overran this country most piteously for the space of 50. yeares or thereabout, afflicting it with all the calamities that accompany the wars: untill that King Edward the elder having subdued them united it at length to his owne Kingdome of the West-Saxons. But afterwards, it had peculiar Presidents and Governors: which honorable place at the first comming in of the Normans, and a while after one Ralph born in the lesser Brittain held; a man of a perfidious disposition and disloyall, who at a celebration of a marriage in most sumptuous manner, wickedly with many more conspired the death of William the Conqueror: but in vaine it was to him for secrecy and trust, among so many privie to the conspiracy. For, it was discovered, and he deprived of his dignity was attainted, and the rest beheld. In these things are to be handled more at large by the Historians: and now let us goe in hand with that which belongeth properly, to our purpose, that is, the place themselves. What kind of country this was, behold how Abbo Floriacensis, who lived in the yeare of Christ 970. hath pictured out in these words: This part which is called East Angle or East England is renowned, as for other causes, so in this regard, that it is watered almost on every side: being on the South and East environed with the Ocean, and on the North-east with huge Fennes foked in moisture, which rising by reason of the level ground from the midst in manner of all Britaine, for the space of a hundred miles and more doth descend with the greatest rivers into the sea. But of that side which lieth Westward the Province it selfe is continuat to the rest of the Iland, and therefore passeth throughout: but, least it should be overrun with the often irruptions and invasions of enemies, it is fenced along with a banke like unto a wall, and a Trench: Inward by the soile is fruitfull enough, and the country of a pleasing fresh hue, with pleasant Orchards, Gardens, and groves, most delightful for hunting, notable for pastures, and not meanly stored with sheepe and other cattell. I say nothing of the fishfull rivers, considering that of the one side the sea licketh it with his Tongue: and of the other side there are by reason of the broad Fennes and wide Marishes an infinite number of pooles two or three miles over. Which Fennes doe afford to a multitude of Monkes their desired private retyrings of a recluse and solitary life: wherein as long as they are enclosed, they need not the solitarinesse of any desert Wildernesse. Thus saith Abbo.

Suffolk.

SOUTH-FOLKE or SUFFOLKE.

SUFFOLKE, which wee must speake of first, in the Saxon Tongue Suth-fole, that is, South-folke, or people in respect of Northfolke, hath on the West side Cambridge-shire, on the South the River Stoure, which divideth it from Essex: on the East side the German Sea, and on the North two little Rivers, Ouse the least, and Waveney, which flowing out as it were of the same Fountaine, runne divers wayes, and sever it apart from Norfolke. A large country it is, and full of havens, of a far and fertile Soile, (unlesse it be Eastward) being compounded (as it is) of clay and marle: by meanes whereof, there are in every place most rich and goodly corne fields, with pastures as battable, for grazing and feeding of cattell. And great store of cheefes are there made, which to the great commodity of the Inhabitants are vented into all parts of England: Nay into Germany, France, and Spaine also, as Pantheon the Physician writeth, who stucke not to compare these of ours for color, and tast both with those of Placentia: but he was no dainty toothed scholar out of Aptines schoole. Neither bee there wanting woods heere, which have beene more plentifull, and parkes, for many there are lying to Noble mens and Gentlemens houses replenished with game.

Cheefes!

This County was divided politically into three parts: whereof one is called the Geldable, because out of it there is gathered a Tribute: a second, Saint Edmunds liberty, for that it belonged to his Abbay: the third Saint Audries liberty, because it appertained to Ely Abbay, unto which our Kings in times past granted certaine territories with Sach and Such, as saith Ely Booke, without any exception either of Ecclesiastical or secular jurisdiction. But let us survey it Chorographically, and beginning at the East side take a view of the better and more remarkeable places.

Where it lyeth West and toward Cambridge-shire, in the very limite standeth Ixning, more famous in times past than now. For Audre the Virgin K. Annas daughter and canonized for a Saint, was heere borne, Ralph also Earle of this East England heere entred into conspiracy against William the Conquerour, and Hervy the first Bishop of Ely made a caufey or high way from hence to Ely.

Newmarket Heath.

But now, for that Newmercate is so neer, whither men resort with their wares and commodities more frequently, it hath begunne to decay. That this Newmercate is a Towne of late dayes built, the very name it selfe doth import: and it is situate in such sort, that the South part thereof belongeth to Cambridge-shire, the North side to Suffolke: and both of them have their severall small Churches: whereof this acknowledgeth Ixning, the former Ditton or Dichton, for their mother. Heereof I have found by reading nothing, but that under King Henry the Third, Sir Robert L. Isle gave one part of it in franke marriage with his daughter Cassandra unto Sir Richard de Argenon, from whom the Alingtons are descended.

Newmercate, Newmarket Heath.

Heere lyeth out a great way round about, a large Plaine, named of this Towne, Newmarket Heath, consisting of a sandy and barren ground yet greene withall, wherein is to be seene that wonderfull Ditch, which, as if it had bene cast by the devill, the common fort call Devils Dike, whereas in very truth, most certainly it is knowne to be one of them, wherewith the Inhabitants, (as Abbo writeth) fenced themselves against the inrodes of their enemies, as shall bee shewed more at large when we are come to Cambridge-shire. Yet in the meane time, I am heere to advertise the Reader, that the least of all these ditches sheweth it selfe two miles from hence betwene Snail-well and Moulton.

More within the Country is that renowned Towne of Saint Edmund, which in the Saxons age, men called Bebeapic-gucop: and in the time of the Britans, as it should seeme, was that VILLA FAUSTINI, whereof Antonine maketh mention: for of that opinion

tion was Talbot a man right skillfull in antiquities, and very much conuersant in the part of England. The distance also, as well from the Island, as from Calan, Antonine agreeth well enough: And as Villa in the Latine Tongue significeth Gentlemans house standing upon his land, so Gueord, in old English betokeneth same. For, that Abbo afore said, interpreteth Bederic gueord, by these wordes Cortis, that is, Villa, that is to say, Bederic Court, Farme, or Mansion house.
That, the Englishmen may seeme to have brought the significance of the word into their owne Language: For as Faustinus in Latin implieth a certifying of prosperity: so doth Bederic in the German tongue, as written that ned Hadrianus Iunius, where he interpreteth the name of Betorix (who in the sonne of Melo the Sicambrian.) Full of happinesse and savour. But if these vers persons, I willingly confesse that I am ignorant, who that Faustinus was, this Bedericus was. Sure I am that it was not that VILLA Faustini, which Martiall in his Epigrammes depainteth: and if I said it was the habitation of Beric, who being driven out of Britaine, as Dio writeth, perswaded the Emperour Claudius to warre upon the Britans, I should not beleve my selfe. But what was, if it be not that Faustini Villa, yet seemeth it to have beene of famous memory, considering that when Christian Religion began to spring up in this Tract, gebers here founded a Church; and Abbo called it Villam regiam, that is, Angels
But after that the people had translated hither the body of Edmund that most stian King, whom the Danes with exquisite torments had put to death, and honour of him a very great Church wrought with a wonderfull frame of timber, beganne to bee called Edmundi Burgus, commonly Saint Edmundsbury, and shortly, Bury: and flourished marvellous much. But especially since that King Canutus for to expiate the sacrilegious impiety of his father Suenus against this being affrighted with a vision of Saint Edmund, built it againe of a new riched it, offered his owne Crowne unto the holy Martyr, brought into it with their Abbot, and gave unto it many faire and large Manours, and things the Towne it selfe full and whole: over which the Monkes themselves their Seneschall had rule and jurisdiction. Whereupon, Ioscelin de Brakelond a of this house, writeth thus: The men as well without the Burgh as within were, and within Banna Leuca enjoy the same libertie.

Afterwards, Herveie the Abbot comming of the Norman blood, compa-round about with a wall, whereof there remaine still some few Reliques, and the Newport walled the Abbay. The Bishop of Rome endowed it with very great nities and among other things granted, That the said place should bee subject in any matter, and in matters lawfull depend upon the pleasure and direction of the bishop. Which is yet observed at this day. And now by this time the Monkes ding in wealth erected a new Church of a sumptuous and stately building, which it every day more than other with new workes; and whiles they laid the founda-of a new Chappell in the Reigne of Edward the First, There were found (as Monke of this place writeth) The walles of a certaine old Church built round, from the Altar stood (as it were) in the mids, and we verily thinke, saith he, it was that first built to Saint Edmunds service. But what manner of Towne this was, and the Abbay also was while it stood, heare Leland speake: who saw it standing (saith hee) but not scene either a City more finely seated, (so delicately seated the easie ascent or hanging of an hill, and a little River runneth downe on the East of:) or a goodlier Abbay, whesher a man indifferently consider, either the with Revenewes, or the largenesse, or the incomparable magnificence thereof. Amith the Abbay would say verily it were a Citie: so many Gates there are in it, and some of:) *so many Townes, and a most stately Church: Upon which ascend * three other* gloriously in one and the same Churchyard, all of passing fine and curious Workes.
If you demand how great the wealth of this Abbay was, a man could hardly tell namely how many gifts and oblations were hung upon the Tombe alone of Saint Edmund: and besides, there came in, out of lands and Revenewes, a thousand five dered and three score pounds of old rent by the yeare. If I should relate the boiles severally that from time to time arose betweene the Townesmen and the Monkes:

(who by their * Steward governed the Townesmen) and with how great rage they fell together by the eares, purposedly to kill one another, my relation would seeme incredible. But as great a peece of worke as this was, so long in building and still encreasing, and as much riches as they gathered together for so many yeares with encreasing, and the monuments of Alan Rufus Earle of Britaine and Richmond, Sir Thomas of Brotherton sonne to King Edward the first Earle of Norfolke, and Mar- shall of England, Thomas of Beaufor, Duke of Excester, W. Earle of Stafford, Marie Queen of France Daughter to King Henry the Seaventh, and many other B worthy personages there Entombed; were by King Henry the Eighth utterly overthrowne. What time as at one clappe hee suppressed all Monasteries; persuaded thereto by such as under a goodly pretense of reforming religion preferred their private respects and their owne enriching before the honour of Prince and Country, yea and before the Glory of God himselfe. And yet there remaineth still lying along the carcasle, as one would say, of that auncient monument, altogether deformed; but (for ruines I assure you) they make a faire and goodly shew, which who soever beholdeth, hee may both wonder thereat, and withall take pitty thereof. England also, that I may note this also by the way if ever else it had losse by the death of any Man, sustained here one of the greatest. For, that father in C deede of his Country Humfrey Duke of Glocester a due observer of Iustice, and who had furnished his noble witte with the better and deeper kinde of studies, after hee had under King Henry the Sixth governed the Kingdome five and twenty yeares with great commendation, so that neither good men had cause to complaine of, nor evil to finde fault with, was here in Saint Savours Hospitall brought to his end by the spitefull envy of Margaret of Lorraine. Who seeing her husband King Henry the Sixth, to bee a man of a silly simple minde and faint hearted, to the end shee might draw into her owne hands the managing of the State, devised and plotted this wic-D ked deed: but to her owne losse, and this Realme, in the highest degree. For Nor- mandy and Aquitaine were thereby shortly after lost, and Warres more then civill enkindled in England.

Nere unto this Saint Edmunds Bury, is Rushbroke to be scene, the habitation of the worshipfull Family of the Termyns, Knights: and not farre from thence Ikesworth, where there stood an auncient Priory founded by Gilbert Blund, a man of great nobility and Lord of Ikesworth, whose issue male by the right line, ended in William, that in King Henry the Third his dayes was slaine in the battell at Lewis, and left two sisters his Heires, Agnes wife to William de Creketos, and Roise wedded to Robert de Valens. Afterward, both here, at Haulsted neere by Rougham, and else-where, the E Family of Drury, (which significeth in old English, A Pretious Jewell) hath beene of great respect and good note, especially since they married with the heires of Fresil, and Saxham.

More Northward is Saint Genoves Fernham, in this regard memorable, for that Richard Lucy Lord chiefe Justice of England tooke Prisoner there in a pight fieelde Robert Earle of Leicester, making foule worke and havocke here; and withall put to the sword above ten thousand Flemings, whom hee had levied and sent forth to the depopulation of his Country. Here hard by, I had the sight of two very faire houses the one built by the Kissons Knights, at Hengrave, the possition in times past of F Edmund de Hengrave, a most renowned Lawyer under King Edward the First: the other at Culforth, erected by Sir Nicholas Bacon, Knight, sonne unto that Sir Nicholas Bacon, Lord Keeper of the great Seale of England: who for his singular wisdom and most sound judgement, was right worthily esteemed one of the two Supporters of this Kingdome in his time. And not farre off standeth Lidgate a small Village, yet in this respect not to be passed over in silence, because it brought into the World the Lidgate the Monke, whose witte may seeme to have beene framed and shapen by the very Muses themselves: so brightly re-shine in his English verses, all the pleafant graces and elegancies of speech, according to that age. Thus much for the memorable places on the West side of Suffolke.

Stoke Clare.

On the South side wee saw the river Stour, which immediately from the spring head spreadeth a great Mere, called Stourmer: but soone after drawing in into within the banks runneth first by Clare a noble Village: which had a Castle, but now decayed, and gave name to the right noble Family of the Clares, descended from Earle Gislebert the Norman: and the title of Dukedome unto Leonel King Edward the Thirds sonne, who after hee had married a wife out of that house, was created by his father, Duke of Clarence. For he of this place with a fuller sound, than the Clare, was stiled Duke of Clarence, (like as before him the sonnes of Earle Gislebert and their successors, were hence surnamed De Clare) and called Earles of Clare. Which at * Langavill in Italy, after he had by a second marriage, matched with a Daughter of Gaiacius Vicount of Millain: and in the Collegiat Church here lieth interred also Joan Acres daughter to King Edward the first, married to Gislebert de Clare Duke of Gloucester. Here peradventure the Readers may looke, that I should set downe the Earles of Clare so denominated of this place, and the Dukes of Clarence, considering they have beene alwayes in this Realme of right honorable reputation: and so will I doe in few words, for their satisfaction in this behalfe. Richard the first Gislebert Earle of * Angy in Normandy served in the warres under King William when hee entred England, and by him was endowed with the Townes of Andover and Tunbridge. This Gislebert begat foure sonnes, namely Gislebert, Roger, John, and Robert; from whom the Fitz-walters are descended. Gislebert by the command of the Earle of Claremont had issue Richard, who succeeded him: Gislebert of whom came that Noble Richard Earle of Pembroke and Conquerour of Ireland, and Walter. Richard the first begotten sonne was slaine by the Welshmen and left him two sonnes Gilbert and Roger. Gilbert in King Stephens dayes was taken at Hereford: howbeit both he and his Successours are more often and commonly called Earles of Clare, of this their principall seat and habitation, yea and so many times they wrote themselves. After him dying without issue, succeeded his brother Roger, whose sonne Richard tooke to wife Amice the daughter and one of the heirs to William Earle of Gloucester, in right of whom his posterity were Earles of Clare. And those you may see in their due place. But when at length their issue failed, Leonel Third sonne of King Edward the Third, (who had married Elizabeth the Daughter and sole Heire of William de Burgh Earle of Ulster, begotten of the Bodie of Elizabeth Clare) was by his Father honoured with this new Title, Duke of Clarence.

But when as hee had but one onely Daughter named Philippa, wife to Edward Mortimer Earle of March, King Henry the Fourth created Thomas his own younger sonne Duke of Clarence, who being withall Earle of Albemarle, High Sheriff of England and Governour of Normandy, and having no lawfull issue was slain at Anjou by the violent assault of Scots and French. A long time after, King Edward the Fourth bestowed this honour upon his owne brother George, whom afterwards enmity and bitter hatred, hee had received againe into favour, and yet the last made an end of him in prison, causing him, as the report currently goeth, to be drowned in a Butte of Malmesey. A thing naturally engrafted in men, that when they have feared, and with whom they have contended in matter of life, that they hate for ever, though they be their naturall brethren.

From Clare, by Long-Melford, a very faire Almes-house lately built by that good man Sir William Cordal Knight, and Maister of the Rolls, Stour passeth on, and cometh to Sudbury, that is to say, the South-Burgh, and runneth in manner round about it, which men suppose to have beene in old time the chiefe towne of this Shire, and to have taken this name in regard of Norwich, that is, The Northern Towne. Neake would it take it well at this day to be counted much inferiour to the Townes adjoining: for, it is populous and wealthy, by reason of Clothing there, and hath by the chiefe Magistrate, a Mayor, who every yeare is chosen out of seven Aldermen, No farre from hence distant, is Edwardston, a Towne of no great name at this day, but yet in times past it had Lords therein dwelling, of passing great Honour, of the surname of * Mont-chenise: out of which Family Sir Guarin Montchenise married the daughter and one of the heires of that mighty William Marcell, Earle of Pembroke, and of her begat a daughter named Joan, who unto the stile of her Husband William de Valentia of the family of Lusignie in France, brought and adjoynd the title of Earle of Pembroke. But the said Sir Guarin Mont-chenise, as he was a right honourable person, so he was a man exceeding wealthy, in so much as in those dayes they accounted him the most potent Baron, and the rich Craffus of England. For his last will and testament amounted unto two hundred thousand Markes, no small wealth as the standard was then. From a younger brother or cader of this house of Montchenise, issued by an heire generall the Family of the Waldgraves, who have long flourished in Knightly degree at Smalebridge neerer to Stour, as another Family of great account in elder ages at Buers, which was thereof surnamed.

A few miles from hence Stour is enlarged with Breton a small Brooke, at one of whose heads is scene Bretenham a very slender little towne, where scarce remaineth any shew of all of any great building: and yet both the neere resemblance and the signification of the name partly induced me to thinke it to be that COMBRETONIUM whereof Antonine the Emperour made mention in this tract. For like as Bretenham in English signifieth an Habitation, or Mansion place by Breton, so Combretonium in Britton or Welsh betokeneth a Valley, or a place lying somewhat low by Breton. But this in Pentegrius his Table is falsely named COMVETRONUM and ADCOVEIN. Somewhat Eastward from hence is Nettlested scene, of whence was Sir Thomas Wentworth, whom King Henry the Eighth adorned with the title of Baron Wentworth, and neere thereto is Offington, that is to say, The towne of Off a King of the Mercians, where upon a clay Hill lie the ruines of an ancient Castle, which they say Off built, after he had wickedly murdered Aethelheri King of the East-Angles, and usurped his Kingdome.

But to returne to the River Breton. Upon another brooke that joyneth therewith standeth Lancham a pretty Mercat, and neere it the Manour of Burns-Elleis, whereunto King Henry the Third granted a Mercat at the request of Sir Henry Shelton Lord thereof, whose posterity a long time heere flourished. Hadley, in the Saxons language healeze, is watered with the same Brooke: a towne of good note in these dayes for making of Clothes: and in old time much mentioned by our Historians, because Guthrum or Gormo the Dane was heere buried. For, when Alfred brought him to this passe, that he became Christian and was baptized, hee assigned unto him these countries of the East-Angles, that he might (to use the words of mine Author) cherish them by right of inheritance under the Allegiance of a King, which he had overrunne by robbing and ransacking.

From hence Breton speedeth it selfe by Higham, whence the family of Higham is so named, to Stour which joyntly in one streame runne not farre from Bentley, where the Talmachs of a celebrate ancient house flourished for a long time, and after a few miles neere unto Arwerton the house long since of the family of the Bacons, who held this Manour, and Brome, by conducting all the footemen of Suffolke and Norfolke from S. Edmunds dike in the warres of Wales. Now it belongeth to the Parkers hereditarily, who by the Fathers side derive their descent from the Barons Marley, and by the Mothers from the Calshrops, a Family sometime of great account in these partes. Beneath this Stour falleth into the Ocean: and at the very mouth thereof, the river Orwell or Gipping dichargeth it selfe together with it.

This River springeth up in the very navell or centre, as one would say, of this shire, out of two fountaines, the one neere to Wulpet, the other by Gipping a small Village, Wulpet is a Mercat towne, and foundeth as much as, The Wolves yet, if wee may beleve Nabrigensis who hath told as prey and formally a tale of this place as is that fable called the TRUE NARRATION of Lucian: namely, how two little Boyes (forsooth) of a greene colour, and of Satyrs kinde, after they had made a long journey by passages under the ground, from out of another world from the Amipodes and Saint Martins Land, came up here: of whom if you would know more, repaire to the Author himselfe, where you shall finde such matter as will make you laugh your fill; if you have a laughing spleene. I wrote not whether I were best to relate here, into what a vaine hope of finding gold at Norton hard by, a certaine credulous desire of having, enticed and allured king Henry the Eighth, but the digging and undermining there sufficiently shew it, although I say nothing. But between Gipping and Wulper upon an high hill remain the tokens of Hawkelet an antique Castle, taking up much about two Acres of ground. Some affirme this to have beene called Hagoneth Castle, which belonged to Ralph le Bros, and that in the yeere 1177, it was by Robert Earle of Leicester won and overthrowne in the intestine warre betweene king Henry the Second, and his unkindely disloyall sonne.

Upon the same River are scene two little Mercat Townies, Stow and Mendlesham, and not farre from the banke, Hemingston: in which Baldwin Le Pettour (make his name well) held certaine lands, by Serjeanty, (the words I have out of an old booke) for which on Christmasse day, every yeere before our soveraigne Lord the King of England he should performe one Salsus, one Suffetus, and one Bumbulus; of a we read elsewhere, his tenure was, per salum, suffum, & pestum, that is, if I understand these tearmes aright, That hee should daunce, paffe up his cheekes making thereof a sound, and besides let a cracke downeward. Such was the plaine and jolly manner those times. And observed it is, that unto this Foë, the Manour of Langeton belonged.

Neere unto the mouth of this river we saw Ipswich, in times past Gippwich, a fine towne resembling a Citry, situate in a ground somewhat low: which is the case (as it were) of this shire, as having an Haven commodious enough; fenced in round with a trench and rampire, of good trade and stored with wares, well peopled and full of Inhabitantes, adorned with foureteen Churches, and with goodly and stately edifices. I say nothing of foure religious houses now overgrown, at that sumptuous and magnificent Colledge which Cardinall Wolsey a Buregh of this place, here began to build; whose vast minde reached alwayes at things too high. The body politike, or corporation of this towne consisteth, as I have mented, of twelve Burgesses (Partmen they terme them) out of whom are chosen yearly for the head Magistrates two Bailives; and as many Justices out of foure and twenty others. As touching the Antiquity thereof so farre as ever I could observe, the name of it was not heard of before the Danish invasion, whereof it smarted: For the yeere of salvation 991, the Danes sacked and spoiled it, and all the Sea coast with so great cruelty, that Sirithus Archbishop of Canterbury, and the Nobles of England thought it the safest and best course they could take, to redeeme and buy their peace of them for the summe of ten thousand pounds. Nevertheless, within nine years, they made spoyle of this towne againe, and presently thereupon the Englishmen valiantly encountered them in the field, but through the cowardly running away of one man alone, named Turkill, as writeth Henry of Huntingdon (for in matter of some things of small weight otherwise, are of right great moment, and sway very much) our men were put to flight, and let the victory slip out of their hands. In the time of S. Edward, as we finde in the Survey booke of England, out of this towne Queen Ethelred had two parts, and Earle Guert a third part: and Burgesses there were eight hundred, paying custome to the King. But after the Normans had possessed themselves of England, they erected a pile, or Castle here, which Hugh Bigod defended for a good while against Stephen the usurping King of England, but surrendered it in the end. This fort is now quite gone, so as there remaine not so much as the ruines thereof. Some say it was in the parish of Westfield hard by, where is to be scene the rubbish of a Castle, and where old Gippwich, as men say, stood in times past. I thinke verely it was demolished, when K. Henry the second laied Waleton Castle neer unto it even with the ground. For it was a place of refuge for Rebels, and here landed those three thousand Flemings whom the nobles of England had called in against him, what time as he was advisedly

A advisedly hee had made Prince Henry his sonne King, and of equall power with himselfe: and the young man knowing no meane, would bee in the highest place or none, set upon a furious desire of the Kingdome, most unnaturally waged warre against his owne father: Albeit these Castles are now cleane decayed and gone, yet this Shore is defended sufficiently with an huge banke, they call it Langerston, that for two miles or thereabout in length lyeth forth into the maine Sea, as hee saith, not without great danger and terrour of such as faile that way: howbeit the same serveth very well for Fishermen to dry their fishes, and after a sort is a defence unto that spacious and wide Haven of Orwell. And thus much for the South part of this Shire.

B From hence the curving Shore (for all this East part lyeth full against the Sea) shooting forth Northward straight-way openeth it selfe to the * Deben, a Riveret having his spring-head neere unto Mendlesham; unto which Towne, the Lord of the place U. Fitz Otho, Master of the Mint, purchased the liberty of Mercat and Faire: by whose Heires there fell no small Possessions unto the Boutetorts Lords of Wily in Worcestershire, and from them againe in the Raigne of Richard the Second, unto Frook, Barkley of Stoke, Barnel, and others.

C This River Deben first floweth hard unto the little Mercat Towne Debenham, and giveth it the name, which others would have to be called more truly Depenham, for that the waies every where about it, by reason of a clay ground and the same over moist, are very deepe and cumberous. From thence it runneth by Vfford the seat in times past of Robert de Vfford Earle of Suffolke, and by a Towne over against it on the other side of the River named Rendelisham, that is, as Beda interpreteth it, Rendilic Attonson place; where Redwald King of the East Saxons kept usually his Court, who was the first of all his Nation that was baptised, and received Christianity; but afterwards, seduced by his Wife, he had in the selfe same Church, as saith Beda, one Altar for Christs Religion, and another for sacrifices unto Devils. In this place also Swidelm a King of the East-Angles was likewise afterwards baptised by Bishop * Ceddæ.

D From hence the River Deben passeth downe to Woodbridge, a little Towne beautified with faire houses; where at certaine set times are holden Assemblies for Saint Andrews Liberty: and after it hath gone some few miles, it is received into the Ocean at Bawdsey Haven.

E By this time now the Shore creepeth by little and little Eastward to the mouth of the River * Ore; which runneth neere to Eramlingham Castle, belonging sometime to the Bigods by the bounty of King Henry the First: and forthwith on the West side thereof spreadeth (as it were) into a lake. A very faire and beautifull Castle this is, fortified with a banke, ditch, and walles of great thicknesse, wherein are thirteene towres, and inwardly furnished with buildings right commodious and necessary. From hence it was that in the yeare of our Redemption 1173, what time as King Henry the Second his rebellious sonne tooke armes against his father, Robert Earle of Leicester, with his mercenary Flemings infested this Country farre and neere: from this Castle also in the yeare 1553, Queene Mary entred upon her Kingdome, for all the ambitious fretting and fuming of John Dudley Duke of Northumberland against King Henry the Eighth his Daughters.

F Then cometh the River to Parrham a little Towne, the Lord whereof William Willoughby King Edward the Sixth honoured with the Estate of a Baron: and afterwards running by Glemham; which gave name to an ancient Family descended from the Barons and Brantons; at Oxford, that tooke the name of it, disburdeneth himselfe into the Sea. A bigge Towne this was and of great resort, fenced also with a Castle of a reddish stone, and appertained in times past to the Palatines, and afterwards to the Willoughbys; but complaineth at this day of the seas unkindnesse which shrinketh backe from it by little and little, and beginneth to envie the commodity of an Haven unto the Towne. Neither have I any thing else to say of Oxford, unlesse it please you to runne over these few words of Ralph Cogeshall an old Writer.

In King Henry the Seconds daies, saith bee, when Bartholmew Glawile kept the Castle of Oreford, it happened that the Fishermen caught a wilde man within their net, when all parts and members of his body resembled a man, had haire on his head, a huge head with a Piloe devant, about the breast exceeding hairy and rough: who notwithstanding slipped away secretly to the Sea and was never scene after: So that it may bee very true, which is so rife with the common people, That there is nothing bred in any part of Nature, but the same also is in the Sea: and that it is not altogether a fained Fable, that Plinie hath reported of a Trison taken on the Shore of Portugall, and of the Sea-man caught in the Streights of Gibraltar.

Not much higher, lyeth Aldborough for Situation right safe and very pleasant within Slaughden vale, where from the East the Sea, and from the West the River beareth. This name Aldburgh, is by interpretation the Old Burgh, or as others would have it, The Burgh upon the River Ald. Now it is an harbour very commodious for Sailers and Fishermen, and thereby well frequented, and acknowledged the Ocean Sea to be favourable unto it, how spitefull soever and malicious it is to other Townes in this Coast. Neere unto it, what time as in the yeare 1555. by reason of unseasonable weather the Corne throughout all England was choked and blighted in the care, there grew Pease miraculously among the rocks, without any earthly about them about the end of September, and brought downe the price of Corne. Yet the wiser sort of men doe say that Pulse being cast upon the Shore by Shipwracke is wont otherwhiles to come up againe there, so that the thing may bee thought miraculous: But, that the like usually every yeare grow of the same accord among the stones on the Shore of Kent, I have shewed already.

From hence coasting along the Shore, at ten miles end, wee met with Dunwich, in the English Saxon tongue Dunmoe, whereof Beda maketh mention; when the Burgundians that reduced the East Angles againe into the faith, when they were backsliding from Christ, in the yeare of Grace 639. placed an Episcopall see, whose Successors for many yeares together were Bishops over all East Angles. But Bisse the Fourth Bishop after Felix, when hee became very aged and decayed withall, being not able to discharge so great a Jurisdiction, divided it into two Sees: the one continued still in this Dunwich, the other hee placed in Wormsley, a little Towne. In the Reigne of William the Conquerour, Dunwich had in it hundred and sixe and thirty Burgeses: an hundred poore people: it was valued at fifty pounds, and threescore thousand Herings, of gift. For, so wee read in Domesday Booke. In the foregoing Age, it was well peopled and frequented with Inhabitants: famous also for a Mint therein: and in the Reigne of Henry the Second, as William of Newborough writeth, It was a Towne of good note, and full of red with sundry kindes of Riches. At which time, when England was all on fire with new stirres and broiles, it was so fortified, that it made Robert Duke of Leicester affraid, who with his Army over-ran all the parts there about the pleasure. But now by a certaine peculiar spite and envie of Nature, that reacheth the greedy Sea to have what it will and encroache still without all stay the greatest part thereof is violently carried away with the waves, and by reason the Bishops many yeares agoe translated their Seat to another Place, it hath become (it were) desolate. A little above it, the River Blith voideth it selfe into the Sea, on whose banke Southward wee saw Blithborow a small Towne, which is another thing is memorable, but because Anna a Christian King was there buried, whom Penda the Mercian slew in a pitched Field. It was beautified by King Henry the First with a Colledge of Chanons, who granted the same to the Chanons of Saint Osith. And it was made a Mercate by the means of the Lord of Clavering, unto whom King Edward the Second gave this Liberty together with the Faite. And verily a goodly Inheritance hee had in this Towne, who derived his Descent from the Daughter and Heire of William * Clavering who held the Barony of Horsford in the Countie of Norfolke, and erected the Abbey at Sibton.

* De Casinet.

Heere the Promontory Easton-Nesse shooteth our, and reacheth farre into the East, which is deemed to bee the farthest East point in all Britaine; Ptolomee calleth it Extensio, or EXTENSIO. And that you may not doubte, that this is the very same which wee call Easton, bee it knowne unto you, that Eysteney in the British tongue is the same that in Greeke Extensio, and in Latine Extensio, that is, A stretching forth: although this name may seeme with as good probability to have beene imposed in our English Language, of the Situation Eastward. Upon the point of this Promontory standeth Easton a Village of Fishermen well neere eaten up by Sea, and on South side of this Promontory, Southwold lieth in the Plaine, full against the open shore of the sea: a Towne well enough frequented through the benefit of an Haven that the River Blith emptying it selfe there into the Sea maketh; and at every high water it is so invironed with the waves, that it seemeth to bee an Island, and a man would wonder that it is not overflowne. In so much as when I saw the manner thereof, I called that saying of Cicero into my remembrance: What should I speake of the Sea Tides about Spaine and Britaine, and of their Flowing and Ebbing at certaine times? Surely, they cannot bee without the hand of God, who hath restrained and gaged the waves within their bounds. More within the land Wingfield sheweth it selfe, where the walles of a Castle halfe downe are to bee scene: which hath given name to a family in this Tract that is spred into a number of branches, and is besides for knighthood and ancient Gentility renowned, and thereof it was the principall seat: Allo Dunnington, which standeth much upon the Lord thereof Sir John Philips, father to that Sir William who married the daughter and Heire of Baron Bardolph, whose daughter and Heire likewise John Vicount Beaumont tooke to Wife: But now the Habitation it is of the ancient Family of the Rousses. Nor farre from hence standeth Huntingfield, which had a Baron of that name in King Edward the Third his time, and neere unto it Heveningham, the residence of the Family of Heveningham, knights: who are knowne to bee of very great antiquity: and not farre off standeth Halesworth, in times past Healsworth, an ancient Towne of the Argentians, and now of the Alingtons: unto which Sir Richard Argenton obtained at the hand of King Henry the Third the liberty of a Mercate.

I gave you to understand before, that two small Rivers, Ouse the least, and Waveney on the North side, divided this Countie from Norfolke; which Riverets rising out of a Marsh ground by Lophamford, from two springs but a little a sunder one from another, take their courses divers wayes with creekes full of shallow foulds. Along by Ouse which runneth Westward, there is nothing in this Quarter to bee scene worth the report. By Waveney side that tendeth Eastward, first is Hoxon in times past Hegildon ennobled by reason of King Edmunds Martyrdome. For there the most cruell and bloody Danes (that I may use the words of Abbo) having bound the most Christian King to a tree, for that hee would not renounce Christianity, shot him in with sharpe arrowes all his body over, augmenting the paines of his torment with continuall piercing him with arrow after arrow, and thus inflitied wound upon wound, so long as one arrow could stand by another: And as a Poet of middle time verified of him.

*Iam loca vulneribus desunt, nec dum furiosis
Tela, sed hyberna grandine plura volant.*

Though now no place was left for wound, yet arrowes did not faile,
These furious Wretches; still they lie thicker than winter haile.

In which place afterwards stood a very faire house of the Bishops of Norwich; untill they exchanged it not long since for the Abbey of Saint Benet. Hard by, at Brome, dwelt a long time the family of Cornwallis, of knights degree: of whom Sir John Cornwall was Steward of Edward the Sixth his Household while hee was Prince; and his sonne Sir Thomas, for his wisdom and faithfullnesse became one of the privie counsellors to Queene Mary, and Controller of her royall Houfe. Beneath it lieth Eay, that is, The Island, so called, because it is watered on every side with brookes, where are to bee scene the rubbish, ruines, and decayed walles of an old Castle that that belonged to Robert Malet a Norman Baron. But after that he under King Henry the First was deprived of his Dignity, because he sided with Robert Duke of Normandy against the King, the said King bestowed this Honour upon Stephen Earle of Bullen, who, being afterwards the * Vasfructuary King of England left it unto his son William Earle of Warren. But after hee had surrendered his State to King Henry the Second, and lost his life in the expedition of Tholose, the King held it in his owne hands untill that King Richard the First confer'd it upon Henry the Fifth of that name Duke of Brabant and of Lorain, together with King Stephens Nece by his daughter, who had beene a professed Nunne. Long time after, when it was now devolved againe upon the Kings of England, King Edward the third gave it, as I have read, to Sir Robert Vfford Earle of Suffolke.

Bedingfield.

Neither must I passe over in silence Bedingfield neere adjoyning, which gave the name to a worshipfull and ancient Family, that received very much reputation and credit from the Heire of the Family of Tudenham. From thence by Flixton, in stead of Felixton, so named of Felix the first Bishop of these parts, like as many other places in this Shire, the River Waveney runneth downe to Bungy, and spreadeth it self in manner round about it; where Hugh Bigod fortified a Castle both by artificiall workmanship, and also by naturall situation, when as the feditious Barons tossed all England to and fro with stormes of rebellion. Concerning which Castle, is pregnable, he was wont to vaunt in these termes :

Were I in my Castle of Bungy
Upon the River of Waveney,
I would ne care for the King of Cockney.

Yet notwithstanding afterwards he obtained at the hands of King Henry the Second (by giving him a great summe of money and pledges withall of his loyalty) it might not be overthrowne and rased. Not farre thence from the banks, you may see Mettingham; where, upon a plaine, Sir John surnamed De Norwich Lord of the place built a foure square Castle and a Colledge within it, whose daughter, at the end the Heire of the same Family, Robert de Vfford aforesaid, Earle of Suffolke tooke to Wife with a goodly Inheritance.

Now Waveney drawing neerer unto the Sea whiles hee striveth in vaine to make himselfe a twofold issue into the Ocean, the one together with the River Tare, and the other by the meere Lutbing, maketh a pretty big Denny Isle or Biland, which have name Lovingland, others more truly Lutbingland, of Lutbing the lake spreading in length and bredth; which beginning at the Ocean Shore is discharged into the River Tare. At the entrance whereof standeth upon the Sea, Leistoffe, a narrow and low Towne: and at the issue of it Gorleston, where I saw the towre steeple of a small pressed Friery, which standeth the Sailers in good stead for a marke. Within the land, hard by Tare is situate Somerley townne, the habitation in ancient time of Monks, from whom it is come lineally to the worshipfull ancient family of the Monks, Knights of high esteeme in these parts: farther up into the land where Tare and Waveney meet in one streame, there flourished Cnobersburg, that is, as Bede interpreteth, Cnobers City, we call it at this day Burgh-Castle. Which, as Bede saith, was a most pleasant Castle, by reason of woods and Sea together, wherein a Monastery was built by Fursey a holy Scot: by whose persuasion Sigebert King of the East-Angles became a Monke and resigned up his Kingdome: who afterwards being drawne against his will out of this Monastery to encourage his people in battaile against the Merchians, together with his company lost his life. In that place now there are only ruines with forme, as it were, foure square, built of flint stone and British Bricke, but all overgrown with briars and bushes: among which otherwhiles are Romane peeces of colonnades ten forth: So that it may seeme to have been one of those fortifications that the Romans placed upon the River Tare to repress the piracies of the Saxons: or rather that it was the ancient GARIANONUM it selfe, where the Stableian Horsemen had their

Suffolke hath had Earles and Dukes out of sundry families, There bee of the later writers who report, that the Glauvils in times past were honoured with this title: But seeing they ground upon no certain authority, whereas men may easily mistake, and I have found nothing of them in the publike records of the Kingdome, they must pardon me if I beleve them not, untill they produce more certainty. Yet in the meane while I confesse, that the family of the Glauvils in this tract was of right good note and high reputation. Neither have I hitherto learned by witnesses of credite, that any one was entituled Earle of this Province severally before the daies of King Edward the Third, who created Sir Robert Vfford Earle of Suffolke a man much renowned both in peace and warre, the sonne of Sir Robert Vfford Steward of the Kings house under King Edward the Second, by Cecily de Valontis Lady of Orford. After him succeeded his sonne William, who having foure sonnes that were taken away by untimely death during his life, died himselfe suddenly in the Parliament house as he was about to report the minde of the Commonalty. And then Sir Robert Wiloughby, Roger Lord Scales, and Henrie Ferrars of Grobby the next of his blood and his Heires divided the Inheritance betweene them. Afterward King Richard the Second promoted Michael De-la-Pole to this Title, and made him L. Chancellor of England. Who, as Thomas Walsingham writeth, employed himselfe more in trafficke and

C Merchandise, (as having beene a Merchant and a Merchants sonne) then in marshall matters. For he was the sonne of William De-la-pole, that first Maior of Kyngston upon Hull, and for his wealthy Estate, adorned by King Edward the Third with the dignity of a Baronet. But when as in the prosperous confluence of so many advancements the mans nature was not capable of so great fortunes, he was enforced by his adversaries envy to depart out of his Country, and so died a banished man. His sonne Michael being restored, died at the siege of Harflew, and againe within one moneth his son Michael was slaine in the battell of Agincourt leaving daughters onely. Then William his brother succeeded, whom King Henry the first so favoured that hee made him also Earle of Penbrooke, and then Marquesse of Suffolke, to him and the heires males of his body. And that both hee and the heires of his body should carry the golden rod having a Dove in the top thereof, on the Coronation day of the King of England: and the like rod of George Tuory at the Coronation of the Queens of England: And afterwards hee advanced the same William for his great service and deserts to the honour and title of Duke of Suffolke. Certes hee was an excellent man in those dayes, famous and of great worth. For whereas his father and three brethren had in the French wars lost their lives for their Country, he, as we finde in the Parliament Rols of the 28. of King Henry the Sixth, in the same war served full 34. yeeres: For seventeen yeeres together he never returned home from warfare, being once taken prisoner when he was as yet no better than a private Knight, hee paid downe for his ranome twenty thousand pounds of our English mony: hee was of the Kings privy Counsell 15. yeeres; and a Knight of the Order of the Garter 30. Hereupon, as he stood in especiall grace and favour with his Prince, so he incurred therefore the greater envy of the common people, and some emulators: being grievously charged with treason and misprisions. And therefore called before the King and Lords of the Parliament, after he had answered the Articles objected, referred himselfe to the Kings order. Whereupon the Chancellor by the Kings commandement pronounced, that whereas the Duke did not put himselfe upon his Peeres, the King touching the Articles of treason, would be doubtfull, and as for the Articles of misprision, not as a Judge by advice of the Lords, but as one to whose order the Duke had submitted himselfe, did banish him the realme and all other his dominions for five yeeres. But when he was embarked for France, he was by his adversaries intercepted upon the sea and beheaded. He left a son nam'd John De-la-Pole, who wedded K. Edward the fourth his sister, and of her begate John Earle of Lincolne by K. Richard the Third proclaimed heire apparant of the Crowne: whose ambitious minde puffed up and giddy therewith could could not containe it selfe, but soone after brake out against King Henry the Seventh, to his owne destruction (for in the battell at Stoke he was quickly slaine) to his fathers death also, (who for very griefe of heart ended his dayes) and to the utter ruine of the whole family, which together with them was in a sort extinguished and brought to nothing. For, his brother Edmund being Earle of Suffolke fled into Flanders: began there to conspire and stir up rebellion against King Henry the Seventh, who, albeit he feared him, would seeme to favour him, and as a Prince contented with repentance than punishment, freely pardoned him for sundry offences, that he might winne him. But after he was thus fled, his estate was forfeited, and the King never thought himselfe secure from his practises, untill he had so farre prevailed with Philip Duke of Burgundy, that he was delivered into his hands (against the Law of hospitality toward strangers, as some then gave out) upon sollemne promise in the word of a Prince that his life should be spared. Nevertheless he was kept close prisoner, and after executed by King Henry the Eighth (who thought himselfe not tied to his fathers promise) what time as hee first minded to make warre upon France, for feare least in his absence some troubles might bee raised at home in his behalfe, yet his yonger brother S. Richard de la Pole a banished man in France, usurped the title of Duke of Suffolke: who being the last male (to my knowledge) of this house, was slaine in the battell of Pavie (wherein Francis the first, king of France was taken prisoner in the yeer of our Lord 1524.) fighting manfully among the thickest of his enemies. For whom, in consideration of his singular valour, and high parentage the Duke of Burbon himselfe, although hee was his enemy, made a sumptuous funerall, and honored the same with his presence in mourning blacke. In the meane time, king Henry the Eighth adorned Sir Charles Brandon, unto whom he had given in marriage his owne sister Marie widdow, and Dowager to Lewis the twelfth king of France, with the title of Duke of Suffolke, and granted to him all the Honour, and Manours which Edmund Earle of Suffolke had forfeited. After whom succeeded Henry his sonne a childe, and after him his brother Charles: who both died of the English swet upon one day in the yeere 1551. Then king Edward the Sixth honored with that title Henry Grey Marquesse Dorset, who had married Francis their sister but he enjoying the same but a small time lost his head in Queene Maryes dayes for plotting to make his daughter queen, and was the last Duke of Suffolke. From that time lay this title of Suffolke void, untill that very lately king James advanced to the honour Thomas Lord Howard of Walden, the second sonne of Thomas Howard Duke of Norfolk, whom for his approved fidelity and vertue he also made his Lord Chamberlaine, in his first entrie into the kingdome.

NORTH-FOLKE.

NORTH-FOLKE, commonly Norfolke, which is by interpretation, people of the North, lieth Norward of Suffolke; from which it is divided by those two little Rivers which I spake of, Ouse the least, and Waveney, running divers wayes: on the East and North side the German Ocean which is plentifull of Fish beareth upon the shores with a mighty noise: On the West, the greater Ouse, a River disporting himselfe with his manifold branches and divisions: secludeth it from Cambridge-Shire. It is a Region large and spacious, and in manner all throughout a plaine champion, unlesse it bee where there rise gently some pretty Hills; passing rich, exceeding full of Sheepe, and stored with Conyes: replenished likewise with a great number of populous Villages: for, besides twenty seven Mercat townes, it is able to shew Villages and Country Townes 625: Watered with divers Rivers and Brookes, and not altogether destitute of Woods. The soyle, according to the variety of places, is of a divers nature: Some where, fat, ranke, and full of moisture, as in Mersland and Flegg; otherwhere, but Westward especially, leane, light, and sandy: elsewhere, standing upon clay and chalke. But the goodnesse of the ground a man may collect by this (whence Parras willeth us to gather it) that the Inhabitants are of a passing good complexion: to say nothing of their exceeding wily wits, and the same right quicke in the insight of our common lawes: in so much as it is counted, as well now, as in times past, the onely Country for best breed of Lawyers: so that even out of the meanest sort of the common people, there may be found not a few, who if there were nothing else to beare action, or able to fetch matter enough of wrangling controversies, even out of the very prickles, titles, and accents of the Law. But least, whiles I desire brevity, I become long by these digressions which may distaste; I will turne my penne from the people to the places; and beginning at the South side, runne over briefly those which are more memorable, and of greater antiquity.

Upon the least Ouse, where Thet a small brooke breaking out of Suffolke, meeteth and runneth with him, in a low ground, was seated that ancient City SITOMAGUS which Antonine the Emperour maketh mention of, corruptly in the Fragments of an old Choragraphicall table called SIMOMAGUS and SINOMAGUS now Thetford, in the Saxon language Deortford in which remaineth part of the former name with the addition of the English word Ford. For, like as Sitomagus in the Brittain tongue implieth a Citie by the river Sit, which now is Thet for Magus as Plinie sheweth, signified a City) so Thetford in English betokeneth the Ford of Thet; neither are these two names Sit and Thet much unlike in sound. There are in it at this day but few Inhabitants, although it be of a good bignesse; but in times past it was very populous; and beside other tokens of antiquity it hath still to bee seene a great Mount raised to a good height by mens hands; fenced with a double rampier, and as the report goeth, fortified in ancient time with walles: which was a Romane worke as some thinke, or rather of the English Saxon Kings, as others would have it, under whom it flourished a long time. But after it was sacked, first by Suenus the Dane, who in a rage set it on fire in the yeere 1004; and sixe yeers after being spoyled againe by the furious Danes, it lost all the beauty and dignity that it had. For the recovery whereof, Bishop Arfast removed his Episcopall See from Elmham hither, and Bishop William his successor did all he could to adorne and set it out: so that, under King Edward the Confessor, there were counted in it 947. Burgeses, and in William the Conquerours time 720. Mansions: whereof 224. stood void, and the chiefe Magistrate was termed a Consul, which name may intimate that it was a Roman towne. But when

Bishop

Bishop Herbert (surnamed Leſenge, for that he was composed of Leaſing and Flaſer) the third Prelate that by evil means and Simony climbed up to this Dignity, had removed his seat from hence to Norwich, it fell againe to decay, and as it were languished. Neither could it sufficiently bee comforted for the absence of the Bishop, by the Abbay of Cluniac Monkes, which by his means was built. This Abbay Hugh Bigod Steward to King Henry, by his graunt and by the advice of Hethelot of Norwich, have ordained Monkes of the Order of Cluny, in the Church of S. Cuthbert was the Episcopall seat of Thetford, which I gave unto them, and afterwards found more meete for their use, without the Towne. Howbeit even then, the greatest part of the City that stood on the hithermore Banke by little and little fell to the other part although it was much decayed, yet one or two Ages agoe there were with seaven Churches, besides three small religious Houses, whereof the one by report erected in the memoriall of the Englishmen and Danes slain here, is hard by as our Historians doe record, Edmund that most holy King a little before his death fought Seaven houres and more with the Danes not without an horrible slaughter, and afterwards gave over the battaile on even hand; such was the untimely fortune of the Field, that it drave both sides past their senses.

By Waveney the other River of those twaine, that bound this Shire and runneth Eastward, not farre from the Spring head thereof, are scene Buckenham and Waveney hall. This which may seeme to have the name left unto it of the Iceni, is the seat of that most honourable Family of the Howards, whose glory is so great, that the glory of Buchanan cannot empaire it. As for the other, so named, as I take it of Buckenham which the Saxons called Bucken; it is a faire and strong Castle, built by William I. King of England the Norman, (unto whom the Conqueror had given the place) and his heires that were successively Earles of Arundell, it descended to the Tuscan, and then them by Caly and the Cliftons unto the family of the Kneveys. These are of an old house and renowned ever since Sir John Knevet was Lord Chancellor of England under King Edward the Third, and also honourably allied by great marriages: he over and beside these of Buckenham, from hence sprang those right worshipfull Sir Thomas Knevet, Lord Knevet, Sir Henry Knevet of Wiltshire, and Sir Thomas Knevet of Ashwell Thorpe and others. This Ashwell Thorpe is a little Towne standing, which from the *Thorp*es in times past of Knights degree, by the Thomas de L. L. Bourchiers of Berners, is devolved at length hereditarily unto that Sir Thomas Knevet before named. As for that Buckenham afore said, it is holden by this condition, that the Lords thereof should at the Coronation of the Kings of England be the Kings Bushers that day. Like as, (a thing that may be scene the more in Waveney a little neighbour village, Raulph de Carleton and some one other, held this service, namely, To present an hundred Herring-Pies or Rasies, when Herring come in, unto their Sovereigne Lord the King, where soever he be in England.

But this river neare to his spring runneth by and by under Disce, now Disce town well knowne; which King Henry the First gave frankly to Sir Richard Fitz-Robert, and hee straightwayes passed it over to Walter Fitz-Robert with his Daughters, whose Posterity Robert Fitz-Walter obtained for this place the liberty of Waverley Mercat, at the hands of King Edward the First. From thence, although Waverley on each side beset with Townes, yet there is not one amongst them that may be of any Antiquity: unless it bee Harleston a good Mercat, and Shelton that standeth farther of, both which have given surnames to the ancient Families of the Harleston and Harleston: but before it commeth to the Sea, it cleaveth it selfe with the Tare, which the Britans called Guerne, the Englishmen Gerne, and tere, of Alderney, no doubt, so termed in British wherewith it is overshadowed. It ariseth out of the mids of this Countie, not farre from Gernsion a little Towne that tooke name thereof, and hath hard by it Hengham, which had Lords, descended from John de Gernsion (Nephew by the brother to William Marescall Earle of Pembroke) upon whom King John bestowed it with the Lands of Hugh de Gornay, a Traitour, and also with the daughter daughter and coheire of Hubert de Rhia. From this Marescall it passed in revolution of time, unto the Lord Morleis, and from them by Lovell unto the Parkers, now Lords Morley. A little from hence is Sculton, otherwise called Burdos or Burdels, which was held by this Tenure, That the Lord thereof on the Coronation day of the Kings of England, should be chiefe Lardiner. Joint-neighbour to Sculton is Wood-Rising the faire seat of the Family of the greatest reputation and increase from Sir Richard Southwell Privie Councillour to King Edward the Sixth; and his Brother Sir Robert Master of the Rowles.

More Eastward is to be scene Wimundham, now short, Windham, famous for the Albany Earles of Arundell, there entered: whose Ancestor and Progenitor William de Albini, Butler to King Henry the First founded the Priory, and gave it to the Abbay of Saint Albans for a Cell, which afterward was advanced to an Abbay. Upon the Steeple whereof, which is of a great height, William Ke one of the Captaines of the Norfolk Rebels, in the yeare of our Lord 1549. was hanged on high. Neither would it be passed over in silence, that five miles from hence standeth Antilborough, the seat of the Mortimers; an ancient Family, who being different from those of Wigmore, bare for their Armes, A Shield, Or, Seme de floures de Lys Sables, and founded here a Collegiat Church, where there is little now to be scene. The Inheritance of these Mortimers hath by marriage long since accrued to the Malcliff, now Earles of Suffex, to the Family of Fitz-Ralph, and to Sir Ralph Bigge. But returne we now to the River.

The said Tare hol deth not his course farre into the East, before he taketh Wentsum a River (others call it Wentfar) from the South, into his streame: upon which, neere unto the head thereof, there is a foure square Kampier at Talesborough, containing foure and twenty Acres. It may seeme to have beene a Campe place of the Romans, if it be not that which in an old Chorographickall Table or Map published by Marcus Welserus, is called AD TAUM. Somewhat higher, upon the same River, stood VENTA ICENORUM, the most flourishing City, (for a little one) in times past of all this people, but now having lost the old name, it is called Caster. And no marvelle that of the three VENTA, Cities of Britain, this onely lost the name, seeing it hath quite lost it selfe. For, beside the ruines of the Walles, which containe within a square plot or quadrant, about thirty acres, and tokens appearing upon the ground where sometimes houses stood, and some few peeces of Romane money which are now and then there digged up, there is nothing at all remaining. But out of this ancient VENTA, in the succeeding ages, Norwich had her beginning, about three miles from hence, neere unto the confluents of Tare and another namelesse River (some call it Bariden) where they meet in one: which River with a long course running in and out by Fakenham, which King Henry the first gave to Hugh Capell, and King John afterward to the Earle of Arundell, and making many crooked reaches, speedeth it selfe this way by Antilbridge to Tare, and leaveth Horsford North from it: where a Castle of William Cheney, who in the Raigne of Henry the Second, was one of the great Lords and chiefe Peeres of England, lieth overgrown with bushes and brambles. This NORWICH is a famous City, called in the English-Saxon tongue Norwic, that is, a Northerly Creeke; if Wic among the Saxons signifieth the creeke or Cove of a River, as Rhemanus sheweth unto us, for, in this very place the River runneth downe amaine with a crooked and winding compass: or, a Northerne Station, if Wic, as Hadrianus Imius would have it, betokeneth a sure and secure station or place of abode; where dwelling houses stand joyntly and close together: or a Northerly Castle, if Wic found as much as Castle, as our Archbishop Alfrick the Saxon hath interpreted it. But if I should with some others be of opinion that Norwich by a little turning is derived from Venta, what should I doe but turne awry from the very truth? For by no better right may it challenge unto it selfe the name of Venta, than either Basil in Germany, the name of AUGUSTA, or Baldach of BABYLON. For, like as Baldach had the beginning of Babylons fall; and Basil sprang from the ruine of Augusta: even so our Norwich appeared and shewed it selfe, though it were late, out of that ancient

VENTA

VENTA, which, the British name thereof Caer Gwentum in Authours, doth prove: wherein, like as in the River Wensum or Wensar the name of Venia doth most plainly discover it selfe. For, this name Norwich wee cannot reade of any where in our Chronicles before the Danish warres.

So farre is it off, that either Cesar or Gusteline the Britain built it, as they write who are more hafty to beleieve all than to weigh matters with sound judgement. But now, verily, by reason of the wealth, the number of Inhabitants, and resort of people, the faire buildings, and faire Churches, and those so many, (for it containeth about thirty Parishes) the painefull industry of the Citizens, their loyalty towards their Prince, and their courtesie unto strangers, it is worthily to be reckoned with the most celebrate Cities of Britaine. It is right pleasantly situated on the side of an Hill two and fifty Degrees and forty Scrupuls from the Equator, and foure and twenty Degrees and five and fifty Scrupuls in Longitude. The forme, somewhat long: lying out in length from South to North a mile and an half: but carrying in breadth, about halfe so much, drawing it selfe in by little and little at the South end in manner, as it were, of a cone or sharpe point. Compassed it is about with strong walles (in which are orderly placed many Turrets, and twelve gates) lesse it bee on the East-side; where the River (after it hath with many windings and out watered the North part of the City, having foure Bridges for men to passe and fro over it) is a Fencethereunto, with his deepe Chanell there, and high firme bankes. In the very infancy, as I may so say, of this City, when Ethelred the weakesse and unadvised Prince reigned, Saeno or Swan the Dane who ranged at his pleasure through England with a great rable of spoiling Ravenours, first put the sacke, and afterwards set it on fire. Yet it revived againe, and as wee reade in the Domesday booke wherein William the Conquerour tooke the review of all England, there were by account in King Edward the Confessours time, no fewer than one thousand three hundred and twenty Burgeses in it. At which time (that I may take out of the same Booke) it paid unto the King twenty pounds and to the Earle of Northampton and beside all this twenty shillings, and foure Prebendaries, and sixe Sectors of Tithes, the Beare and five Droggs for salubritie the Beare: but now it payeth seventy pounds yearly unto the King, and an hundred shillings for a * Gerfume to the Queene, and an hundred shillings also twenty pounds Blanc to the Earle, and twenty shillings for a Gerfume by the Earle. While the said King William reigned, that flaming fire of farall sedition, which first in the East of England had kindled against the King, settled it selfe here, for when hee had saved himselfe by flight, his wife together with the French Britons gathered in this place a most grievous Siege even to extreme famine: yet at length when she was to this hard pinch that she fled the land, and this City was recovered, that scarce 560. Burgeses were left in it, as we reade in that Domesday booke. Of this yeelding up of the City Lausfrank Archbishop of Canterbury maketh mention in his Epistle to King William, in these words. Your Kingdome is purged of the filthie and filthy Britons, The Cattle of Norwich is rendred up into your hands. And the Britons who were therein and had lands in England, having life and limme granted unto them, in sworne within forty dayes to depart out of your Realme, and not enter any more into your leave and licence. From that time beganne it againe to recover it selfe by little and little out of this diluge of calamities, and Bishop Herbert, whose good name was cracked for his foule Simony, translated the Episcopall See from Eborac thither, and built up a very faire Cathedral Church on the East side and lower part of the City, in a certaine place then called Con-holme, neere unto the Castle. The first stone whereof in the Raigne of King William Rufus, and in the yeare after Christ's Nativity 1096. himselfe laid, with this inscription.

DOMINUS HERBERTUS POSUIT PRIMUM

LORD [BISHOP] HERBERT LAID THE FIRST STONE IN THE NAME OF THE FATHER, THE SONNE, AND HOLY GHOST, AMEN.

Afterwards, he procured of Pope Paschal that it should be established, and confirmed for the Mother Church of Norfolke and Suffolke: he endowed it bountifully with as much lands, as might sufficiently maintaine threescore Monkes, who had there faire and spacious Cloysters. But after that they were thrust out by King Henry the Eight, there were substituted for them a Deane, sixe Prebendaries and others. The Church being thus built and an Episcopall See there placed, the Towne now (as saith William of Malmesbury) became of great name for frequent trade of Merchants and resort of people. And in the 17. yeare of King Stephen, as we reade in old Annals, Norwich was founded anew, became a well peopled City, and was made a Corporation. And most certaine it is out of the kings Records, that king Stephen granted it unto his sonne William for his Appennage, as they terme it, or inheritance. Out of whose hands King Henry the Second shortly after wrested it by composition and kept it for himselfe: And albeit his Sonne Henry, called the younger King, when he aspired ambitiously to the kingdome, had made a large promise thereof unto Hugh Bigod Earle of Norfolke whom hee had drawne to side with him. At which time Bigod taking part with the young King, who could not containe his hope of the Kingdome within the bounds of duty and equity, most grievously afflicted and oppressed this City: and then as it is thought reedified that Castle standing within the very City upon an high hill neere unto the Cathedrall Church, which being compassed with a ditch of a wonderfull depth seemed in those daies impregnable. Which notwithstanding, Levin the French-man, with whom the seditious Barons of England combined against King John, won it easily by Siege. Now, that Bigod reedified this Castle I verily beleieve, because I have seen Lions Saltans engraven there in a Stone after the same forme that the Bigods used in times past in their Seales: of whom also there was one that in his Seale used a Crosse. These things fell out in the first age (we may say) of Norwich.

But in the age next ensuing, it increased mightily and flourished, by reason that the Citizens grew to be passing wealthy, who exhibited a supplication in the Parliament house unto King Edward the First, that they might be permitted to wall their City about, which they afterwards performed to the exceeding great strengthening and honor thereof. They obtained moreover of King Richard the Second, that the Worcester made there might be transported: and in the yeare 1403. king Henry the fourth granted that they might choose every yeare a Major in stead of their Bailiffes, which before were the principall Magistrates. They built likewise a passing faire Townehouse in the very midst of the City neere unto the Mercat-place, which on certaine set dayes is furnished exceeding well with all things necessary for mans life. And verily much beholden it is unto the * Netherlanders, that being weary of Duke de Albe his cruelty, and hating the bloody Inquisition, repaired hither in great numbers and first brought in the making and trade of saies, baies, and other stufes now much in use. But why should I stand long upon these things, when as Alexander Nevill a Gentleman well borne and very learned hath notably described all these matters, together with the story of their Bishops, the orderly succession of their Magistrates, and the furious outrage of that most villanous Rebell Ket against this City? This only will I adde, that in the yeare 1583. the Citizens conveyed water out of the River through pipes by an artificiall Instrument or water-forcer up into the highest places of the City. Heere I may justly commence an action both against Polydore Virgil an Italian, and also against Angelus Capellus a Frenchman, and put them to their answer before the Tribunal of venerable Antiquity, why they have avouched that the ancient Ordovices, whose be feared, as it were in another world, inhabited this Norwich. I would have the same merry action also against our Country man D. Caius, but that I know for certaine that the good old man, right learned though he were, was blinded in this point with the naturall love of this his own native Country. Neither have I more to say of Norwich unlesse it may please you to runne over these Verses of Master Iohn Iowison a Scottish-Britan written of the same.

A City seated daintily, most faire built the is knowne,
Pleasing and kinde to Strangers all, delightfull to her owne,
The fear of warre whiles civill sturs and tumults yet remain'd,
In William the Normans dayes, she grievous losse sustain'd,
These broiles and jarres once past, when as her head aloft againe
She bare, in richnesse infinite and wealth she grew amaine.
Her Port exceeds that wealth, and things all superfine, this Port
How happy were it, if excesse with such wealth did not fort,
So all sufficient in her selfe, and so complete is shee,
That if neede were, of all the Realme the Mistrisse shee might bee.

From Norwich, the River Tare having entertained other beackes and brookes as guests, yet all under his owne name, passeth on still with many winding crookes every full of the fishes called Ruffes, which name because in English it foundeth like Rough, D. Caius named it aptly in Latine Aspredo, that is, Rough. For, it is all the body over, rough and hath very sharpe and prickly finnes: it delighteth in sandy places; for shape and bignesse like unto a Perch; in colour browne and dusky above, but palish yellow beneath: marked by the chawes with a double courle of half-circles the eye for the upper halfe of it of a darke browne, for the nether somewhat lowish like deliayed gold; the ball and sight thereof blacke. This speciall maketh it selfe it hath, that there is a line goeth along the backe, and fastened to the body (as were) with an overthwart thred, all to bespotted over the taile and fins with black speckes: which finnes when the fish is angry stand up and bristle stiffe and strong: but when the anger is allayed they fall flat againe. The meat of this Ruffe is delicious that of the Perch, much commended for holsonnesse; and for eating tender and fine.

When Tare is gone past Claxton, where there stands a Castlet built round, which Sir Thomas Gawdy knight Justice of the Common Pleas of late repaired, it receiveth brooke which passeth by nothing memorable but Halles-hall, and that only memorable for his ancient Owner Sir James Hobart Attorney Generall and of the Privie Councill to King Henry the Seventh (by him dubbed Knight at such time as he created Henry his sonne Prince of Wales) who by building from the ground the faire Church at Landon being his Parish Church, Saint Olaves bridge over Waveney that divideth Northfolke and Suffolke, the cawsey thereby, and other works of piety, deserved well of the Church, his Country, and the Common-weale, and planted three houses of his owne Issue, out of the second whereof Sir Henry Hobart his great Grandchild now likewise Attorney Generall to King James is lineally descended. Now Tare approaching neerer to the Sea, runneth downe Southward, that so it may shed it selfe more gently into the salt sea waves, and thereby maketh a little languet of land like a tongue thrust out, which it selfe of one side watereth, and the Sea on the other beatech upon. On this languet I saw standing in a most open plaine shore, Tarmouth, in the English Saxon Gap-mud, and liep-mud, that is, Taref-mouth, a very convenient Haven, and as fine a Towne, beautifully built and passing well fenced both by the naturall strength of the place and also by the skilfull industry of mans Art. For although it be environed almost round with Water, on the West side with the River which hath a Draw Bridge over it, and from other Partes with the Ocean, unlesse it be North-

Northward where there is firme land: yet is it in most tightly manner enclosed with a good strong wall, which together with the River make a square forme of four sides, but somewhat long: upon which wall, beside Towres, there is cast a mount toward the East, from whence the great Peecces of Ordnance use to thunder and flash all about into the Sea under it, which is scarce 60. paces off. It hath indeed but one Church, yet the same is very large, having a passing high spire steeple to adorne it, built by Herbert Bishop of Norwich hard by the North gate: under which are to be scene the foundations brought above ground of a goodly peece of worke to enlarge the same. That this was that old Towne GARIANONUM, where, in times past, the Sablefoot Horsemen kept their standing watch and ward against the barbarous enemies, I dare not affirme; neither doe I thinke that Garianum was where Caster is now (in times past the faire seat of Sir Iohn Fastolfe, a most martiall knight, and now appertaining to the Passions) albeit it is much celebrated among the Inhabitants for the antiquity thereof, and the same goeth that the River Tare had another mouth or passage into the Sea under it.

But as I am perswaded that GARIANONUM stood at Burgh-castle in Suffolke, which is on the other banke about two miles off, so I am easily induced to thinke, that both Tarmouth arose out of the ruines thereof, and also that the said Caster was one of the Roman Forts, placed also upon the mouth of Tare, that now is stopped up. For, like as the * North Westerne Winde doth play the Tyrant upon Holland over against it, and by drift of Shelves and Sand-heapes hath choked the midst of the Rhene-mothes: even so the * North-East Winde afflicth and annoieth this Coast, and driveth the sand on heapes, so as it may seeme to have dammed up this mouth also.

Neither will it be prejudiciall to the Truth, if I should name our Tarmouth, GARIANONUM, being so neere adjoining as it is, unto the old Garianum: considering that Gariensis the River, whence it tooke the name, having now changed his chanel, entereth into the maine Sea a little beneath this Towne, which it hath also given name unto: For, I must needs confesse, that this our Tarmouth is of later memory. For, when that ancient Garianum aforesaid was decayed, and there was no Garrison to defend the Shore, Cerdick a warlike Saxon landed here (whereupon the Inhabitants at this day call the place Cerdick-sand, and the Wicars of Hittories, Cerdick-shore) and after he had made fore war upon the Isle, tooke Sea and sailed from hence into the West parts, where he erected the Kingdome of the West Saxons. And not long after, the Saxons in stead of Garianum, founded a new Towne in that moist and waterish ground, neer the West side of the River and named it Tarmouth. But finding the Situation thereof not to be healthfull, they betooke themselves to the other side of the River called then of the same Cerdicke, Cerdick-sand, and built this new Towne, in which there flourished in King Edward the Confessor his daies 70. Burgeses, as wee finde recorded in the * Notitia of England. After this, about the yeare of our Redemption 1340. the Townesmen strengthened it with a wall, and in short space it grew so rich and puissant, that oftentimes in seafights they set upon their neighbors of Leisoffe, yea and the * Portmen, for so termed they the Inhabitants of the Cinque Ports, not without much blood shed on both sides. For they were most spitefully bent against them, haply for being excluded out of the number of the Cinque Ports, and deprived of these privileges which old Garianum or Tarmouth, and their Ancestours, enjoyed under the * Comes of the Saxon Shore in elder times. But this their stoutnesse was repressed at length and taken downe by the Kings Authority: or as some thinke, their lusty courage became abated by that most grievous and lamentable plague, which in one yeare, within this one little Towne brought 7000. to their graves. The which is witnessed by an ancient Latine Chronographical Table hanging up in the Church, wherein are set downe also their warres with the Portmen and Leisoffians aforesaid.

Since that time, their hearts have not beene so haughty, nor their wealth so great, to make them bold: howbeit painfully they follow the trade of Merchandise, and and taking of * Herrings (which the learned thinke to bee Chalcides and Lencænides) a kinde of fish more plentifull heere than in any other Coast of the world. For, it may seeme incredible how great a Faire, and with what resort of people, is holden heere at the Feast of Saint Michael, and what store of Herrings and other fish is then bought and sold. At which time, they of the Cinque Ports above said by an old order and custome, appoint their Bailiffs, Commissioners, and fend them hither, who, that I may speake out of their owne Patent or Commission, together with the Magistrates of this Towne, during the time of the free Fair, hold a Court, for matters concerning the Faire, doe execute the Kings Justice, and keepe the King's peace. As for the Haven below the Towne, it is very commodious both for the inhabitants, and for Norwich-men also: but for feare that it should be barred and stopped up, they wrestle as it were, to their great cost and charges, with the maine Sea: which to make them amends and to restore what it hath eaten and swallowed up elsewhere in this Shore, hath by heaping of earth and sand together, cast up here of late a pretty Island.

At this mouth also, another River, which some call Tbyrn sheddeth it selfe together with Tare into the sea: This River springing up neere unto Holt a towne so called of an Holt or tuft of trees, and for the Mercat well knowne, running about five miles distant from Tare, holdeth on a joynt course a great way and keepeth pace within, by Blickling, now the seat of the ancient Family of Clere who in former times dwelt at Ormesby, and by Ailetham a Mercat Towne of good repute, where the Barke of Arhole in Scorland had lands not farre from Worsted, whereas I reade, the Stulle Worsted, in so great request amongst our Ancestours, was first made; and hence so named, as Dornicks, Camerie, Calecut, &c. had in like manner their denomination from the places where they were first invented, and made. Then passeth Tbyrn the decayed great Abbay called Saint Benet in the Holme: which Kent the Duke built, and the Monkes afterward so strengthened with most strong wals and bulwarks, that it seemed rather a Castle than a Cloister. In so much, that William the Conquerour could not winne it by assault, untill a Monke betrayed it into his hand upon this condition, that himselfe might bee made Abbot thereof. Which was done accordingly: but forthwith, this new Abbot for being a Traitor, (as the English make report) was hanged up by the Kings commandement, and so justly punished for this treason. But the ground in this Island or Holme is so fenny and rotten, that a man cut up the strings and rootes of trees, and shrubs there growing, it floateth lost on the water, and is ready to follow one whither he will have it. And sometimes be who thinke, by the Perwinkles and Cocles that other while are digged up here, that the Sea had broken in thither. From thence runneth this River downe by Ludham, an house of the Bishops of Norwich, and by Clipsby, which gave name to a Family of ancient note in his Tract, and straightway uniteth his owne streame with the Tare. From the mouth of Tare the shore goeth directly (as it were) North to Winterton a point or cape very well knowne to Sailers, which tooke that name, I suppose, of the cold and winterly Situation. For, it lieth full upon the Ocean, the father of winds and cold, who with exceeding violence rusheth against the bankes and piles that are opposed against him. Howbeit, the Country adjoyning round about, in many mens opinion hath the fatteft Soile and softest mould of any country in all England, as which asketh least labour, and yeeldeth most fruit. For, with a silly jade, (as Plinie writeth of Bizacium in Africke) and a poore old woman at one side of the yoke drawing the plough, it is easily broken up and eared. From Winterton immediately the shore turning Westward, the sea retireth, without any bearing out in manner at all along a flat and low coast, as farre as to Eccles, which is almost overflowed and drowned with the Ocean. From thence it carrieth an higher shore, by Bronholme sometime a Priory founded and enriched by G. Glanvill, and seated upon the sharpe top of an hill, the Crosse whereof our ancestours had in holy reverence, I know not for what miracles. Next it is Paston a small townlet which yet hath given surname to a Family grown great, both in Estate and alliance, since they matched with an Heiress of Bury

A and Maulbye. Not far hence is Gimmingham, which with other Manors, John Earle of Warren and Surrie gave in times past to Thomas Earle of Lancaster, and by Cramer where the neighbour Inhabitants with great expense went about to make an Haven, but to small purpose, the Ocean so furiously played the Tyrant and made resistance. Thence the Shore runneth forth to Wauburne-hope, a Creeke fortified in our time, so called of Wauburne a little Towne, unto which by the intercession of Olivier de Burdeaux, King Edward the Second granted the Liberty of keeping a Mercat: Next unto it is Clay, and over against it with a little River running betwene, Blackney, our Country man Bale calleth it Nigeria, a famous Houle of Carmelite Friars in this late age afore going, built by Sir Robert de Ros, Sir Robert Bacon, and John Bret: out of which came John Baconthorp, so named of the place of his nativity, (which now is the habitation of the Heids, an ancient Race of Knights degree) A man in that age of such variety and depth withall of excellent learning, that hee was had in exceeding great admiration among the Italians, and commonly called The Resolute Doctor. Whence it is, that Paulus Panfa thus writeth of him. If thy minde stand to enter into the secret power of the Almighty and most mercifull God, no man hath written of his Essence more exactly. If any man desireth to know the causes of things, or the effects of Nature, if hee wish to know the sundry motions of Heaven, and the contrary qualities of the Elements, this man offereth himselfe as a store-house to furnish him: The Armour of Christian Religion, of better proofe and defence than those of Vulcans making against the Jewes, this resolute Doctor alone hath delivered, &c. When you are past Wauburne, the Coast lieth more low and flat, as farre as to Saint Edmunds Point, cut through and distinguished with many a riller, and hardly defended from the injury of the Sea by heapes of sand which they use to call Meales, opposed against it.

More within the Country is Walsingham scarce foure miles from hence: whereupon it is that of the vicinity unto the Sea Erasmus calleth it Parabalasia. Very famous now is this Village by reason of the best Saffron growing there: but of late time as much renowned through all England for a Pilgrimage to our Ladie the Virgin Mary: whom hee who had not in that former Age visited and presented with offerings, was reputed irreligious. But this shall Erasmus an eye-witnesse describe in his owne very words. *Non faveo fuisse eam, (saicte mee) about foure miles, there standeth a Towne living almost of nothing else but upon the resort of Pilgrimes. There is a Colledge of Chanons, yet such, as unto whom the Latins have given the addition of Regulares, a middle kinde betwixt Monkes and those Chanons whom they terme Secular: This Colledge hath scarce any other Revenewes than from the liberality of the said Virgin. For certaine of the greater Presents and Oblations are layed up and preserved. But if there be any money offered or ought else, of small value, that goeth unto the maintenance of the Covent, and their Head or President, whom they call Prior. The Church is faire and neat, yet in it the Virgin dwelleth not: that honour forsooth, shee hath done unto her Sonne: shee hath her Church by her selfe, but so, as that shee may bee on the right hand of her Sonne. Neither doth shee dwell heere for all this, for why, the Building is not yet finished, and the place hath a through light and ayre on all sides, with open doores and wide open windows, the Ocean Sea withall, the father and foster of windes is hard by. In that Church, which I said was unfinished, there is a small Chappell, but all of wood, whereinto on either side at a narrow and little Doore are such admitted as come with their Devotions and Offerings. Small light there is in it, and none other in manner but by tapers or wax-candles, yeelding a most dainty and pleasant smell. Nay if you looke into it, you would say it were the Habitation of heavenly Saints indeed, so bright shining it is all over with precious Stones, with Gold and Silver. But within the memory of our fathers, when King Henry the Eighth had set his minde and eye both, upon the Riches and Possessions of Churches, all this vanished quite away. Touching Walsingham, I have nothing else to say more, but that the Family of the Walsinghams, Knights (as they will have it that curiously search after Genealogies) fetched first their name and Originall from hence: Out of which house flourished that Sir Francis Walsingham, Secretary unto Queene Elizabeth, a man* as of deepe insight, so also of as rare and painfull industry in the weightiest affaires of the Realme. But hard by it at Houghton, flourished sometime the noble Family of the Neirfords, who by matching in marriage with * Parnel de Vallibus (who had about Holi, Cley, and elsewhere a goodly Inheritance) was greatly enriched. But now let us looke backe againe to the Shore.

Neere unto Walsingham Westward, upon the Sea side, was that ancient Towne BRANNODUNUM, where when the Saxons first molested Britaine with their Invasions, The Dalmatian Horsemen lay in Garrison under the Lieutenant of the Saxon Shore. But now it is a country Village, reteining nought but the remaines of that name, and shewing a Trench and Rampire (the neighbour Inhabitants call it the Castle) that containeth within it a plot of ground much about eight Acres, and is named Brancaster, where peeces of Romane money are many times gotten out of the earth. Very commodiously was there a Garrison planted in this place: for at S. Edmunds Chappell neere adjoining, and Hunstanton, built by that holy King Saint Edmund, the coast draweth backe into the South, and so admitteth a larger creeke for the Sea to enter into, lying open for Pirats, into which many Rivers also doe void themselves. As for Hunstanton, it is to be remembered in this regard, if there were nothing else, for that it hath beene the Habitation of the Family of Le Strange, Knights by degree, ever since that in the Raigne of Edward the Second, Iohn Baron Le Strange of Knackin, gave the same unto Hamon his younger Brother.

The catching of Hawkes, and the plentifull fishing, the Leas and Amber also found oftentimes in this Shore I wittingly omit, seeing that there is great store of these things else where along this Tract. Yet Sharnborn in this Coast is not to be omitted both for that Felix the Burgundian who brought these East Englishmen to the Christian Faith and state of perpetuall Felicity, built in this place the second Church of Christians in this Country (for the first, he founded at Babingley where he landed) also because it is verily thought and that by the faithfull testimony of old dedes and evidences, that an old Englishman Lord of this place before the coming of the Normans, by vertue of sentence given judicially in open Court by William Conquerour himselfe, recovered this Lordship against Warren, unto whom the Conquerour had given it. Which argument they enforce hard, who would prove that the said William entred upon the Possession of England by Covenant and agreement, and not by right of warre and Conquest.

The foresaid Creeke or Bay, our Country men call the Washes, Ptoleme termed it AESTUARIUM METARIS, haply for Malibraith, by which name the Britains called the like Frithes and Armes of the Sea in other places: neither doth it signify among them any other thing than an Arme of the Sea uncertainly changing the channell such as this is: Upon this, where the River Onse striveth forcibly against the Ocean, standeth Linne, peradventure so named of the waters broad spreading, for that doth Lbyn import in the * British tongue. A large Towne this is, encompassed with a deepe trench and wals for the most part thereof, divided by two small Rivers that have fiftene bridges of thereabout over them: and although it be of no great antiquity and not long since called Linnum Episcopi, that is, Bishops Linne, because it pertained to the Bishops of Norwich, untill King Henry the Eighth his daies, for it had beginning out of the ruines of an elder Towne which stood over against it in Marshland, and is at this day called Old Linne and Linnum Regia, that is, Kings Linne, yet by reason of the safe Haven which yeeldeth most easie access, for the number of Merchants there dwelling, and thither resorting, for the faire and the goodly houses, the wealth also of the townesmen, it is doubtlesse the principall town of this Shire except Norwich only. It hath likewise most large franchises and immunities, which the Inhabitants bought with their owne blood of King John, whiles they took part with him and defended his quarrell, who ordained there a Mayor, and delivered unto them his owne sword to be carried before him, yea and gave unto them a silver cup all gilt, which they still doe keep. These their liberties being afterwards lost, they redeemed not without blood also, of King Henry the Third, when siding with him

A and serving under his Banner, they fought an unfortunate battaile against the outlawed Lords in the Isle of Ely, as the booke of Ely and Mathew Paris doe both joyntly witness.

Over against Linne, on the farther side of the River lieth Marshland, a little moist marsh country, as the name implieth, divided and parted every where with ditches, trenches and furrowes to draine and draw the waters away: a soile standing upon a very rich and fertile mould, and breeding abundance of cattell: in so much as that in a place commonly called Tilney marsh there feed much about 30000. sheepe: but so subject to the bearing, and overflowing of the roaring maine Sea, which very often breaketh, reareth, and troubleth it so grievously, that hardly it can be holden off with chargeable wals and workes. The places of greater note in this Marshland, are these: Walpole, which the Lord of the place gave in times past unto the Church of Ely together with his sonne, whom he had made a Monke there: Wigton, the possession of I. Howard in the Raigne of Edward the First, whose Posterity spread, and became a most honorable and noble Family, whereof I have already spoken: Tilney, whence in old time the stocke of the Tilneys, Knights, tooke name; and Saint Maries the seat of the ancient race of the Carvils.

Tilney.
S. Maries.

Now have we passed along all the Sea-coast. As for the inner part of the Country, there are also very many Townes toward the West side, but because they bee of later memory, I will briefly runne them over. Neere to Linne upon an high hill standeth Rising-castle, almost matchable to the Castle of Norwich: the seat intimes past of the Albines; afterwards of Robert de Montbault, by one of the sisters and coheires of Hugh Albine Earle of Arundell; and at last the mansion place of the Monbrays: who, as I have learned, came out of the same house that the Albines did. But now, after long languishing, as it were, by reason of old age, the said Castle hath given up the ghost. Below it is Castle-acre, where was sometimes the habitation of the Earles of Warren, in a Castle now halfe downe, on a little Rivers side: which carrying no name, ariseth not farre from Godwicke a lucky good name, where there stands a small house, but greatly graced by the Lord thereof, Sir Edward Coke Knight, a man of rare endowments of nature, and as in the Common lawes much practised, so of deepe insight therein, which all England hath to the knowledge of, whiles hee discharged the function of Attorney Generall many yeares most learnedly, and now acknowledged whiles being Lord Chiefe Justice of the Common Pleas, he administrerth justice as uprightly and judiciously. Neither is he lesse to be remembered, for that he loveth learning, and hath well deserved of the present and succeeding ages by his learned labours.

Reports.

This River or brooke with a small streame and shallow water runneth Westward to Linne, by Neirford, that gave name to the Family of the Neirfords famous in times past, and by Neirborough: where neere unto the house of the Spilmans, knights, upon a very high hill is to be seene a warlike Fort of passing great strength and of ancient worke, so situated, as it hath a very faire prospect into the Country about it. After, upon the said Brooke is seated Pentney, a pretty Abbay, the ordinary buriall place in ancient time of the Noblemen and Gentlemen in this Tract.

Neirford.

Neere unto it lieth Wormegay, commonly Wrongay, which Reginald de Warren brother of William de Warren the second Earle of Surry had with his wife, of whom as I have read, the said Earle had the donation or Maritagium (as they use to speake in the law phrase) and by his sonnes daughter streightwayes it was transferred to the Bardolphs, who being Barons of great nobility, flourished a long time in honorable state, and bare for their Armes Three Cinque-foiles or in a Shield Azur, The greatest part of whose Inheritance together with the Title came to Sir William Phillips, and by his daughter passed away to the Vicount Beaumont. More Eastward are seated, Swaffham a Mercat Towne of good note, sometime the Possession of the Earle of Richmond: Ashle Manor, by Tenure whereof the Hastings and Greies Lords of Rutbin had the charge of table clothes and linnen used at the solemne Coronation of the Kings of England: North Elmham, the Bishops See for a good time, when as this Province was divided into two Dioceses: Dereham, wherein Witthurga King Anna's daughter was buried: whom because shee was piously affected, farre from all riotous excesses, and wanton lightnesse, our Ancestours accounted for a Saint. Next unto which is Gresphenhall, and adjoining thereto Elfing, the possessions in ancient time of the Folliots, men of great worth and Dignity, which in right of dowry came by a daughter of Richard Folliot to Sir Hugh de Hastings, descended out of the Family of Abergewenny: and at length by the daughters and heires of Hastings the last, Gresphenhall aforesaid fell unto Sir Hamon le Strange of Hunstanton, and Elfing unto William Browne the brother of Sir Antonie Browne the first Vicount Mountacute. In this quarter also is Ick-borrough, which Talbot supposeth to have beene that ICIANI, whereof Antonine speaketh. Neither have I cause to write any more of these places. And now I thinke it is good time to set downe the Earles and Dukes of Norfolke, that I may proceed to Cambridgeshire.

William the Conquerour made one Raulph Governour of East-England, that is to say, of Norfolke, Suffolke, and Cambridgeshire, who forthwith gaping as I said, after an alteration and change in the State, was dispossessed of that place. After certaine years, in the Raigne of Stephen, Hugh Bigod was Earle of Norfolke: For, when peace was concluded betwene Stephen and Henry Duke of Anjou, who became afterwards King Henry the second, by expresse words it was provided, that William King Stephens sonne should have the whole Earldome of Norfolke, excepting amongst other things, The third peny of that Countie, whereof Hugh Bigod was Earle. Whom notwithstanding King Henry the Second created Earle againe, of the third peny of Norfolke and Norwich. Who dying about the 27. yeare of Henry the Second, Roger his sonne succeeded, who, for what cause I know not, obtained at the hands of King Richard the first a new Charter of his creation: Him succeeded his sonne Hugh, who tooke to his wife Mawde the eldest daughter and one of the heires of William de Pembroch. By whom he had issue one sonne named Roger, Earle of Norfolke and Marescall of England, who at Tournament having his bones put on of joint, died without issue: and another, called Hugh Bigod Lord chiefe Justice of England slaine in the battaile of Lewis: whose sonne Roger succeeded his Uncle in the Earldome of Norfolke and dignity of Marescall, but having incurred through his insolent contumacy the high displeasure of King Edward the First, was compelled to passe away his honors and well neere his whole inheritance into the Kings hands to the use of Thomas of Brotherton the Kings son, whom he had begotten of his second wife Margaret sister to Philip the Faire, King of France. For thus reporteth the History, out of the Library of Saint Austens in Canterbury. In the yeare 1301. Roger Bigod Earle of Norfolke ordained King Edward to be his heire: and hee delivered into his hands the rod of the Marshalls Office with this condition, that if his wife brought him any children, he should without all contradiction receive againe all from the King and hold it peaceably as before: and the King gave unto him a 1000. pounds in money, and a thousand pound land during his life, together with the Marshallship, and the Earldome. But when he was departed this life without issue, King Edward the Second, honoured the said Thomas of Brotherton his brother, according to the conveiance aforesaid, with the Titles of Marshall and Earle of Norfolke. Whose daughter Margaret called Marshall and Countesse of Norfolke wife to John Lord Segrave, king Richard the Second created in her absence Dutchesse of Norfolke for terme of life: and the same day created Thomas Mowbray the daughters sonne of the said Margaret, then Earle of Nottingham, the first Duke of Norfolke, To him and his heires males; unto whom he had likewise granted before the State and stile of Earle Marshall of England.

This is hee, that before the king was challenged and accused by Henry of Lancaster Duke of Hereford, for uttering inconsiderately certaine reprochfull, and derogatory words against the king. And when they were to fight a combat, at the very barre and entry of the Lists, by the voice of an Herauld it was proclaimed in the kings name, That both of them should be banished, Lancaster for ten yeares, and Mowbray for ever: who afterwards ended his life at Venice, leaving two sonnes behind him in England.

England. Of which, Thomas Earle Marshall and of Nottingham, for no other Title used hee, was beheaded for seditious plotting against Henry of Lancaster, who now had possessed himselfe of the Crowne by the name of King Henry the Fourth. But his brother and heire John, who through the favour of King Henry the Fifth was raised up, and for certaine yeares after called onely Earle Marshall and of Nottingham, at last in the very beginning of Henry the Sixth his Raigne, By authority of Parliament and by vertue of the Patent granted by King Richard the Second, was declared, Duke of Norfolke, as being the sonne of Thomas Duke of Norfolk his father, and heire to Thomas his brother. After him succeeded John his sonne, who died in the first yeare of Edward the Fourth: and after him likewise John his sonne, who whiles his father lived was created by King Henry the Sixth Earle of Surry and of Warren. Whose onely daughter Anne, Richard Duke of Yorke, the young sonne of King Edward the Fourth tooke to wife, and together with her received of his father the Titles of Duke of Norfolke, Earle Marshall, Earle of Warren and Nottingham. But after that he and his wife both were made away in their tender yeares, Richard the Third, King of England conferred this Title of the Duke of Norfolke, and the dignity of Earle Marshall upon John Lord Howard, who was found next cozen in blood and one of the heires to the said Anne Dutchesse of Yorke and Norfolke; as whose mother was one of the daughters of that first Thomas Mowbray Duke of Norfolke, and who in the time of King Edward the Fourth was summoned a Baron to the Parliament. This John lost his life at Bosworth field, fighting valiantly in the quarrell of King Richard, against King Henry the Seventh. His sonne Thomas, who being by King Richard the Third created Earle of Surry, and by King Henry the Seventh made Lord Treasurer, was by King Henry the Eighth restored to the Title of Duke of Norfolke, and his sonne the same day created Earle of Surry: after that by his conduct, James the fourth, King of the Scots was slaine, and the Scottish power vanquished at Branxton. In memoriall of which Victory the said King granted to him and his heires males for ever, that they should beare in the midst of the Bend in the Howard's Armes, the whole halfe of the upper part of a Lion Genes, pierced through the mouth with an arrow, in the due colours of the Armes of the King of Scots. I translate it verbatim out of the Patent. After him succeeded his sonne Thomas as well in his honours, as in the Office of Lord Treasurer of England, and lived to the time of Queene Mary, tossed to and fro betwene the reciprocall ebbs and flowes of fortune, whose grand sonne Thomas (by his sonne Henry, the first of the English Nobility that did illustrate his high birth with the beauty of learning) being attainted for purposing a marriage with Mary the Queene of Scots, lost his life in the yeare of our Lord 1572. and was the last Duke of Norfolke. Since which time his offspring lay for a good while halfe dead: but now watered and revived with the vital dew of King James, re flourisheth very freshly.

CAMBRIDGE.

CAMBRIDGE-SHIRE.

CAMBRIDGE-SHIRE, called in the English-Saxon Grent-pig-reyn lyeth more inward, and stretched out in length Northward. On the East it butteth upon Northfolke and Suffolke, on the South upon the East-Saxons or Essex, and Hertfordshire, on the West upon Bedford and Huntingdon shires, and Northward upon Lincoln-shire: being divided into two parts by the river Ouse which crosseth it over-thwart from West to East.

The lower and South-part is better manured, and therefore more plentifull, being some-what a plaine, yet not altogether leuell, for the most part or all of it rather (save onely where it bringeth forth saffron) is laid out into corne fields, and yeeldeth plentifully the best barley; of which steeped in water and lying wet therein untill it sprout againe, then after the said sprout is full come, dried and parched over a Kill, they make a store of mault: By venting and sending out whereof into the neighbor-countries, the Inhabitants raise very great gaine. The farther and Northerne part, because it is Fennish ground, by reason of the many floods that the rivers cause, and so dispersed into Islands, is called The Isle of Ely, a tract passing greene, fresh and gay by reason of most plenteous pastures: howbeit after a sort hollow, by occasion of the water that in some places secretly entrench in; yea and otherwhile when it overfloweth, surroundeth most part of it.

Along the West side of the lower part runneth one of the two highwayes made by the Romans, (Ely booke calleth it Ermingstreet) which passeth forth right to Huntingdon through Roisson, that standeth in the very edge and entry of the Shire, a towne well knowne, yet but of late built, whereof I have already spoken: also by Caxton, in times past the seate of the Barony of Stephen de Eschalers, and from whose Posterity in the reigne of King Henry the Third it descended to the Frevills, and from them by the Burgeins to the Iermans. Neither is Gamlingshay far distant from hence, where dwelt the Avenells, whose Inheritance came by marriage to the ancient Family of Saint George, (out of which there flourished many Knights since the time of King Henry the First) at Hatley, which of them is called Hatley Saint George. Above Caxton before mentioned is Eliesley, where was in elder Ages a Religious house of Holy Virgines, among whom was celebrated the incertaine memory of Saint Pandionia the daughter of a Scottish King, as the tradition is. But long since they were translated to Hinchinbroke. And againe above Eliesley, was the Priory of Swasey founded for blacke Monkes by Alan la Zouch brother to the Vicount of Rohan in the Lesser Britaine, and was the common Sepulture a long time for the Family of Zouch.

More Westward a little river runneth through the middle of this part, which if suing downe out of Ashwel, hastneth from South to North with many turnings, to joyn it selfe with the Ouse, running by Shengay (where be the goodliest meadows of this Shire) a Commandery in old time of the Knights Templars, which Shengay, Sibyl the daughter of Roger Mont-gomery Earle of Shrewsbury, and wife of I. de Raines gave unto them in the yeere 1130. nor farre from Burne Castle, in ancient times the Barony of First Sheriffe of this Shire, and of the Peverels, from whom by one of the daughters, this and other Possessions came unto Sir Gilbert Peck: the last of whose house, after he had otherwise advanced his children by his second wife, ordained King Edward the First, to be his Heire. For, in those dayes the Noble men of England brought into use againe the custome of the Romanes under their Emperours, which was to nominate them their heires, if they were in any disfavours with their Sovereignes.

But in the Barons warre in King Henric the Third his dayes, this Castle was burnt burnt downe, being set on fire by Ribald L' Isle: At which time Walter de Cottem a respecive person, was hanged for Rebellion.

By what name writers termed this River, it is a question: some call it Granta, others Camus. And unto these I rather incline: both for that the course thereof is somewhat crooked; for, so much doth Cam in the British tongue signifie, whence a certaine crooked river in Cornwall is named Camel; and also because the great towne CAMBORITUM, which Antonine the Emperour mentioneth in his journey of Britaine, stood upon this river as I am well neere induced to beleve by the distance, by the name, and also by the peeces of Romane mony found hereunto the bridge in great store. For, CAMBORITUM, signifieth A Fould or a Fould with crooked windings. For Ribb in our British or Welsh tongue betokeneth A Fould, which I note to this end, that the Frenchmen may more easily perceive and see what is the meaning of Augustoritum, Darioritum, Ribomagus, and other like in France. Howbeit the Saxons chuse rather to call our Camborritum; Gyn-cear-cep and Gpon-cep, which name it keepeth still: but whence it was derived, I cannot yet see. If I should fetch it from Gron a Saxon word that signifieth Fenny place, I might perhaps goe wide: And yet Asserius termed once or twice certaine fenish and marshy grounds in Somersetshire, by a mungrell name the Saxon and halfe Latine, Gronnas paludosisimas: and very well knowne it is, that City in West Frisland, which is situate in such a ground is named Gravinsker. But let other hunt after the derivation of this name. About the yeere of Christ 700, it was a little desolate City, as saith Bede, whiles hee reporteth that neere unto the walles, there was found a little trough or coffin, very cunningly and finely wrought of Marble, and covered most fitly with a lidde of the like stone. But now a full Village it is: one part whereof Henry Lacie Earle of Lincoln gave unto his sonne Henry, with this condition, that his sonnes and their posterity (which they while since be cleane worne out) should have no other Christian name but Henry: the other part, Henry the Sixth King of England comming out of the Isle of Lancaster, into whose hands the Patrimony of Earle Lacie fell, granted unto the Kings Colledge in Cambridge: which was either a part or else a plant of the ancient Camborritum, so neere it commeth unto it both in situation and name. Neither can I easily beleve, that Grant was turned into Cam; for this might seeme a diminution some what too hardly streined, wherein all the letters but one are quite swallowed up. I would rather thinke that the common people retained the terme of the ancient name of Camborritum or of the river Cam, although writers used more often the Saxon name Grantbridge. This City which being the other University of England, the other eye, the other strong-stay, as it were, thereof, and a most famous Mart and store-house of good Literature and Godlines, standeth upon the river, which after it hath in sporting wise besprinkled the West side thereof with many Islets, turning into the East, divideth it into two parts, and hath a Bridge there, whence arose this latter name Cambridge. Beyond the bridge is seene a biggish ancient Castle, which seemeth now to have lived out his full time, nigh Maudslowe Colledge. On this side the Bridge, where standeth the greatest part by farre of the City, you have a pleasant sight every where to the eye, what of fair streets orderly paved, what of a number of Churches, and of sixteene Colledges, sacred mansions of the Muses, wherein a number of great learned men are maintained, and wherein the knowledge of the best Arts, and the skill in tongues so flourish, that they might rightly counted the fountaines of Literature, Religion, and all Knowledge whatsoever, who right sweetly bedew and sprinkle with most wholesome waters the paths of the Church and Common-wealth through England. Neither is there wanting any thing here, that a man may require in a most flourishing University, were it not that the ayre is somewhat unhealthfull arising as it doth out of a fenny ground hard by. And yet peradventure they that first founded an University in that place, allowed Platoes judgement. For, he being of a very excellent and strong constitution of body chose out the Academia, an unwholsome place of Attica, for to study in, that so the

A superfluous rankness of body which might overlay the minde, might be kept under by the disfigurement of the place. Nevertheless, for all this, our forefathers, men of singular wisdom dedicated this place, and not without divine direction unto learned Studies, and beautified it with notable workes and buildings.
